PREFACE

TO

THE FIRST EDITION.

It may seem surprising that the English, who have employed their talents successfully in every branch of literature, and in none more than in that of philology, should yet have fallen below other nations in the study of their synonyms: it cannot however be denied that, while the French and Germans have had several considerable works on the subject, we have not a single writer who has treated it in a scientific manner adequate to its importance: not that I wish by this remark to depreciate the labours of those who have preceded me; but simply to assign it as a reason why I have now been induced to some forward with an attempt to fill up what is considered a chasm in English literature.

In the prosecution of my undertaking, I have profited by every thing which has been written in any language upon the subject; and although I always pursued my own train of thought, yet whenever I met with any thing deserving of notice, I adopted it, and referred it to the author in a note. I had not proceeded far before I found it necessary to restrict myself in the choice of my materials; and accordingly laid it down as a rule not to compare any words together which were sufficiently distinguished from each other by striking features in their signification, such as abandon and quit, which require a comparison with others, though not necessarily with themselves; for the same reason I thought fit to limit myself, as a rule, to one authority for each word, unless where the case seemed to require farther exemplification.

Although a work of this description does not afford much scope for system and arrangement, yet I laid down to myself the plan of arranging the words according to the extent or universality of their acceptance, placing those first which had the most general sense and application, and the rest in order. By this plan I found myself greatly aided in analyzing their differences, and I trust that the reader will thereby be equally benefited. In the choice of authorities I have been guided by various considerations; namely, the appropriateness of the examples; the classic purity of the author; the justness of the sentiment; and, last of all, the variety of the writers: but I am persuaded that the reader will not be dissatisfied to find that I have shown a decided preference to such authors as Addison, Johnson, Dryden, Pope, Milton, &c. At the same time it is but just to observe that this selection of authorities has been made by an actual perusal of the authors, without the assistance of Johnson's dictionary.

For the sentiments scattered through this work I offer no apology, although I am aware that they will not fall in with the views of many who may be competent to decide on its literary merits. I write not to please or displease any description of persons; but I trust that what I have written according to the dictates of my mind will meet the approbation of those whose good opinion I am most solicitous to obtain. Should any object to the introduction of morality in a work of science, I beg them to consider, that a writer, whose business it was to mark the nice shades of distinction between words closely allied, could not do justice to his subject without entering into all the relations of society, and showing, from the acknowledged sense of many moral and religious terms, what has been the general sense of mankind on many of the most important questions which have agitated the world. My first object certainly has been to assist the philological inquirer in ascertaining the force and comprehension of the English language; yet I should have thought my work but half completed had I made it a mere register of verbal distinctions. While others seize every opportunity unblushingly to avow and zealously to propagate opinions destructive of good order, it would ill become any individual of contrary sentiments to shrink from stating his convictions, when called upon as he seems to be by an occasion like that which has now offered itself. As to the rest, I throw myself on the indulgence of the publick, with the assurance that, having used every endeavour to deserve their approbation, I shall not make an appeal to their candour in vain.

TO THE LONDON QUARTO EDITION.

A FOURTH edition of the ENGLISH SYNONYMES having now become desirable, the Author has for some time past occupied himself in making such additions and improvements, as he deems calculated materially to enhance its value as a work of criticism. The alphabetical arrangement of the words is exchanged for one of a more scientifick character, arising from their alliance in sense or from the general nature of the subjects: thus affording the advantage of a more connected explanation of terms, more or less allied to each other. At the same time the purpose of reference is more fully answered by an index so copious that the reader may immediately turn to the particular article sought for. The subject matter of several articles has been considerably enlarged, and such amplifications admitted as may serve to place the SYNONYMES in a clearer point of view, particularly by comparing them with the corresponding words in the original languages whence they are derived. The English quotations have likewise undergone several alterations both in their number and order, so as to adapt them to the other changes which have been introduced throughout the work.

ENGLISH SYNONYMES

EXPLAINED.

SOUL, MIND.

THESE terms, or the equivalents to them, have been employed by all civilized nations to designate that part of human nature which is distinct from matter. The Soul, however, from the German seele, &c. and the Greek ψυχή, to live, like the anima of the Latin, which comes from the Greek ἀνεμος, wind or breath, is represented to our minds by the subtlest or most ethereal of sensible objects, namely, breath or spirit, and denotes properly the quickening or vital principle. Mind, on the contrary, from the Greek μῆνος, which signifies strength, is that sort of power which is closely allied to, and in a great measure dependant upon, corporeal organization: the former is, therefore, the immortal, and the latter the mortal, part of us; the former connects us with angels, the latter with brutes; in this latter we distinguish a nothing but the power of receiving impressions from external objects, which we call ideas, and which we have in common with the brutes.

There are minute philosophers, who, from their extreme anxiety about truth, deny that we possess any thing more than what this poor composition of flesh and blood can give us; and yet, methinks, sound philosophy would teach us that we ought to prove the truth of one position, before we assert the falsehood of its opposite; and consequently, that if we deny that we have any thing but what is material in us, we ought first to prove that the material is sufficient to produce the reasoning faculty of man. Now it is upon this very impossibility of finding any thing in matter as an adequate cause for the production of the soul, that it is conceived to be an entirely distinct principle. If we had only the mind, that is, an aggregate of ideas or sensible images, such as is possessed by the brutes, it would be no difficulty to conceive of this as purely material, since the act of receiving images is but a passive act, suited to the inactive property of matter: but when the soul turns in upon itself, and creates for itself by abstraction, combination, and deduction, a world of new objects, it proves itself to be the most active of all principles in the universe; it then positively acts upon matter instead of being acted upon by it.

But not to lose sight of the distinction drawn between the words soul and mind, I simply wish to show that the vulgar and the philosophical use of these terms altogether accord, and are both founded on the true nature of things. Poets and philosophers speak of the soul in the same strain, as the active and living principle;

Man's soul in a perpetual motion flows,
And to no outward cause that motion owes.
DENHAM.

In bashful coyness, or in maiden pride,
The soft return conceal'd, save when it stole
In side-long glances from her downcast eyes,
Or from her swelling soul in stifled sighs.
THOMSON.

'The soul consists of many faculties, as the understanding, and the will, with all the senses, both outward and inward; or, to speak more philosophically, the soul can exert herself in many different ways of action.'—ADDISON. The ancients, though unaided by the light of divine revelation, yet represented the soul as a distinct principle. The Psyche of the Greeks, which was the name they gave to the human soul, was feigned to be one of their incorporeal or celestial beings. The anima of the Latins was taken precisely in the modern sense of the soul, by which it was distinguished from the animus or mind. Thus the emperor Adrian is said on his dying bed to have addressed his soul in words which clearly denote what he thought of its independent existence.

Animula vagula, blandula,
Quæ nunc abibis in loca?
Hospes comesque corporis,
Pallidula, rigida, undula,
Nec (ut soles) dabis joca!

The mind being considered as an attribute to the soul, is taken sometimes for one faculty, and sometimes for another; as for the understanding, when we say a person is not in his right mind;

I am a very foolish, fond old man;
I fear I am not in my perfect mind.—SHAKESPEARE

Sometimes for the intellectual power;

I thought the eternal mind
Had made us masters.—DRYDEN.

Or for the intellectual capacity;

We say that learning's endless, and blame fate
For not allowing life a longer date,
He did the utmost bounds of knowledge find,
He found them not so large as was his mind.
COWLEY

Or for the imagination or conception; 'In the judgment of Aristotle and Bacon, the true poet forms his imitations of nature after a model of ideal perfection, which perhaps has no existence but in his own mind.'—BEATTIE.

Sometimes the word mind is employed to denote the operations of the thinking faculty, the thoughts or opinions;

The ambiguous god,
In these mysterious words his mind express'd,
Some truths revealed, in terms involved the rest.
DRYDEN.

The earth was not of my mind
If you suppose, as fearing you, it shook.
SHAKESPEARE.

Or the will, choice, determination, as in the colloquial phrase to have a mind to do a thing; 'All the arguments to a good life will be very insignificant to a man that hath a mind to be wicked, when remission of sins may be had on such cheap terms.'—TILLOTSON. 'Our question is, whether all be sin which is done without direction by Scripture, and not whether the Israelites did at any time amiss by following their own minds without asking counsel of God.'—HOOKEER.

Sometimes it stands for the memory, as in the familiar expressions to call to mind, put in mind, &c.; 'The king knows their disposition; a small touch will put him in mind of them.'—BACON.

These, and more than I to mind can bring,
Menalcas has not yet forgot to sing'.—DRYDEN.

'They will put him in mind of his own waking thoughts, ere these dreams had as yet made their impressions on his fancy.'—ATTERBURY.

A wholesome law, time out of mind;
Had been confirm'd by fate's decree'.—SWIFT.

Lastly, the mind is considered as the seat of all the faculties; 'Every faculty is a distinct taste in the mind, and hath objects accommodated to its proper relish.'—ADDISON. And also of the passions or affections;

E'en from the body's purity, the mind
Receives a secret sympathetic aid.—THOMSON.

'This word, being often used for the soul giving life, is attributed abusively to madmen, when we say that they are of a distracted mind, instead of a broken understanding; which word mind we use also for opinion, as I am of this or that mind; and sometimes for men's conditions or virtues, as he is of an honest mind, or a man of a just mind; sometimes for affection, as I do this for my mind's sake,' &c.—RALEIGH.

'The soul, being the better part of a man, is taken for the man's self, as Horace says, in allusion to his friend Virgil, 'Et serves anime dimidium mœi'; hence the term is figuratively extended in its application to denote a human being; 'The moral is the case of every soul of us.'—L. ESTRANGE. It is a republic; there are in it a hundred burgoes, and about a thousand souls; 'The poor soul sat singing by a scamorie tree.'—SHAKESPEARE. Or the individual in general;

Join voices, all ye living souls. Ye birds
That singing up to heaven-gate ascend
Bear on your wings, and in your notes, his praise.
MILTON.

Also what is excellent, the essential or principal part of a thing, the spirit; 'Thou sun, of this great world both eye and soul.'—MILTON. 'He has the very soul of bounty.'—SHAKESPEARE.

There is some soul of goodness in things evil,
Would men observingly distil it out.—SHAKESPEARE.

INCORPOREAL, UNBODIED, IMMATERIAL, SPIRITUAL.

Incorporeal, from corpus, a body, marks the quality of not belonging to the body, or having any properties in common with it; unbodied denotes the state of being without the body, or not enclosed in a body; a thing may therefore be incorporeal without being unbodied; but not vice versa; the soul of a man is incorporeal, but not unbodied, during his natural life;

Th' unbodied spirit flies
And lodges where it lights in man or beast.
DRYDEN.

Incorporeal is used in regard to living things, particularly by way of comparison, with corporeal or human beings;

Of sense, whereby they hear, see, smell, touch, taste,
Tasting, concoct, digest, assimilate,
And corporeal to incorporeal turn.—MILTON.

Hence we speak of incorporeal agency, or incorporeal agents, in reference to such beings as are supposed to act in this world without the help of the body; 'Sense and perception must necessarily proceed from some incorporeal substance within us.'—BENTLEY. But immaterial is applied to inanimate objects;

O thou great arbiter of life and death,
Nature's immortal, immaterial sun!
Thy call I follow to the land unknown.—YOUNG.

Men are corporeal as men, spirits are incorporeal; the body is the material part of man, the soul his immaterial part; whatever external object acts upon the senses is material; but the action of the mind on itself, and its results are all immaterial: the earth, sun, moon, &c. are termed material; but the impressions which they make on the mind 'that is, our ideas of them, are immaterial.'

The incorporeal and immaterial have always a relative sense; the spiritual is that which is positive: God is a spiritual, not properly an incorporeal nor immaterial being: the angels are likewise designated, in general, as the spiritual inhabitants of Heaven; 'All creatures, as well spiritual as corporeal, declare their absolute dependence upon the first author of all beings, the only self-existent God.'—BENTLEY. Although, when spoken of in regard to men, they may be denominated incorporeal;

Thus incorporeal spirits to smallest forms
Reduced their shapes immense.—MILTON.

The epithet spiritual has, however, been improperly or figuratively applied to objects in the sense of immaterial; 'Echo is a great argument of the spiritual essence of sounds; for if it were corporeal, the repercussion should be created by like instruments with the original sound.'—BACON.

SPIRITUOUS, SPIRITED, SPIRITUAL, GHOSTLY.

Spirituos signifies having the spirit separated from the gross particles of the body, after the manner of spirituos liquors; 'The spirituos and benign matter most apt for generation.'—SMITH on Old Age. Spirited is applicable to the animal spirits of either men or brutes; a person or a horse may be spirited; and also in a moral application in the sense of vivacious, or calculated to rouse the spirit; 'Dryden's translation of Virgil is noble and spirited.'—POPE. What is spiritual is after the manner of a spirit; and what is ghostly is like a ghost; although originally the same in meaning, the former being derived from the Latin spiritus, and the latter from the German geist, and both signifying what is not corporeal, yet they have acquired a difference of application. Spiritual objects are distinguished generally from those of sense; 'Virginity is better than the married life, not that it is more holy, but that it is a freedom from cares, an opportunity to spend more time in spiritual employments.'—TAYLOR (Holy Living). Hence it is that the word spiritual is opposed to the temporal; 'She loves them as her spiritual children, and they reverence her as their spiritual mother, with an affection far above that of the fondest friend.'—LAW.

Thou art reverend,
Touching thy spiritual function, not thy life.
SHAKESPEARE.

Ghostly is more immediately opposed to the carnal or the secular, and is therefore a term of more solemn import than spiritual; 'The grace of the spirit is much more precious than worldly benefits, and our ghostly evils of greater importance than harm which the body feeleth.'—HOOKER. 'To deny me the ghostly comfort of my chaplains seems a greater barbarity than is ever used by Christians.'—K. CHARLES.

UNDERSTANDING, INTELLECT, INTELLIGENCE.

Understanding being the Saxon word, is employed to describe a familiar and easy operation of the mind in forming distinct ideas of things. Intellect, which is of Latin derivation, is employed to mark the same operation in regard to higher and more abstruse objects. The understanding applies to the first exercise of the rational powers: it is therefore aptly said of children and savages that they employ their understandings on the simple objects of perception; a child uses his understanding to distinguish the dimensions of objects, or to apply the right names to the things that come before his notice; 'By understanding I mean that faculty whereby we are enabled to apprehend the objects of knowledge, generals as well as particulars, absent things as well as present, and to judge of their truth or falsehood, good or evil.'—WILKINS.

Intellect, being a matured state of the understanding, is most properly applied to the efforts of those who have their powers in full vigour: we speak of understanding as the characteristic distinction between man and brute; 'The light within us is (since the fall) be come darkness; and the understanding, that should be eyes to the blind faculty of the will, is blind itself.'—SOUTH. But human beings are distinguished from each other by the measure of their intellect; 'All those arts and inventions which vulgar minds gaze at, the ingenious pursue, and all admire, are but the relics of an intellect defaced with sin and time.'—SOUTH. We may expect the youngest children to employ an understanding according to the opportunities which they have of using their senses; one is gratified in seeing great intellect in youth.

Intellect and intelligence are derived from the same word; but intellect describes the power itself, and intelligence the exercise of that power: the intellect may be hidden, but the intelligence brings it to light;

Silent as the ecstasick bliss
Of souls, that by intelligence converse.—OTWAY

Hence we speak of intelligence as displayed in the countenance of a child whose looks evince that he has exerted his intellect, and thereby proved that it exists. Hence it arises that the word intelligence has been employed in the sense of knowledge or information, because these are the express fruits of intelligence: we must know by means of intelligence; but we may be ignorant with a great share of intellect.

Understanding and intelligence admit of comparison in the sense of acquaintance between two or more persons as to each other's views, and a consequent harmony and concert; but the former term is applied to the ordinary concerns of life, and the harmonious intercourse of men, as in the phrase to be on terms of a good understanding; 'He hoped the loyalty of his subjects would concur with him in the preserving a good understanding between him and his subjects.'—CLARENDON. Intelligence, on the other hand, is particularly applicable to persons who, being obliged to co-operate at a distance from each other, hold a commerce of information, or get to understand each other by means of mutual information; 'It was perceived that there had not been in the Catholics so much foresight as to provide that true intelligence might pass between them of what was done.'—HOOKER.

Let all the passages

Be well secured, that no intelligence

May pass between the prince and them.—DENHAM.

INTELLECT, GENIUS, TALENT.

Intellect, in Latin intellectus, from intelligo, to understand, signifying the gift of understanding, as opposed to mere instinct or impulse, is here the generic term, as it includes in its own meaning that of the two others: there cannot be genius or talent without intellect; but there may be intellect without genius or talent: a man of intellect distinguishes himself from the common herd of mankind, by the acuteness of his observation, the accuracy of his judgement, the originality of his conceptions, and other peculiar attributes of mental power; genius, in Latin genius, from gigno, to be born, signifying that which is peculiarly born with us, is a particular bent of the intellect, which distinguishes a man from every other individual; talent, which from τάλαντον and talentum, a Greek coin exceeding one hundred pounds, is now employed in the figurative language of our Saviour for that particular modus or modification of the intellect, which is of practical utility to the possessor. Intellect sometimes runs through a family, and becomes as it were an hereditary portion: genius is not of so communicable a nature; it is that tone of the thinking faculty which is altogether individual in its character; it is opposed to every thing artificial, acquired, circumstantial, or incidental; it is a pure spark of the Divine flame, which raises the possessor above all his fellow-mortals; it is not expanded, like intellect, to many objects; for in its very nature it is contracted within a very short space; and, like the rays of the sun, when concentrated within a focus, it gains in strength what it loses in expansion.

We consider intellect as it generally respects speculation and abstraction; but genius as it respects the operations of the imagination; talent as it respects the exercise or acquirements of the mind. A man of intellect may be a good writer; but it requires a genius for poetry to be a poet, a genius for painting to be a painter, a genius for sculpture to be a statuary, and the like; it requires a talent to learn languages; it requires a talent for the stage to be a good actor; some have a talent for imitation, others a talent for humour. Intellect, in its strict sense, is seen only in a mature state; genius or talent may be discovered in its earliest dawn: we speak in general of the intellect of a man only; but we may speak of the genius or talent of a youth; intellect qualifies a person for conversation, and affords him great enjoyment; 'There was a select set, supposed to be distinguished by superiority of intellects, who always passed the evening together.'—JOHNSON. Genius qualifies a person for the most exalted efforts of the human mind; 'Thomson thinks in a peculiar train, and always thinks as a man of genius.'—JOHNSON. Talent qualifies a person for the active duties and employments of life; 'It is commonly thought that the sagacity of these fathers (the Jesuits) in discovering the talent of a young student, has not a little contributed to the figure which their order has made in the world.'—BUDGEELL.

GIFT, ENDOWMENT, TALENT.

Gift and endowment both refer to the act of giving and endowing, and of course include the idea of something given, and something received: the word talent conveys no such collateral idea. When we speak of a gift, we refer in our minds to a giver;

But Heaven its gifts not all at once bestows,
These years with wisdom crowns, with action those.

POPE

When we speak of an endowment, we refer in our minds to the receiver; 'A brute arrives at a point of perfection that he can never pass; in a few years he has all the endowments he is capable of.'—ADDISON. When we speak of a talent (v. Intellect) we only think of its intrinsic quality or worth; 'Mr. Locke has an admirable reflection upon the difference of wit and judgement, whereby he endeavours to show the reason why they are not always the talents of the same person.'—ADDISON.

The gift is either supernatural or natural; the endowment is only natural. The primitive Christians received various gifts through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, as the gift of tongues, the gift of healing, &c. There are some men who have a peculiar gift of utterance; beauty of person, and corporal agility, are endowments with which some are peculiarly invested.

The word gift excludes the idea of any thing acquired by exertion; it is that which is communicated to us altogether independent of ourselves, and enables us to arrive at that perfection in any art which could not be attained in any other way. Speech is denominated a general gift, inasmuch as it is given to the whole human race in distinction from the brutes; but the gift of utterance is a peculiar gift granted to individuals, in distinction from others, which may be exerted for the benefit of mankind. Endowments, though inherent in us, are not independent of exertions; they are qualities which admit of improvement by being used; they are in fact the gifts of nature, which serve to adorn and elevate the possessor, when employed for a good purpose. Talents are either natural or acquired, or in some measure of a mixed nature; they denote powers without specifying the source from which they proceed; a man may have a talent for music, for drawing, for mimicry, and the like; but this talent may be the fruit of practice and experience, as much as of nature.

It is clear from the above that an endowment is a gift, but a gift is not always an endowment; and that a talent may also be either a gift or an endowment, but that it is frequently distinct from both. A gift or a talent is applicable to corporeal as well as spiritual actions; an endowment is applicable to corporeal or mental qualities. To write a superiour hand is a gift, inasmuch as it is supposed to be unattainable by any force of application and instruction; it is a talent, inasmuch as it is a power or property worth our possession; but it is never an endowment. On the other hand, courage, discernment, a strong imagination, and the like, are both gifts and endowments; and when the intellectual endowment displays itself in any creative form, as in the case of poetry, music, or any art, so as to produce that which is valued and esteemed, it becomes a talent to the possessor.

ABILITY, CAPACITY.

Ability, in French habilité, Latin habilitas, comes from able, habile, habilis, and habeo to have, because possession and power are inseparable. Capacity, in French capacité, Latin capacitas, from capax and capio to receive, marks the abstract quality of being able to receive or hold.

Ability is to capacity as the genus to the species. Ability comprehends the power of doing in general without specifying the quality or degree; capacity is a particular kind of ability.

Ability may be either physical or mental, capacity, when said of persons, is mental only; 'Riches are of no use, if sickness taketh from us the ability of enjoying them.'—SWYFFER. 'In what I have done, I have rather given a proof of my willingness and desire, than of my ability to do him (Shakspeare) justice.'—POPE.

Ability respects action, capacity respects thought. Ability always supposes something able to be done; 'I look upon an able statesman out of business like a huge whale, that will endeavour to overturn the ship unless he has an empty cask to play with.'—STEELE. Capacity is a mental endowment, and always supposes something ready to receive or hold; 'The object is too big for our capacity, when we would comprehend the circumference of a world.'—ADDISON. Hence we say an able commander; an able statesman; a man of a capacious mind; a great capacity of thought. Ability is in no wise limited in its extent; it may be small or great;

Of singing thou hast got the reputation,
Good Thyriss; mine I yield to thy ability.
My heart doth seek another estimation.—SIDNEY.

Capacity of itself always implies a positive and superiour degree of power; 'Sir Francis Bacon's capacity seemed to have grasped all that was revealed in books before.'—HUGHES. Although it may be modified by epithets to denote different degrees; a boy of capacity will have the advantage over his school-fellows, particularly if he be classed with those of a dull capacity. A person may be able to write a letter, who is not capable of writing a book; 'St. Paul requireth learning in presbyters, yea, such learning as doth enable them to exhort in doctrine which is sound, and to disprove them that gainsay it. What measure of ability in such things shall serve to make men capable of that kind of office he doth not determine.'—HOOKER.

Abilities, when used in the plural only, is confined to the signification of mental endowments, and comprehends the operations of thought in general; 'As for me, my abilities, if ever I had any, are not what they were.'—ATTERBURY. Capacity, on the other hand, is that peculiar endowment, that enlargement of understanding, that exalts the possessor above the rest of mankind; 'We sometimes repine at the narrow limits prescribed to human capacity.'—BEATTIE. Many men have the abilities for managing the concerns of others, who would not have the capacity for conducting a concern of their own. We should not judge highly of that man's abilities who could only mar the plans of others, but had no capacity for conceiving and proposing any thing better in their stead.

A vivid imagination, a retentive memory, an exuberant flow of language, are abilities which may be successfully employed in attracting popular applause; 'I grieve that our senate is dwindled into a school of rhetoric, where men rise to display their abilities rather than to deliberate.'—SIR W. JONES. But that capacity which embraces a question in all its bearings, which surveys with a discriminating eye the mixed multitude of objects that demand attention, which is accompanied with coolness in reflecting, readiness in combining, quickness in inventing, firmness in deciding, promptitude in action, and penetration in discerning, that is the capacity to direct a state, which is the gift of but few; 'An heroic poem requires the accomplishment of some extraordinary undertaking, which requires the duty of a soldier, and the capacity and prudence of a general.'—DRYDEN.

ABILITY, FACULTY, TALENT.

The common idea of power is what renders these words synonymous.

Ability, as in the preceding article, signifies that which may be derived either from circumstances or otherwise; faculty, in Latin facultas, changed from facilitas faculty, which signifies doableness, or the property of being able to do or bring about effects, is a power derived from nature; 'The vital faculty is that by which life is preserved and the ordinary functions of speech preserved; and the animal faculty is what conducts the operations of the mind.'—QUINCY. The faculty is a permanent possession; it is held by a certain tenure: the ability is an incidental possession; it is whatever we have while we have it at our disposal, but it may vary in degree and quality with times, persons, and circumstances; 'Ability to teach by sermons is a grace which God doth bestow on them whom he maketh sufficient for the commendable discharge of their duty.'—HOOKER. The powers of seeing and hearing are faculties; health, strength, and fortune are abilities. The faculty is some specific power which is directed to one single object; it is the power of acting according to a given form;

No fruit our palate courts, or flow'r our smell,
But on its fragrant bosom nations dwell;
All formed with proper faculties to share
The daily bounties of their Maker's care.—JENNYS.

The ability is in general the power of doing; the faculty therefore might, in the strict sense, be considered as a species of ability; 'Human ability is an unequal match for the violent and unforeseen vicissitudes of the world.'—BLAIR.

A man uses the faculties with which he is endowed, he gives according to his ability.

Faculty and talent both owe their being to nature; but the faculty may be either physical or mental; the talent is altogether mental: the faculty of speech and the rational faculty are the grand marks of distinction between man and the brute; 'Reason is a noble faculty, and when kept within its proper sphere, and applied to useful purposes, proves a means of exalting human creatures almost to the rank of superiour beings.'

—BEATTIE. The talent of mimicry, of dramatick acting, and of imitation in general, is what distinguishes one man from the other;

'Tis not, indeed, my talent to engage
In lofty trifles, or to swell my page
With wind and noise.—DRYDEN.

These terms are all used in the plural, agreeably to the above explanation; the abilities include, in the aggregate, whatever a man is able to do; hence we speak of a man's abilities in speaking, writing, learning, and the like; the faculties include all the endowments of body and mind, which are the inherent properties of the being, as when we speak of a man's retaining his faculties, or having his faculties impaired: talents are the particular endowments of the mind, which belong to the individual; hence we say the talents which are requisite for a minister of state are different from those which qualify a man for being a judge.

ABILITY, DEXTERITY, ADDRESS.

Ability is here, as in the preceding articles, the generic term; dexterity, says the Abbe Girard,* respects the manner of executing things; it is the mechanical facility of performing an office: address refers to the use of means in executing; it signifies properly the mode of address or of managing one's self; dexterity and address are but in fact modes of ability.

Dexterity, in Latin dexteritas, comes from dexter, the right hand, because that it is the member most fitted for dexterous execution. Dexterity may be acquired; 'His wisdom, by often evading from perils, was turned rather into a dexterity to deliver himself from dangers when they pressed him, than into a providence to prevent and remove them afar off.'—BACON. Address is the gift of nature; 'It was no sooner dark than she conveyed into his room a young maid of no disagreeable figure, who was one of her attendants, and did not want address to improve the opportunity for the advancement of her fortune.'—SECTATOR.

We may have ability to any degree (v. Ability); it is not possible for our small party and small ability to extend their operations so far as to be much felt among such numbers.'—COWPER. But dexterity and address are positive degrees of ability; 'It is often observed that the race is won as much by the dexterity of the rider as by the vigour and fleetness of the animal.'—EART or BATH. 'I could produce innumerable instances from my own observation, of events imputed to the profound skill and address of a minister, which in reality were either mere effects of negligence, weakness, humour, or pride, or at best but the natural course of things left to themselves.'—SWIFT.

To form a good government there must be ability in the prince or his ministers; address in those to whom the detail of operations is intrusted; and dexterity in those to whom the execution of orders is confided. With little ability and long habit in transacting business, we may acquire a dexterity in despatching it, and address in giving it whatever turn will best suit our purpose.

Ability enables us to act with intelligence and confidence; dexterity lends an air of ease to every action; address supplies art and ingenuity in contrivance. To manage the whip with dexterity, to carry on an intrigue with address, to display some ability on the turf, will raise a man high in the rank of the present fashionables

* Vide 'Dextérité, adresse, habilité.'

CLEVER, SKILFUL, EXPERT, DEXTEROUS, ADROIT.

Clever, in French leger, Latin levis light, seems to denote quickness in the mental faculty; skilful signifies full of skill; and skill probably comes from the Latin scio to know; expert, in French experte, Latin expertus, participle of experior to search or try, signifies searched and tried; dexterous, in Latin dexter, in Greek δεξις, from δεξι the right hand, has the meaning of clever, because the right hand is the most fitted for action; adroit, in French adroite, Latin adrectus or rectus right or straight, signifies the quality of doing things in a right manner.

Clever and skilful are qualities of the mind; expert, dexterous, and adroit, refer to modes of physical action. Cleverness regards in general the readiness to comprehend; skill the maturity of the judgement; expertness a facility in the use of things; dexterity a mechanical facility in the performance of any work; adroitness the suitable movements of the body. A person is clever at drawing who shows a taste for it, and executes it well without much instruction; he is skilful in drawing if he understands it both in theory and practice; he is expert in the use of the bow if he can use it with expedition and effect; he is dexterous at any game when he goes through the manoeuvres with celerity and an unerring hand; he is adroit if by a quick, sudden, and well-directed movement of his body, he effects the object he has in view.

Cleverness is mental power employed in the ordinary concerns of life: a person is clever in business or amusements;

My friends bade me welcome, but struck me quite dumb,
With tidings that Johnson and Burke would not come;
'And I knew it," he cried, "both eternally fail,
The one at the House, and the other with Thræle.
But no matter; I'll warrant we'll make up the party,
With two full as clever and ten times as hearty."

GOLDSMITH.

Skill is both a mental and corporeal power, exerted in mechanical operations and practical sciences: a physician, a lawyer, and an artist, are skilful: one may have a skill in divination, or a skill in painting.

There is nothing more graceful than to see the play stand still for a few moments, and the audience kept in an agreeable suspense, during the silence of a skilful actor.—ADDISON. Expertness and dexterity require more corporeal than mental power exerted in minor arts and amusements: one is expert at throwing the quoit; dexterous in the management of horses;

O'er bar and shelf the watery path they sound,
With dextrous arm, sagacious of the ground;
Fearless they combat every hostile wind,
Wheeling in many tracts with course inclin'd,
Expert to moor where terrors line the road.

FALCONER.

'He applied himself next to the coquette's heart, which he likewise laid open with great dexterity.'—ADDISON. Adroitness is altogether a corporeal talent, employed only as occasion may require: one is adroit at eluding the blows aimed by an adversary; 'Use yourself to carve adroitly and gently.'—CHESTERFIELD.

Cleverness is rather a natural gift; skill is cleverness improved by practice and extended knowledge; expertness is the effect of long practice; dexterity arises from habit combined with agility; adroitness is a species of dexterity arising from a natural agility and pliability of body.

INABILITY, DISABILITY.

Inability denotes the absence of ability (v. Ability) in the most general and abstract sense; 'It is not from inability to discover what they ought to do that men err in practice.'—BLAIR. Disability implies the absence of ability only in particular cases: the inability lies in the nature of the thing, and is irremediable; the disability lies in the circumstances, and may sometimes be removed; weakness, whether physical or mental, will occasion an inability to perform a task; there is a total inability in an infant to walk and act like an adult: a want of knowledge or of the requisite qualifications may be a disability; in this manner ignorance of the law, or an objection to take certain oaths may be a disability for filling a public office; 'Want of age is a legal disability to contract a marriage.'—BLACKSTONE.

INCAPABLE, INSUFFICIENT, INCOMPETENT, INADEQUATE.

Incapable, that is, not having capacity (v. Ability); insufficient, or not sufficient, or not having what is sufficient; incompetent, or not competent; are employed either for persons or things: the first in a general, the last two in a specific sense: inadequate or not adequate or equalled, is applied more generally to things.

When a man is said to be incapable, it characterizes his whole mind; 'Were a human soul incapable of farther enlargements, I could imagine it might fall away insensibly.'—ADDISON. If he be said to have insufficiency and incompetency, it respects the particular objects to which he has applied his power: he may be insufficient or incompetent for certain things; but he may have a capacity for other things: the term incapacity, therefore, implies a direct charge upon the understanding, which is not implied by the insufficiency and incompetency. An incapacity consists altogether of a physical defect: an insufficiency and incompetency are incidental defects: the former depending upon the age, the condition, the acquisitions, moral qualities, and the like, of the individual; the latter on the extent of his knowledge, and the nature of his studies; where there is direct incapacity, a person has no chance of making himself fit for any office or employment; 'It chiefly proceedeth from natural incapacity, and general indisposition.'—BROWN. Youth is naturally accompanied with insufficiency to fill stations which belong to mature age, and to perform offices which require the exercise of judgement; 'The minister's aptness, or insufficiency, otherwise than by reading, to instruct the flock, standeth in this place as a stranger, with whom our Common Prayer has nothing to do.'—HOOKER. A young person is, therefore, still more incompetent to form a fixed opinion on any one subject, because he can have made himself master of none; 'Laymen, with equal advantages of parts, are not the most incompetent judges of sacred things.'—DRYDEN.

Incapable is applied sometimes to the moral character, to signify the absence of that which is bad; insufficient and incompetent always convey the idea of a deficiency in that which is at least desirable: it is an honour to a person to be incapable of falsehood, or incapable of doing an ungenerous action; but to be insufficient and incompetent are, at all events, qualities not to be boasted of, although they may not be expressly disgraceful. These terms are likewise applicable to things, in which they preserve a similar distinction; infidelity is incapable of affording a man any comfort; when the means are insufficient for obtaining the ends, it is madness to expect success; it is a sad condition of humanity when a man's resources are incompetent to supply him with the first necessities of life.

Inadequate is relative in its signification, like insufficient and incompetent; but the relation is different. A thing is insufficient which does not suffice either for the wishes, the purposes, or necessities, of any one, in particular or in general cases; thus a quantity of materials may be insufficient for a particular building; 'The insufficiency of the light of nature is, by the light of Scripture, fully supplied.'—HOOKER. Incompetency is an insufficiency for general purposes, in things of the first necessity; thus, an income may be incompetent to support a family, or perform an office; 'Every speck does not blind a man, nor does every infirmity make one unable to discern, or incompetent to reprove, the grosser faults of others.'—GOVERNMENT OF THE TONGUE. Inadequacy is still more particular, for it denotes any deficiency which is measured by comparison with the object to which it refers; thus, the strength of an animal may be inadequate to the labour which is required, or a reward may be inadequate to the service; 'All the attainments possible in our present state are evidently inadequate to our capacities of enjoyment.'—JOHNSON.

WIT, HUMOUR, SATIRE, IRONY, BURLESQUE.

Wit, like wisdom, according to its original, from wetissen to know, signifies knowledge, but it has a extended its meaning as to signify that faculty of the mind by which knowledge or truth is perceived. The first property of wit, as an exertion of the intellectual faculty, is that it be spontaneous, and as it were instinctive: laboured or forced wit is no wit. Reflection and experience supply us with wisdom; study and labour supply us with learning; but wit seizes with an eagle eye that which escapes the notice of the deep thinker, and elicits truths which are in vain sought for with any severe effort: 'Wit lies more in the assemblage of ideas, and putting those together with quickness and variety.'—ADDISON. Humour is a species of wit which flows out of the humour of a person;

For sure by wit is chiefly meant
Applying well what we invent:
What humour is not, all the tribe
Of logic-mongers can describe:
Here nature only acts her part,
Unhelp'd by practice, books, or art.—SWIFT.

Wit, as distinguished from humour, may consist of a single brilliant thought;

In a true piece of wit all things must be,
Yet all things there agree.—COWLEY.

But humour runs in a vein: it is not a striking, but an equable and pleasing flow of wit: 'There is a kind of nature, a certain regularity of thought, which must discover the writer (of humour) to be a man of sense at the same time that he appears altogether given up to caprice.'—ADDISON. Of this description of wit Mr. Addison has given us the most admirable specimens in his writings, who knew best how to explain what wit and humour were, and to illustrate them by his practice. Humour may likewise display itself in actions as well as words, whereby it is more strikingly distinguished from wit, which displays itself only in the happy expression of happy thoughts; 'I cannot help remarking that sickness, which often destroys both wit and wisdom, yet seldom has power to remove that talent which we call humour. Mr. Wycherley showed his in his last compliment paid to his young wife (whom he made promise, on his dying bed, that she would not marry an old man again).'—POPE.

Satire, from satyr, probably from sat and ira abounding in anger, and irony, from the Greek σῆπνῶς simulation and dissimulation, are personal and censorious sorts of wit; the first of which openly points at the object, and the second in a covert manner takes its aim; 'The ordinary subjects of satire are such as excite the greatest indignation in the best tempers.'—ADDISON. 'In writings of humour, figures are sometimes used of so delicate a nature, that it shall often happen that some people will see things in a direct contrary sense to what the author, and the majority of the readers understand them: to such the most innocent irony may appear irreligion.'—CAMBRIDGE. Burlesque is rather a species of humour than direct wit, which consists in an assemblage of ideas extravagantly discordant; 'One kind of burlesque represents mean persons in the accoutrements of heroes.'—ADDISON. The satire and irony are the most ill-natured kinds of wit; burlesque stands in the lowest rank.

TASTE, GENIUS.

Taste, in all probability from the Latin tactum and tango to touch, seems to designate the capacity to derive pleasure from an object by simply coming in contact with it; 'This metaphor would not have been so general had there not been a conformity between the mental taste and that sensitive taste which gives a relish of every flavour.'—ADDISON. Genius designates the power we have for accomplishing any object; 'Taste consists in the power of judging, genius in the power of executing.'—BLAIR. He who derives particular pleasure from music may be said to have a taste for music; he who makes very great proficiency in the theory and practice of music may be said to have a genius for it. Taste is in some degree an acquired faculty, or at least is dependant on cultivation, as also on our other faculties, for its perfection; 'The cause of a wrong taste is a defect of judgement.'—BURKE. Genius, from the Latin gigno to generate, is a perfectly natural gift which rises to perfection by its own native strength; the former belongs to the critic, and the latter to the poet;

'Tis with our judgements as our watches, none
Go just alike, yet each believes his own;
In poets as true genius is rare,
True taste as seldom is the critic's share.—POPE.

It is obvious, therefore, that we may have a taste without having genius; but it would not be possible to have genius for a thing without having a taste for it: for nothing can so effectually give a taste for any accomplishment, as the capacity to learn it, and the susceptibility of all its beauties, which circumstances are inseparable from genius.

INGENUITY, WIT.

Both these terms imply acuteness of understanding, and differ mostly in the mode of displaying themselves. Ingenuity, in Latin ingenuitas, signifies literary freedom of birth, in distinction from slavery, with which condition have been naturally associated nobleness of character and richness in mental endowments, in which latter sense it is allied to wit. Ingenuity comprehends invention; wit comprehends knowledge. Ingenuity displays itself in the mode of conducting an argument; 'Men were formerly won over to opinions, by the candour, sense, and ingenuity of those who had the right on their side.'—ADDISON. Wit is mostly displayed in aptness of expression and illustration; 'When I broke loose from that great body of writers, who have employed their wit and parts in propagating vice and irreligion, I did not question but I should be treated as an odd kind of fellow.'—ADDISON. One is ingenious in matters either of art or science; one is witty only in matters of sentiment: things may, therefore, be ingenious, but not witty; witty, but not ingenious, or both witty and ingenious. A mechanical invention, or any ordinary contrivance, is ingenious but not witty; an ingenious, not a witty solution of a difficulty; a flash of wit, not a flash of ingenuity; a witty humour, a witty conversation; not an ingenious humour or conversation; on the other hand, a conceit is ingenious, as it is the fruit of one's own mind; it is witty, as it contains point, and strikes on the understanding of others.

SENSE, JUDGEMENT.

Sense, from the Latin sensus and sento to feel or perceive, signifies in general the faculty of feeling corporeally, or perceiving mentally; in the first case it is allied to feeling (v. Feeling), in the second it is synonymous with judgement, which is a special operation of the mind. 'The sense is that primitive portion of the understanding which renders an account of things through the medium of the senses;

Then is the soul a nature, which contains
The power of sense within a greater power.

DAVIES.

And the judgement, that portion of the reason which selects or rejects from this account. The sense is, so to speak, the reporter which collects the details, and exposes the facts; the judgement is the judge that passes sentence upon them. According to the strict import of the terms, the judgement depends upon the sense, and varies with it in degree. He who has no sense, has no judgement; and he who loses sense, loses judgement: since sense supplies the knowledge of things, and judgement pronounces upon them, it is evident that there must be sense before there can be judgement.

On the other hand, sense, when taken to denote the mental faculty of perceiving, may be so distinguished from judgement, that there may be sense without judgement, and judgement without sense; sense is the faculty of perceiving in general; it is applied to abstract science as well as general knowledge; judgement is the faculty of determining either in matters of practice or theory. It is the lot of many, therefore, to have sense in matters of theory, who have no judgement in matters of practice, while others, on the contrary, who have nothing above common sense, will have a soundness of judgement that is not to be surpassed.

Nay, further, it is possible for a man to have good sense, and yet not a solid judgement: as they are both natural faculties, men are gifted with them as variously as with every other faculty. By good sense a man is enabled to discern, as it were intuitively, that which requires another of less sense to ponder over and study;

* Vide Ribaud: "Sens, judgement"

There's something previous ev'n to taste: 'tis sense, Good sense; which only is the gift of heav'n; And, though no science, fairly worth the seven; A light within yourself you must perceive, Jones and Le Notre have it not to give.—POPE.

By a solid judgement a man is enabled to avoid those errors in conduct, which one of a weak judgement is always falling into; 'In all instances, where our experience of the past has been extensive and uniform, our judgement concerning the future amounts to moral certainty.'—BEATTIE. There is, however, this distinction between sense and judgment, that the deficiencies of the former may be supplied by diligence and attention; but a defect in the latter is to be supplied by no efforts of one's own. A man may improve his sense in proportion as he has the means of information; but a weakness of judgement, is an irremediable evil.

When employed as epithets, the term sensible and judicious serve still more clearly to distinguish the two primitives. A writer or a speaker is said to be sensible; 'I have been tired with accounts from sensible men, furnished with matters of fact, which have happened within their own knowledge.'—ADDISON. A friend, or an adviser, to be judicious; 'Your observations are so judicious, I wish you had not been so sparing of them.'—SIR W. JONES. The sense displays itself in the conversation, or the communication of one's ideas; the judgment in the propriety of one's actions. A sensible man may be an entertaining companion; but a judicious man, in any post of command, is an inestimable treasure. Sensible remarks are always calculated to please and interest sensible people; judicious measures have a sterling value in themselves, that is appreciated according to the importance of the object. Hence, it is obvious, that to be sensible is a desirable thing; but to be judicious is an indispensable requisite.

DISCERNMENT, PENETRATION, DISCRIMINATION, JUDGEMENT.

Discernment expresses the judgement or power of discerning, which, from the Latin discerno, or dis and cerno, signifies to look at apart, so as to form a true estimate of things; penetration denotes the act or power of penetrating, from penetrate, in Latin penetratus, participle of penetro and penitus, within, signifying to see into the interior; discrimination denotes the act or power of discriminating, from discriminate, in Latin discriminatus, participle of discrimino, to make a difference; judgement denotes the power of judging, from judge, in Latin judico, compounded of jus and dico, signifying to pronounce right.

The first three of these terms do not express different powers, but different modes of the same power; namely, the power of seeing intellectually, or exerting the intellectual sight.

Discernment is not so powerful a mode of intellectual vision as penetration; the former is a common faculty, the latter is a higher degree of the same faculty; it is the power of seeing quickly, and seeing in spite of all that intercepts the sight, and keeps the object out of view: a man of common discernment discerns characters which are not concealed by any particular disguise; 'Great part of the country was abandoned to the spoils of the soldiers, who, not troubling themselves to discern between a subject and a rebel, while their liberty lasted, made indifferently profit of both.'—HAYWARD. A man of penetration is not to be deceived by any artifice, however thoroughly cloaked or secured, even from suspicion; 'He is as slow to decide as he is quick to apprehend, calmly and deliberately weighing every opposite reason that is offered, and tracing it with a most judicious penetration.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny).

Discernment and penetration serve for the discovery of individual things by their outward marks; discrimination is employed in the discovery of differences between two or more objects; the former consists of simple observation, the latter combines also comparison: discernment and penetration are great aids towards discrimination; he who can discern the springs of human action, or penetrate the views of men, will be most fitted for discriminating between the characters of different men; 'Perhaps there is no character through all Shakspeare drawn with more spirit and just discrimination than Shylock's.'—HENLEY.

Although judgement derives much assistance from the three former operations, it is a totally distinct power: the former only discover the things that are; it acts on external objects by seeing them: the latter is creative; it produces by deduction from that which passes inwardly.* The former are speculative; they are directed to that which is to be known, and are confined to present objects; they serve to discover truth or falsehood, perfections and defects, motives and pretences: the latter is practical; it is directed to that which is to be done, and extends its views to the future; it marks the relations and connexions of things: it foresees their consequences and effects; 'I love him, I confess, extremely; but my affection does by no means prejudice my judgement.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny).

Of discernment, we say that it is clear; it serves to remove all obscurity and confusion: of penetration, we say that it is acute; it pierces every veil which falsehood draws before truth, and prevents us from being deceived: of discrimination, we say that it is nice; it renders our ideas accurate, and serves to prevent us from confounding objects: of judgement, we say that it is solid or sound; it renders the conduct prudent, and prevents us from committing mistakes, or involving one's self in embarrassments.

When the question is to estimate the real qualities of either persons or things, we exercise discernment:

Cool age advances venerably wise,

Turns on all hands its deep discerning eyes.—POPE

When it is required to lay open that which art or cunning has concealed, we must exercise penetration; 'A penetration into the abstruse difficulties and depths of modern algebra and fluxions, is not worth the labour of those who design either of the three learned professions.'—WATTS. When the question is to determine the proportions and degrees of qualities in persons or things, we must use discrimination; 'A satire should expose nothing but what is corrigible, and make a due discrimination between those who are, and those who are not, proper objects of it.'—ADDISON. When called upon to take any step, or act any part, we must employ the judgement; 'Judgement, a cool and slow faculty, attends not a man in the rapture of poetical composition.'—DENNIS. Discernment is more or less indispensable for every man in private or public station; he who has the most promiscuous dealings with men, has the greatest need of it: penetration is of peculiar importance for princes and statesmen: discrimination is of great utility for commanders, and all who have the power of distributing rewards and punishments: judgement is an absolute requisite for all to whom the execution or management of concerns is intrusted.

REASONABLE, RATIONAL,

Are both derived from the same Latin word ratus, reason, which, from ratus and reor, to think, signifies the thinking faculty.

Reasonable signifies accordant with reason; rational signifies having reason in it: the former is more commonly applied in the sense of right reason, propriety, or fairness; the latter is employed in the original sense of the word reason: hence we term a man reasonable who acts according to the principles of right reason; and a being rational, who is possessed of the rational or reasoning faculty, in distinction from the brutes. It is to be lamented that there are much fewer reasonable than there are rational creatures. The same distinction exists between them when applied to things; 'A law may be reasonable in itself, although a man does not allow it, or does not know the reason of the lawgivers.'—SWIFT. 'The evidence which is afforded for a future state is sufficient for a rational ground of conduct.'—BLAIR.

* Vide Abbe Girard. "Discernement, judgement"

MENTAL, INTELLECTUAL.

There is the same difference between mental and intellectual as between mind and intellect: the mind comprehends the thinking faculty in general with all its operations; the intellect includes only that part of it which consists in understanding and judgement: mental is therefore opposed to corporeal; intellectual is opposed to sensual or physical: mental exertions are not to be expected from all; intellectual enjoyments fall to the lot of comparatively few.

Objects, pleasures, pains, operations, gifts, &c. are denominated mental: 'To collect and reposit the various forms of things is far the most pleasing part of mental occupation.'—JOHNSON. Subjects, conversation, pursuits, and the like, are entitled intellectual;

Man's more divine, the master of all these,
Lord of the wide world, and wide wat'ry seas,
Endued with intellectual sense and soul.

SHAKESPEARE.

It is not always easy to distinguish our mental pleasures from those corporeal pleasures which we enjoy in common with the brutes; the latter are however greatly heightened by the former in whatever degree they are blended: in a society of well-informed persons the conversation will turn principally on intellectual subjects.

MEMORY, REMEMBRANCE, RECOLLECTION, REMINISCENCE.

Memory, in Latin memoria or memor, Greek μνήσις and μνῆσις, comes, in all probability, from μῆνός, the mind, because memory is the principal faculty of the mind; remembrance, from the verb remember, contracted from re and memore, to bring back to the mind, is a verbal substantive, denoting the exercise of that faculty; recollection, from recollect, compounded of re and collect, signifies collecting again, i. e. carefully, and from different quarters by an effort of the memory; reminiscence, in Latin reminiscentia, from reminiscor and memor, is the bringing back to the mind what was there before.

Memory is the power of recalling images once made on the mind; remembrance, recollection, and reminiscence, are operations or exertions of this power, which vary in their mode.

The memory is a power which exerts itself either independently of the will, or in conformity with the will; but all the other terms express the acts of conscious agents, and consequently are more or less connected with the will. In dreams the memory exerts itself, but we should not say that we have then any remembrance or recollection of objects.

Remembrance is the exercise of memory in a conscious agent; it is the calling a thing back to the mind which has been there before, but has passed away;

'Forgetfulness is necessary to remembrance.'—JOHNSON. This may be the effect of repetition or habit, as in the case of a child who remembers his lesson after having learned it several times; or of a horse who remembers the road which he has been continually passing; or it may be the effect of association and circumstances, by which images are casually brought back to the mind, as happens to intelligent beings continually as they exercise their thinking faculties;

Remember thee!

Ah, thou poor ghost, while memory holds a seat
In this distracted globe.—SHAKESPEARE.

In these cases remembrance is an involuntary act; for things return to the mind before one is aware of it, as in the case of one who hears a particular name, and remembers that he has to call on a person of the same name; or of one who, on seeing a particular tree, remembers all the circumstances of his youth which were connected with a similar tree.

Remembrance is however likewise a voluntary act, and the consequence of a direct determination, as in the case of a child who strives to remember what it has been told by its parent; or of a friend who remembers the hour of meeting another friend in consequence of the interest which it has excited in his mind: nay indeed experience teaches us that scarcely any thing in ordinary cases is more under the subservience of the will than the memory; for it is now become almost a maxim to say, that one may remember whatever one wishes.

The power of memory, and the simple exercise of that power in the act of remembering, are possessed in common, though in different degrees by man and brute; but recollection and reminiscence are exercises of the memory that are connected with the higher faculties of man, his judgement and understanding. To remember is to call to mind that which has once been presented to the mind; but to recollect is to remember afresh, to remember what has been remembered before. Remembrance busies itself with objects that are at hand; recollection carries us back to distant periods: simple remembrance is engaged in things that have but just left the mind, which are more or less easily to be recalled, and more or less faithfully to be represented; but recollection tries to retrace the faint images of things that have been so long unthought of as to be almost obliterated from the memory. In this manner we are said to remember in one half hour what was told us in the preceding half hour, or to remember what passes from one day to another; but we recollect the incidents of childhood; we recollect what happened in our native place after many years' absence from it. The remembrance is that homely every-day exercise of the memory which renders it of essential service in the acquirement of knowledge, or in the performance of one's duties; 'Memory may be assisted by method, and the decays of knowledge repaired by stated times of recollection.'—JOHNSON. The recollection is that exalted exercise of the memory which affords us the purest of enjoyments, and serves the noblest of purposes; the recollection of all the minute incidents of childhood is a more sincere pleasure than any which the present moment can afford.

Reminiscence, if it deserve any notice as a word of English use, is altogether an abstract exercise of the memory, which is employed on purely intellectual ideas in distinction from those which are awakened by sensible objects; the mathematician makes use of reminiscence in deducing unknown truths from those which he already knows; 'Reminiscence is the retrieving a thing at present forgot, or confusedly remembered, by setting the mind to hunt over all its notions.'—SOUTH.

Reminiscence among the disciples of Socrates was the remembrance of things purely intellectual, or of that natural knowledge which the souls had had before their union with the body; while the memory was exercised upon sensible things, or that knowledge which was acquired through the medium of the senses; therefore the Latins said that reminiscentia belonged exclusively to man, because it was purely intellectual, but that memory was common to all animals, because it was merely the depot of the senses; but this distinction, from what has been before observed, is only preserved as it respects the meaning of reminiscence.

Memory is a generic term, as has been already shown: it includes the common idea of reviving former impressions, but does not qualify the nature of the ideas revived: the term is however extended in its application to signify not merely a power, but also a seat or resting place, as is likewise remembrance and recollection; but still with this difference, that the memory is spacious, and contains every thing; the remembrance and recollection are partial, and comprehend only passing events: we treasure up knowledge in our memory; the occurrences of the preceding year are still fresh in our remembrance or recollection.

FORGETFULNESS, OBLIVION.

Forgetfulness characterizes the person, or that which is personal; oblivion the state of the thing: the former refers to him who forgets; 'I have read in ancient authors invitations to lay aside care and anxiety, and give a loose to that pleasing forgetfulness wherein men put off their characters of business.'—STEELE. The latter to that which is forgotten;

O'er all the rest, an undistinguished crew,
Her wing of deepest shade oblivion drew.—FALCONER

We blame a person for his forgetfulness; but we sometimes bury things in oblivion.

FANCY, IMAGINATION.

Fancy, considered as a power, simply brings the object to the mind, or makes it appear, from the Latin phantasia, and the Greek φαντασία and φάντα appear; but imagination, from image, in Latin imago, or imago, or imitatio, is a power which presents the images or likenesses of things. The fancy, therefore, only employs itself about things without regarding their nature; but the imagination aims at tracing a resemblance, and getting a true copy;

And as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shape.—SHAKESPEARE.

The fancy consequently forms combinations, either real or unreal, as chance may direct; but the imagination is seldom led astray. The fancy is busy in dreams, or when the mind is in a disordered state;

There was a certain lady of thin airy shape, who was very active in this solemnity: her name was Fancy.—ADDISON. But the imagination is supposed to act when the intellectual powers are in full play. The fancy is employed on light and trivial objects, which are present to the senses; the imagination soars above all worldly objects, and carries us from the world of matter into the world of spirits, from time present to the time to come. A milliner or mantua-maker may employ her fancy in the decorations of a cap or gown;

Philosophy! I say, and call it He;
For whatso'er the painter's fancy be,
It a male virtue seems to me.—COWLEY.

But the poet's imagination depicts every thing grand, every thing bold, and every thing remote; 'Whatever be his subject, Milton never fails to fill the imagination.'—JOHNSON.

Although Mr. Addison has thought proper, for his convenience, to use the words fancy and imagination promiscuously when writing on this subject, yet the distinction, as above pointed out, has been observed both in familiar discourse and in writing. We say that we fancy, not that we imagine, that we see or hear something; the pleasures of the imagination, not of the fancy.

IDEA, THOUGHT, IMAGINATION.

Idea, in Latin idea, Greek eîdeîn, signifies the form or image of an object, from eîdeîn to see, that is, the thing seen in the mind. Thought literally signifies the thing thought, and imagination the thing imagined.

The idea is the simple representation of an object; the thought is the reflection; and the imagination is the combination of ideas: we have ideas of the sun, the moon, and all material objects; we have thoughts on moral subjects; we have imaginings drawn from the ideas already existing in the mind. The ideas are formed; they are the rude materials with which the thinking faculty exerts itself: the thoughts arise in the mind by means of association, or recur in the mind by the power of the memory; they are the materials with which the thinking faculty employs itself: the imaginings are created by the mind's reaction on itself; they are the materials with which the understanding seeks to enrich itself.

The word idea is not only the most general in sense, but the most universal in application; thought and imagination are particular terms used only in connexion with the agent thinking or imagining. All these words have therefore a distinct office, in which they cannot properly be confounded with each other. Idea is used in all cases for the mental representation, abstractedly from the agent that represents them: hence ideas are either clear or distinct; ideas are attached to words; ideas are analyzed, confounded, and the like; in which cases the word thought could not be substituted; Every one finds that many of the ideas which he desired to retain have slipped away irretrievably.—JOHNSON. The thought belongs only to thinking and rational beings: the brutes may be said to have ideas, but not thoughts: hence thoughts are either mean, fine, grovelling, or sublime, according to the nature of the mind in which they exist:

The warring passions, and tumultuous thoughts
That rage within thee!—ROWE.

Hence we say with more propriety, to indulge a thought, than to indulge an idea; to express one's thoughts, rather than one's ideas, on any subject: although the latter term idea, on account of its comprehensive use, may with a violation of any express rule be indifferently employed in general discourse for thought; but the former term does not on this account lose its characteristic meaning.

The imagination is not only the fruit of thought, but of peculiar thought: the thought may be another's; the imagination is one's own: the thought occurs and recurs; it comes and it goes; it is retained or rejected at the pleasure of the thinking being: the imagination is framed by special desire; it is cherished with the partiality of a parent for its offspring. The thoughts are busied with the surrounding objects; the imaginings are employed on distant and strange objects; hence the thoughts are denominated sober, chaste, and the like; the imaginings, wild and extravagant. The thoughts engage the mind as circumstances give rise to them; they are always supposed to have a foundation in some thing; the imaginings, on the other hand, are often the mere fruit of a disordered brain; they are always regarded as unsubstantial, if not unreal; they frequently owe their origin to the suggestions of the appetites and passions; whence they are termed the imaginings of the heart: 'Different climates produce in men, by a different mixture of the humours, a different and unequal course of imaginings and passions.'—TEMPLE.

IDEAL, IMAGINARY.

Ideal does not strictly adhere to the sense of its primitive idea (v. Idea): the idea is the representation of a real object in the mind; but ideal signifies belonging to the idea independent of the reality or the external object. Imaginary preserves the signification of its primitive imagination (v. Fancy, also v. Idea), as denoting what is created by the mind itself.

The ideal is not directly opposed to, but abstracted from, the reality; 'There is not, perhaps, in all the stores of ideal anguish, a thought more painful than the consciousness of having propagated corruption.'—JOHNSON. The imaginary, on the other hand, is directly opposed to the reality; it is the unreal thing formed by the imagination; 'Superior beings know well the vanity of those imaginary perfections that swell the heart of man.'—ADDISON. Ideal happiness is the happiness which is formed in the mind, without having any direct and actual prototype in nature; but it may, nevertheless, be something possible to be realized; it may be above nature, but not in direct contradiction to it: the imaginary is that which is opposite to some positive existing reality; the pleasure which a lunatic derives from the conceit of being a king is altogether imaginary.

INHERENT, INBRED, INBORN, INNATE.

The inherent, from hæreo to stick, denotes a permanent quality or property, as opposed to that which is adventitious and transitory. Inbred denotes that property which is derived principally from habit or by a gradual process, as opposed to the one acquired by actual efforts. Inborn denotes that which is purely natural, in opposition to the artificial. Inherent is in its sense the most general; for what is inbred and inborn is naturally inherent; but all is not inbred and inborn which is inherent. Inanimate objects have inherent properties; but the inbred and inborn exist only in that which receives life; solidity is an inherent, but not an inbred or inborn property of matter: a love of truth is an inborn property of the human mind: it is consequently inherent, in as much as nothing can totally destroy it;

When my new mind had no infusion known,
Thou gav'st so deep a tincture of thine own,
That ever since I vainly try
To wash away th' inherent dye.—COWLEY.

That which is inbred is bred or nurtured in us from our birth; hence, likewise, the properties of animals are inbred in them, in as much as they are derived through the medium of the breed of which the parent partakes, that which is inborn is simply born in us: a property may be inborn, but not inbred; it cannot, however, be inbred and not inborn. Habits which are ingrafted into the natural disposition are properly inbred; whence the vulgar proverb that 'what is bred in the bone will never be out of the flesh;' to denote the influence which parents have on the characters of their children, both physically and morally;

But he, my inbred enemy,
Forth issu'd, brandishing his fatal dart,
Made to destroy; I fled, and cry'd out death!
MILTON.

Propensities, on the other hand, which are totally independent of education or external circumstances, are properly inborn, as an inborn love of freedom;

Despair and secret shame, and conscious thought
Of inborn worth, his lab'ring soul oppress'd.
DRYDEN.

Inborn and innate, from the Latin natus born, are precisely the same in meaning, yet they differ somewhat in application. Poetry and the grave style have adopted inborn; philosophy has adopted innate: genius is inborn in some men; nobleness is inborn in others: there is an inborn talent in some men to command, and an inborn fitness in others to obey. Mr. Locke and his followers are pleased to say, there is no such thing as innate ideas; and if they only mean that there are no sensible impressions on the soul, until it is acted upon by external objects, they may be right: but if they mean to say that there are no inborn characters or powers in the soul, which predispose it for the reception of certain impressions, they contradict the experience of the learned and the unlearned in all ages, who believe, and that from close observation on themselves and others, that man has, from his birth, not only the general character, which belongs to him in common with his species, but also those peculiar characteristics which distinguish individuals from their earliest infancy: all these characters or characteristics are, therefore, not supposed to be produced, but elicited, by circumstances; and the ideas, which are but the sensible forms that the soul assumes in its connexion with the body, are, on that account, in vulgar language termed innate;

Grant these inventions of the crafty priest,
Yet such inventions never could subsist,
Unless some glimmerings of a future state
Were with the mind coeval and innate.

JENYNS.

TO CONCEIVE, APPREHEND, SUPPOSE, IMAGINE.

To conceive, from the Latin conscipio, or con and capio to put together, is to put an image together in the mind, or to form an idea; to apprehend, from apprehendo to lay hold of, is to seize with the understanding; to suppose, in French supposer, Latin supponi, perfect of suppono, or sub and pono to put one thing in the place of another, is to have one thing in one's mind in lieu of another; to imagine, in French imaginer, Latin imagino, from imago an image, signifies to reflect as an image or phantom in the mind.

Conceive, in the strict sense of the word, is the generic, the others the specific terms: since in apprehending, imagining, and supposing, we always conceive or form an idea, but not vice versa; the difference consists in the mode and object of the action: we conceive of things as proper or improper, and just or unjust, right or wrong, good or bad, this is an act of the judgement; 'Conceive of things clearly and distinctly in their own natures; conceive of things completely in all their own parts; conceive of things comprehensively in all their properties and relations; conceive of things extensively in all their kinds; conceive of things orderly, or in a proper method.'—WATTS. We apprehend the meaning of another; this is by the power of simple perception;

Yet this I apprehend not, why to those Among whom God will deign to dwell on earth
So many and so various laws are given.—MILTON.

Apprehension is considered by logicians as the first power or operation of the mind being employed on the simplest objects; 'Simple apprehension denotes no more than the soul's naked intellection of an object, without either composition or deduction.'—GLANVILLE.

Conceiving is applied to objects of any magnitude which are not above the stretch of human power;

O, what avails me now that honour high
To have conceived of God, or that salute
Hail highly favour'd, among women blest.—MILTON.

Apprehending is a momentary or sudden act;

I nam'd them as they pass'd, and understood
Their nature, with such knowledge God induc'd
My sudden apprehension.—MILTON.

Conceiving, which is a process of nature, is often slow and gradual, as to conceive a design; 'This man conceived the duke's death, but what was the motive of that felonious conception is in the clouds.'—WOLTON.

What is conceived, is conclusive or at least determinate; 'A state of innocence and happiness is so remote from all that we have ever seen, that although we can easily conceive it is possible, yet our speculations upon it must be general and confused.'—JOHNSON. What is apprehended may be dubious or indeterminate: hence the term apprehend is taken in the sense of fear;

Nothing is a misery,

Unless our weakness apprehend it so.

Conceive and apprehend are exercises of the understanding; suppose and imagine of the imagination; but the former commonly rests on some ground of reality, the latter may be the mere offspring of the brain. Suppose is used in opposition to positive knowledge; no person supposes that, of which he is positively informed; 'It can scarce be supposed that the mind is more vigorous when we sleep, than when we are awake.'—HAWKSWORTH. Imagine is employed for that which, in all probability, does not exist; we shall not imagine what is evident and undeniable; 'The Earl of Rivers did not imagine there could exist, in a human form, a mother that would ruin her own son without enriching herself.'—JOHNSON (Life of Savage).

TO CONCEIVE, UNDERSTAND, COMPREHEND.

These terms indicate the intellectual operations of forming ideas, that is, ideas of the complex kind in distinction from the simple ideas formed by the act of perception. To conceive, is to put together in the mind; to understand, is to stand under, or near to the mind; to comprehend, from the Latin com or cum and prehendo to take, signifies to seize or embrace in the mind.

Conception is the simplest operation of the three; when we conceive we may have but one idea, when we understand or comprehend we have all the ideas which the subject is capable of presenting. We cannot understand or comprehend without conceiving; but we may often conceive that which we neither understand nor comprehend; 'Whatever they cannot immediately conceive they consider as too high to be reached, or too extensive to be comprehended.'—JOHNSON.

That which we cannot conceive is to us nothing; but the conception of it gives it an existence, at least in our minds; but understanding or comprehending is not essential to the belief of a thing's existence. So long as we have reasons sufficient to conceive a thing as possible or probable, it is not necessary either to understand or comprehend them in order to authorize our belief. The mysteries of our holy religion are objects of conception, but not of comprehension;

Our finite knowledge cannot comprehend

The principles of an abounded away.—SHIRLEY.

We conceive that a thing may be done without understanding how it is done; we conceive that a thing may exist without comprehending the nature of its existence. We conceive clearly, understand fully, comprehend minutely.

Conception is a species of invention; it is the fruit of the mind's operation within itself; 'If, by a more noble and more adequate conception that be considered as wit which is at once natural and new, that which, though not obvious, is, upon its first production, acknowledged to be just; if it be that, which he that never found it, wonders how he missed; to wit of this kind the metaphysical poets have seldom risen.'—JOHNSON. Understanding and comprehension are employed solely on external objects; we understand and comprehend that which actually exists before us, and presents itself to our observation; 'Swift pays no court to the passions; he excites neither surprise nor admiration; he always understands himself, and his readers always understand him."—JOHNSON. Conceiving is the office of the imagination, as well as the judgement; understanding and comprehension are the office of the reasoning faculties exclusively.

* Conceiving is employed with regard to matters of taste, to arrangements, designs, and projects; understanding is employed on familiar objects which present themselves in the ordinary discourse and business of men; comprehending respects principles, lessons, and speculative knowledge in general. The artist conceives a design, and he who will execute it must understand it; the poet conceives that which is grand and sublime, and he who will enjoy the perusal of his conceptions must have refinement of mind, and capacity to comprehend the grand and sublime. The builder conceives plans, the scholar understands languages, the metaphysician comprehends subtle questions.

A ready conception supplies us with a stock of ideas on all subjects; a quick understanding catches the intentions of others with half a word; a penetrating mind comprehends the abstruse points. There are human beings involved in such profound ignorance, that they cannot conceive of the most ordinary things that exist in civilized life: there are those who, though slow at understanding words, will be quick at understanding looks and signs; and there are others who, though dull at conceiving or understanding common matters, will have a power for comprehending the abstruser parts of the mathematics.

CONCEPTION, NOTION.

Conception, from conceive (v. To conceive), signifies the thing conceived; notion, in French notion, Latin notio, from notus participle of nosco to know, signifies the thing known.

Conception is the mind's own work, what it pictures to itself from the exercise of its own powers; 'Words signify not immediately and primely things themselves, but the conceptions of the mind concerning things.'—SOUTH. Notion is the representation of objects as they are drawn from observation; 'The story of Telemachus is formed altogether in the spirit of Homer, and will give an unlearned reader a notion of that great poet's manner of writing.'—ADDISON. Conceptions are the fruit of the imagination; 'It is natural for the imaginations of men who lead their lives in too solitary a manner to prey upon themselves, and form from their own conceptions beings and things which have no place in nature.'—STEELE. Notions are the result of reflection and experience; 'Considering that the happiness of the other world is to be the happiness of the whole man, who can question, but there is an infinite variety in those pleasures we are speaking of? Revelation, likewise, very much confirms this notion under the different views it gives us of our future happiness.'—ADDISON. Conceptions are formed; notions are entertained. Conceptions are either grand or mean, gross or sublime, either clear or indistinct, crude or distinct; notions are either true or false, just or absurd. Intellectual culture serves to elevate the conceptions; the extension of knowledge serves to correct and refine the notions.

Some heathen philosophers had an indistinct conception of the Deity, whose attributes and character are unfolded to us in his revelation: the ignorant have often false notions of their duty and obligations to their superiors. The unenlightened express their gross and crude conceptions of a Superiour Being by some material and visible object: the vulgar notion of ghosts and spirits is not entirely banished from the most cultivated parts of England.

PERCEPTION, IDEA, CONCEPTION, NOTION.

Perception expresses either the act of perceiving or the impression produced by that act; in this latter sense it is analogous to an idea (v. Idea). The impression of an object that is present to us is termed a perception; the revival of that impression, when the object is removed, is an idea. A combination of ideas by which any image is presented to the mind is a con- ception (v. To comprehend); the association of two or more ideas, so as to constitute it a decision, is a notion. Perceptions are clear or confused, according to the state of the sensible organs, and the perceptive faculty. Ideas are faint or vivid, vague or distinct, according to the nature of the perception, conceptions are gross or refined according to the number and extent of one's ideas; notions are true or false, correct or incorrect, according to the extent of one's knowledge. The perception which we have of remote objects is sometimes so indistinct as to leave hardly any traces of the image on the mind; we have in that case a perception, but not an idea.

What can the fondest mother wish for more,
Ev'n for her darling son, than solid sense,
Perceptions clear, and flowing eloquence.—WYNNIE.

If we read the description of any object, we may have an idea of it; but we need not have any immediate perception: the idea in this case being complex, and formed of many images of which we have already had a perception; 'Imagination selects ideas from the treasures of remembrance.'—JOHNSON.

If we present objects to our minds, according to different images which have already been impressed, we are said to have a conception of them: in this case, however, it is not necessary for the objects really to exist; they may be the offspring of the mind's operation within itself; 'It is not a head that is filled with extravagant conceptions, which is capable of furnishing the world with diversions of this nature (from humour).'
—ADDISON. But with regard to notions it is different, for they are formed respecting objects that do really exist, although perhaps the properties or circumstances which we assign to them are not real; 'Those notions which are to be collected by reason, in opposition to the senses, will seldom stand forward in the mind, but be treasured in the remoter repositories of the memory.'—JOHNSON. If I look at the moon, I have a perception of it; if it disappear from my sight, and the impression remains, I have an idea of it; if an object, differing in shape and colour from that or any thing else which I may have seen, present itself to my mind, it is a conception; if of this moon I conceive that it is no bigger than what it appears to my eye, this is a notion, which in the present instance, assigns an unreal property to a real object.

TO THINK, SUPPOSE, IMAGINE, BELIEVE, DEEM.

To think, in Saxon thincan, German denken, &c. from the Hebrew יָרַךְ to rule or judge, is the generic term. It expresses, in common with the other terms, the act of having a particular idea in the mind; but it is indefinite as to the mode and the object of the action. To think may be the act of the understanding, or merely of the imagination: to suppose and imagine are rather the acts of the imagination than of the understanding. To think, that is, to have any thought or opinion upon a subject, requires reflection; it is the work of time;

If to conceive how any thing can be
From shape extracted, and locality,
Is hard: what think you of the Deity?—JENYNS.

To suppose and imagine may be the acts of the moment. We think a thing right or wrong; we suppose it to be true or false; 'It is absurd to suppose that while the relations, in which we stand to our fellow-creatures, naturally call forth certain sentiments and affections, there should be none to correspond to the first and greatest of all beings.'—BLAIR. We imagine it to be real or unreal. To think is employed promiscuously in regard to all objects, whether actually existing or not: to suppose applies to those which are uncertain or precarious; imagine, to those which are unreal; 'How ridiculous must it be to imagine that the clergy of England favour popery, when they cannot be clergymen without renouncing it.'—BEVERIDGE. Think and imagine are said of that which affects the senses immediately; suppose is only said of that which occupies the mind. We think that we hear a noise as soon as the sound catches our attention; in certain states of the body or mind we imagine we hear noises which were never made: we think that a person will come to-day, because he has informed us that he intends to do so; we suppose that he will come to-day, at a certain hour, because he came at the same hour yesterday.

When applied to the events and circumstances of life, to think may be applied to any time, past, present, or to come, or where no time is expressed: to suppose is more apply applied to a future time; and imagine to a past or present time. We think that a person has done a thing, is doing it, or will do it; we suppose that he will do it; we imagine that he has done it, or is doing it. A person thinks that he will die; imagines that he is in a dangerous way; we think that the weather will be fine to-day, we suppose that the affair will be decided.

In regard to moral points, in which case the word deem may be compared with the others; to think is a conclusion drawn from certain premises. I think that a man has acted wrong: to suppose is to take up an idea arbitrarily or at pleasure; we argue upon a supposed case, merely for the sake of argument: to imagine is to take up an idea by accident, or without any connexion with the truth or reality; we imagine that a person is offended with us, without being able to assign a single reason for the idea; imaginary evils are even more numerous than those which are real: to deem is to form a conclusion; things are deemed hurtful or otherwise in consequence of observation; 'An empty house is by the players deemed the most dreadful sign of popular disapprobation.'—HAWKSWORTH.

To think and believe are both opposite to knowing or perceiving; but to think is a more partial action than to believe; we think as the thing strikes us at the time; we believe from a settled deduction: hence, it expresses much less to say that I think a person speaks the truth, than that I believe that he speaks the truth; For they can conquer who believe they can.—DRYDEN.

I think, from what I can recollect, that such and such were the words, is a vague mode of speech, not admissible in a court of law as positive evidence: the natural question which follows upon this is, do you firmly believe it? to which, whoever can answer in the affirmative, with the appearance of sincerity, must be admitted as a testimony. Hence it arises, that the word can only be employed in matters that require but little thought in order to come to a conclusion; and believe is applicable to things that must be admitted only on substantial evidence. We are at liberty to say that I think, or I believe, that the account is made out right; but we must say, that I believe, not think, that the Bible is the word of God.

TO THINK, REFLECT, PONDER, MUSE.

Think, in Saxon thincan, German denken, &c., comes from the Hebrew חָשַׁב , to direct, rule, or judge; reflect, in Latin reflecto, signifies literally to bend back, that is, to bend the mind back on itself; ponder, from pondus a weight, signifies to weigh; muse, from musa, a song, signifies to dwell upon with the imagination.

To think is a general and indefinite term; to reflect is a particular mode of thinking; to ponder and muse are different modes of reflecting, the former on grave matters, the latter on matters that interest either the affections or the imagination: we think whenever we receive or recall an idea to the mind; but we reflect only by recalling, not one only, but many ideas: we think if we only suffer the ideas to revolve in succession in the mind: but in reflecting we compare, combine, and judge of those ideas which thus pass in the mind: we think, therefore, of things past, as they are pleasurable or otherwise; we reflect upon them as they are applicable to our present condition: we may think on things past, present, or to come; we reflect, ponder, and muse mostly on that which is past or present. The man thinks on the days of his childhood, and wishes them back; the child thinks on the time when he shall be a man, and is impatient until it is come; 'No man was ever weary of thinking, much less of thinking that he had done well or virtuously.'—SOUTH. A man reflects on his past follies, and tries to profit by experience; 'Let men but reflect upon their own observation, and consider impartially with themselves how few in the world they have known made better by age.'—SOUTH. One ponders on any serious concern that affects his destiny;

Stood on the brink of hell, and look'd awhile,
Pond'ring his voyage.—MILTON.

One muses on the happy events of his childhood; I was sitting on a sofa one evening, after I had been caressed by Amurath, and my imagination kindled as I mused.—HAWKSWORTH.

TO CONTEMPLATE, MEDITATE, MUSE.

Contemplate, in Latin contemplatus, participle of contemplari, probably comes from templum the temple, that being the place most fitted for contemplation. Meditate, in Latin meditatus, participle of meditari, is probably changed from meditor, in Greek $\mu\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\tau\acute{o}\omega$, to modulate, or attune the thoughts, as sounds are harmonized. Muse is derived from musa, owing to the connexion between the harmony of a song, and the harmony of the thoughts in musings.

Different species of reflection are marked by these terms.

We contemplate what is present or before our eyes; we meditate on what is past or absent; we muse on what is present or past.

The heavens, and all the works of the Creator, are objects of contemplation; 'I sincerely wish myself with you to contemplate the wonders of God in the firmament, rather than the madness of man on the earth.'—POPE. The ways of Providence are fit subjects for meditation; 'But a very small part of the moments spent in meditation on the past, produce any reasonable caution or salutary sorrow.'—JOHNSON. One muses on the events or circumstances which have been just passing.

We may contemplate and meditate for the future, but never muse. In this case the two former terms have the sense of contriving or purposing: what is contemplated to be done, is thought of more indistinctly than when it is meditated to be done: many things are had in contemplation which are never seriously meditated upon; 'Life is the immediate gift of God, a right inherent by nature in every individual, and it begins in contemplation of law as soon as an infant is able to stir in the mother's womb.'—BLACKSTONE. Between contemplating and meditating there is often a greater difference than between meditating and executing;

Thus plung'd in ills and meditating more,
The people's patience, tried, no longer bore
The raging monster.—DRYDEN.

Contemplation may be a temporary action directed to a single object: 'There is not any property or circumstances of my being that I contemplate with more joy than my immortality.'—BARKLEY. Meditating is a permanent and serious action directed to several objects; 'Meditate till you make some act of piety upon the occasion of what you meditate, either get some new arguments against sin, or some new encouragement to virtue.'—TAYLOR. Musing is partial and unimportant: meditation is a religious duty, it cannot be neglected without injury to a person's spiritual improvement; musing is a temporary employment of the mind on the ordinary concerns of life, as they happen to excite an interest for the time;

Musing as went on this and that,
Such trifles as I know not what.—FRANCIS.

Contemplative and musing, as epithets, have a strong analogy to each other.

Contemplative is a habit of the mind; musing is a particular state of the mind. A person may have a contemplative turn, or be in a musing mood.

TO CONSIDER, REFLECT.

Consider, in French considerer, Latin considero, a factative, from consido to sit down, signifies to make to settle in the mind. Reflect, in Latin reflecto, compounded of re and flecto, signifies to turn back, or upon itself, after the manner of the mind.

The operation of thought is expressed by these two words, but it varies in the circumstances of the action.

Consideration is employed for practical purposes, reflection for matters of speculation or moral improvement. Common objects call for consideration; the workings of the mind itself, or objects purely spiritual occupy reflection. It is necessary to consider what is proper to be done, before we take any step; 'It seems necessary, in the choice of persons for greater employments, to consider their bodies as well as their minds, and ages and health as well as their abilities.'—TEMPLE. It is consistent with our natures, as rational beings, to reflect on what we are, what we ought to be, and what we shall be; 'Whoever reflects frequently on the uncertainty of his own duration, will find out that the state of others is not more permanent than his own.'—JOHNSON.

Without consideration we shall naturally commit the most flagrant errors; without reflection we shall never understand our duty to our Maker, our neighbour, and ourselves.

TO CONSIDER, REGARD.

To consider (v. To consider) signifies to take a view of a thing in the mind, which is the result of thought; to regard is literally to look back upon, from the French regarder, that is, re and garder, to keep or watch, which is derived from the old German wahren to see, of which there are still traces in the words bewahren to guard against, warten to wait, and the English to be aware of.

There is more caution or thought in considering; more personal interest in regarding. A man may consider his reputation so as to be deterred from taking a particular step; if he regards his reputation, this regard has a general influence on all he does. 'The king had not, at that time, one person about him of his council, who had the least consideration of his own honour, or friendship for those who sat at the helm of affairs, the Duke of Lennox excepted.'—CLARENDON.

If much you note him,
You offend him; feed and regard him not.

SHAKESPEARE.

A similar distinction exists between these words when not expressly personal: to consider a thing in a certain light, is to take a steady view of it; 'I consider the soul of man as the ruin of a glorious pile of buildings.'—STEELE. To regard a thing is to view it with a certain interest; 'I regard trade not only as highly advantageous to the commonwealth in general, but as the most natural and likely method of making a man's fortune.'—BUDGEELL.

CONSIDERATION, REASON.

Consideration, or that which enters into a person's consideration, has a reference to the person considering. Reason, or that which influences the reason, is taken absolutely: considerations are therefore for the most part partial, as affecting particular interests, or dependent on particular circumstances. 'He had been made general upon very partial, and not enough deliberated considerations.'—CLARENDON.*

Reasons on the contrary may be general, and vary according to the nature of the subject; 'The reasons assigned in a law of the 36th year of Edward III. for having pleas and judgements in the English tongue, might have been urged for having the laws themselves in that language.'—TYRWHITT.

When applied to matters of practice the consideration influences the particular actions of an individual or individuals; no consideration of profit or emolument should induce a person to forfeit his word; 'He was obliged, antecedent to all other considerations, to search an asylum.'—DRYDEN.

The reason influences a line of conduct; the reasons which men assign for their conduct are often as absurd as they are false;

I mask the business from the common eye
For sundry weighty reasons.—SHAKESPEARE.

In the same manner, when applied to matters of theory, the consideration is that which enters into a man's consideration, or which he offers to the consideration of others; 'The folly of ascribing temporal punishments to any particular crimes, may appear from several considerations.'—ADDISON. The reason is that which flows out of the nature of the thing; 'If it be natural, ought we not rather to conclude that there is some ground or reason for those fears, and that nature hath not planted them in us to no purpose?'—TILLOTSON.

TO ARGUE, EVINCE, PROVE.

To argue, from the Latin arguo, and the Greek ἀργός, clear, signifies to make clear; to evince, in Latin evinco, compounded of vinco to prove or make out, and e forth, signifies to bring to light, to make to appear clear; to prove, in French prover, in Latin probo, from probus good, signifies to make good, or make to appear good.

These terms in general convey the idea of evidence, but with gradations: argue denotes the smallest degree, and prove the highest degree. To argue is to serve as an indication amounting to probability; to evince denotes an indication so clear as to remove doubt; to prove marks an evidence so positive as to produce conviction.

It argues a want of candour in any man to conceal circumstances in his statement which are any ways calculated to affect the subject in question; 'It is not the being singular, but being singular for something, that argues either extraordinary endowments of nature or benevolent intentions to mankind, which draws the admiration and esteem of the world.'—BERKELEY. The tenour of a person's conversation may evince the refinement of his mind and the purity of his taste; 'The nature of the soul itself, and particularly its immateriality, has, I think, been evinced almost to a demonstration.'—ADDISON. When we see men sacrificing their peace of mind and even their integrity of character to ambition, it proves to us how important it is even in early life to check this natural, and in some measure laudable, but still insinuating and dangerous passion;

What object, what event the moon beneath,
But argues or endears an after-scene?
To reason proves, or weds it to desire?—YOUNG

ARGUMENT, REASON, PROOF.

Argument, from argue (v. To argue), signifies either the thing that argues, or that which is brought forward in arguing: reason, in French raison, Latin ratio, from ratio, participle of reor to think, signifies the thing thought or estimated in the mind by the power of reason; proof, from to prove, signifies the thing that proves.

An argument serves for defence; a reason for justification; a proof for conviction. Arguments are adduced in support of an hypothesis or proposition; 'When the arguments press equally on both sides in matters that are indifferent to us, the safest method is to give up ourselves to neither.'—ADDISON. Reasons are assigned in matters of belief and practice;

The reasons, with his friend's experience join'd,
Encourag'd much, but more disturb'd his mind.

DRYDEN.

Proofs are collected to ascertain a fact;

One soul in both, whereof good proof
This day affords.—MILTON.

Arguments are either strong or weak; reasons solid or futile; proofs clear and positive, or vague and indefinite. We confute an argument, overpower a reason, and invalidate a proof. Whoever wishes to defend Christianity will be in no want of arguments; 'This, before revelation had enlightened the world, was the very best argument for a future state.'—ATTERBURY. The believer need never be at a loss to give a reason for the hope that is in him; 'Virtue and vice are not arbitrary things, but there is a natural and eternal reason for that goodness and virtue, and against vice and wickedness.'—TILLOTSON. Throughout the whole of Divine revelation there is no circumstance that is substantiated with such irrefragable proofs as the resurrection of our Saviour;

Are there (still more amazing!) who resist
The rising thought, who smother in its birth
The glorious truth, who struggle to be brutes?
Who fight the proofs of immortality?—YOUNG.

CAUSE, REASON, MOTIVE.

Cause is supposed to signify originally the same as case; it means however now, by distinction, the case or thing happening before another as its cause; the reason is the thing that acts on the reason or understanding; the motive, in French motif, from the Latin motus participle of moveo to move, is that which brings into action.

Cause respects the order and connexion of things; reason the movements and operations of the mind; motives the movements of the mind and body. Cause is properly the generic; reason and motive are specific: every reason or motive is a cause, but every cause is not a reason or motive.

Cause is said of all inanimate objects; reason and motive of rational agents: whatever happens in the world, happens from some cause mediate or immediate; the primary or first cause of all, is God; 'The wise and learned among the very heathens themselves, have all acknowledged some first cause, whereupon originally the being of all things dependeth, neither have they otherwise spoken of that cause, than as an agent which, knowing what and why it worketh, observeth in working a most exact order or law.'—HOOKER. Whatever opinions men hold, they ought to be able to assign a substantial reason for them; 'If we commemorate any mystery of our redemption, or article of our faith, we ought to confirm our belief of it by considering all those reasons upon which it is built.'—NELSON. For whatever men do they ought to have a sufficient motive; 'Every principle that is a motive to good actions ought to be encouraged.'—ADDISON.

As the cause gives birth to the effect, so does the reason give birth to the conclusion, and the motive gives birth to the action. Between cause and effect there is a necessary connexion: whatever in the natural world is capable of giving birth to another thing is an adequate cause;

Cut off the causes, and the effects will cease,
And all the moving madness fall to peace.

DRYDEN.

But in the moral world there is not a necessary connexion between reasons and their results, or motives and their actions: the state of the agent's mind is not always such as to be acted upon according to the nature of things; every adequate reason will not be followed by its natural conclusion, for every man will not believe who has reasons to believe, nor yield to the reasons that would lead to a right belief; and every motive will not be accompanied with its corresponding action, for every man will not act who has a motive for acting, nor act in the manner in which his motives ought to dictate: the causes of our diseases often lie as hidden as the reasons of our opinions, and the motives for our actions.

CONCLUSION, INFERENCE, DEDUCTION.

Conclusion, from conclude, and the Latin concludo, or con and cludo to shut up, signifies literally the winding up of all arguments and reasoning; inference, from infer, in Latin infero, signifies what is brought in; deduction, from deduct, in Latin deductus and deduco to bring out, signifies the bringing or drawing one thing from another.

A conclusion is full and decisive; an inference is partial and indecisive: a conclusion leaves the mind in no doubt or hesitation; it puts a stop to all farther reasoning;

I only deal by rules of art,
Such as are lawful, and judge by Conclusions of astrology.—HODIERAS.

Inferences are special conclusions from particular circumstances; they serve as links in the chain of reasoning; 'Though it may chance to be right in the conclusion, it is yet unjust and mistaken in the method of inference.'—GLANVILLE. Conclusion in the logical sense is the concluding proposition in a syllogism, drawn from the two others, which are called the premises, and may each of them be inferences.

Conclusions are drawn from real facts, inferences are drawn from the appearances of things; deductions only from arguments or assertions. Conclusions are practical; inferences ratiocinative; deductions are final.

We conclude from a person's conduct or declarations what he intends to do, or leave undone;

He praises wine, and we conclude from thence
He lik'd his glass, on his own evidence.—ADDISON.

We infer from the appearance of the clouds, or the thickness of the atmosphere, that there will be a heavy fall of rain or snow; 'You might, from the single people departed, make some useful inferences or guesses how many there are left unmarried.'—STEELE. We deduce from a combination of facts, inferences, and assertions, that a story is fabricated; 'There is a consequence which seems very naturally deducible from the foregoing considerations. If the scale of being rises by such a regular progress so high as man, we may by a parity of reason suppose that it still proceeds gradually through those beings which are of a superior nature to him.'—ADDISON. Hasty conclusions betray a want of judgement, or firmness of mind: contrary inferences are frequently drawn from the same circumstances to serve the purposes of party, and support a favourite position; the deductions in such cases are not unfrequently true when the inferences are false.

BELIEF, CREDIT, TRUST, FAITH.

Belief, from believe, in Saxon gelyfan, gelaevan, in German glauben, klauben, &c. comes, in all possibility, from liefe, in German belieben to please, and the Latin libet it pleaseth, signifying the pleasure or assent of the mind. Credit, in French credit, Latin creditus, participle of credo, compounded of cor the heart, and do to give, signifies also giving the heart. Trust is connected with the old word trov, in Saxon treowian, German trauen, old German thraovin, thruwen, &c. to hold true, and probably from the Greek thápeiv to have confidence, signifying to depend upon as true. Faith, in Latin fides, from fido to confide, signifies also dependence upon as true.

Belief is the generic term, the others specific; we believe when we credit and trust, but not always vice versa. Belief rests on no particular person or thing; but credit and trust rest on the authority of one or more individuals. Every thing is the subject of belief, which produces one's assent: the events of human life are credited upon the authority of the narrator: the words, promises, or the integrity of individuals are trusted: the power of persons and the virtue of things are objects of faith.

Belief and credit are particular actions, or sentiments: trust and faith are permanent dispositions of the mind. Things are entitled to our belief; persons are entitled to our credit: but people repose a trust in others; or have a faith in others.

Our belief or unbelief is not always regulated by our reasoning faculties, or the truth of things: we often believe from prejudice and ignorance, things to be true which are very false;

Oh! I've heard him talk

Like the first-born child of love, when every word
Spoke in his eyes, and wept to be belic'd,
And all to ruin me.—SOUTHERN.

With the bulk of mankind, assurance goes further than any thing else in obtaining credit: gross falsehoods, pronounced with confidence, will be credited sooner than plain truths told in an unvarnished style;

Oh! I will credit my Scamandra's tears!

Nor think them drops of chance like other women's.

LEE.

There are no disappointments more severe than those which we feel on finding that we have trusted to men of base principles;

Capricious man! To good or ill inconstant
Too much to fear to trust is equal weakness.

JOHNSON.

Ignorant people have commonly a more implicit faith in any nostrum recommended to them by persons of their own class, than in the prescriptions of professional men regularly educated;

For faith repos'd on seas and on the flatt'ring sky
Thy naked corpse is doomed on shores unknown to lie

DRYDEN.

Belief, trust, and faith have a religious application, which credit has not. Belief is simply an act of the understanding; trust and faith are active moving principles of the mind in which the heart is concerned. Belief does not extend beyond an assent of the mind to any given proposition; trust and faith are lively sentiments which impel to action. Belief is to trust and faith, as cause to effect: there may be belief without either trust or faith: but there can be no trust or faith without belief: we believe that there is a God, who is the creator and preserver of all his creatures; we therefore trust in him for his protection of ourselves: we believe that Jesus Christ died for the sins of men; we have therefore faith in his redeeming grace to save us from our sins.

Belief is common to all religions; 'The Epicureans contented themselves with the denial of a Providence, asserting at the same time the existence of gods in general: because they would not shock the common belief of mankind.'—ADDISON. Trust is peculiar to the believers in Divine revelation; 'What can be a stronger motive to a firm trust and reliance on the mercies of our Maker, than the giving us his Son to suffer for us?'—ADDISON. Faith is employed by distinction for the Christian faith; 'The faith or persuasion of a Divine revelation is a Divine faith, not only with respect to the object of it, but likewise in respect of the author of it, which is the Divine Spirit.'—TILLOTSON. Belief is purely speculative; and trust and faith are operative: the former operates on the mind; the latter on the outward conduct. Trust in God serves to dispel all anxious concern about the future. "Faith," says the Apostle, "is dead without works." Theorists substitute belief for faith; enthusiasts mistake passion for faith. True faith must be grounded on a right belief, and accompanied with a right practice.

FAITH, CREED.

Faith (v. Belief) denotes either the principle of trusting, or the thing trusted; creed, from the Latin credo to believe, denotes the thing believed.

These words are synonymous when taken for the thing trusted in or believed; but they differ in this, that faith has always a reference to the principle in the mind; creed only respects the thing which is the object of faith: the former is likewise taken generally and indefinitely; the latter particularly and definitely, signifying a set form or a code of faith; hence we say, to be of the same faith, or to adopt the same creed. The holy martyrs died for the faith, as it is in Christ Jesus; 'St. Paul affirms that a sinner is at first justified and received into the favour of God, by a sincere profession of the Christian faith.'—TILLOTSON. Every established form of religion will have its peculiar creed. The Church of England has adopted that creed which it considers as containing the purest principles of Christian faith; 'Supposing all the great points of atheism were formed into a kind of creed, I would fain ask whether it would not require an infinitely greater measure of faith than any set of articles which they so violently oppose?'—ADDISON.

CONVICTION, PERSUASION.

Conviction, from convince, denotes either the act of convincing or the state of being convinced; persuasion, which, from the Latin persuadeo, or suadeo, and the Greek hōs, sweet, signifies to make thoroughly agreeable to the taste, expresses likewise the act of persuading, or the state of being persuaded.

What *convince*s binds; what persuades attracts. We convince by arguments; it is the understanding which determines: we are persuaded by entreaties and personal influence; it is the imagination, the passions, or the will which decide. Our conviction respects solely matters of belief or faith; 'When therefore the Apostle requireth ability to convict heretics, can we think he judgeth it a thing unlawful, and not rather needful, to use the principal instrument of their conviction, the light of reason.'—HOOKER. Our persuasion respects matters of belief or practice; 'I should be glad if I could persuade him to write such another critique on any thing of mine, for when he condemns any of my poems, he makes the world have a better opinion of them.'—DRYDEN. We are convinced that a thing is true or false; we are persuaded that it is either right or wrong, advantageous or the contrary. A person will have half effected a thing who is convinced that it is in his power to effect it; he will be easily persuaded to do that which favours his own interests.

Conviction respects our most important duties 'Their wisdom is only of this world, to put false colours upon things, to call good evil, and evil good, against the conviction of their own consciences.'—SWIFT. Persuasion is frequently applied to matters of indifference: 'Philoclea's beauty not only persuaded, but so persuaded that all hearts must yield.'—SIDNEY. The first step to true repentance is a thorough conviction of the enormity of sin. The cure of people's maladies is sometimes promoted to a surprising degree by their persuasion of the efficacy of the remedy.

As conviction is the effect of substantial evidence, it is solid and permanent in its nature; it cannot be so easily changed and deceived; persuasion, depending on our feelings, is influenced by external objects, and exposed to various changes; it may vary both in the degree and in the object. Conviction answers in our minds to positive certainty; persuasion answers to probability.

The practical truths of Christianity demand our deepest conviction; 'When men have settled in themselves a conviction that there is nothing honourable which is not accompanied with innocence; nothing mean but what has guilt in it; riches, pleasures, and honours will easily lose their charms, if they stand between us and our integrity.'—STEELE. Of the speculative truths of Christianity we ought to have a rational persuasion; 'Let the mind be possessed with the persuasion of immortal happiness annexed to the act, and there will be no want of candidates to struggle for the glorious prerogative.'—CUMBERLAND.

The conviction of the truth or falsehood of that which we have been accustomed to condemn or admire cannot be effected without powerful means; but we may be persuaded of the propriety of a thing to-day which to-morrow we shall regard with indifference. We ought to be convinced of the propriety of avoiding every thing which can interfere with the good order of society; we may be persuaded of the truth of a person's narrative or not, according to the representation made to us; we may be persuaded to pursue any study or lay it aside.

UNBELIEF, INFIDELITY, INCREDULITY

Unbelief (v. Belief) respects matters in general; infidelity, from fides faithful, is unbelief as respects Divine revelation; incredulity is unbelief in ordinary matters. Unbelief is taken in an indefinite and negative sense; it is the want of belief in any particular thing that may or may not be believed; infidelity is a more active state of mind; it supposes a violent and total rejection of that which ought to be believed; incredulity is also an active state of mind, in which we oppose a belief to matters that may be rejected. Unbelief does not of itself convey any reproachful meaning; it depends upon the thing disbelieved; we may be unbelievers in indifferent as well as the most important matters; but absolutely taken it means one who disbelieves sacred truths; 'Such a universal acquaintance with things will keep you from an excess of credulity and unbelief; i. e. a readiness to believe or deny every thing at first hearing.'—WATTS. 'One gets by heart a catalogue of title pages and editions; and immediately, to become conspicuous, declares that he is an unbeliever.'—ADDISON.

Infidelity is taken in the worst sense for a blind and senseless perversity in refusing belief; 'Belief and profession will speak a Christian but very faintly, when thy conversation proclaims thee an infidel.'—SOUTH. Incredulity is often a mark of wisdom, and not unfrequently a mark of the contrary; 'I am not altogether incredulous that there may be such candles as are made of salamander's wood, being a kind of mineral which whiteneth in the burning and consumeth not.'—BACON. 'The youth hears all the predictions of the aged with obstinate incredulity.'—JOHNSON. The Jews are unbelievers in the mission of our Saviour; the Turks are infidels, inasmuch as they do not believe in the Bible. Deists and Atheists are likewise infidels, inasmuch as they set themselves up against Divine revelation; well informed people are always incredulous of stories respecting ghosts and apparitions.

DISBELIEF, UNBELIEF

Disbelief properly implies the believing that a thing is not, or refusing to believe that it is. Unbelief expresses properly a believing the contrary of what one has believed before: disbelief is qualified as to its nature by the thing disbelieved. 'The belief or disbelief of a thing does not alter the nature of the thing.'—TILLOTSON. Our disbelief of the idle tales which are told b beggars, is justified by the frequent detection of their falsehood; 'The atheist has not found his post tenable, and is therefore retired into deism, and a disbelief of revealed religion only.'—ADDISON. Our Saviour had compassion on Thomas for his unbelief, and gave him such evidences of his identity, as dissipated every doubt; 'The opposites to faith are unbelief and credulity.'—TILLOTSON.

DOCTRINE, PRECEPT, PRINCIPLE.

Doctrine, in French doctrina, Latin doctrina, from doceo to teach, signifies the thing taught; precept, from the Latin præcipio, signifies the thing laid down; and principle, in French principe, Latin principium, signifies the beginning of things, that is, their first or original component parts.

The doctrine requires a teacher; the precept requires a superior with authority; the principle requires only an illustrator. The doctrine is always framed by some one; the precept is enjoined or laid down by some one; the principle lies in the thing itself. The doctrine is composed of principles; the precept rests upon principles or doctrines. Pythagoras taught the doctrine of the metempsychosis, and enjoined many precepts on his disciples for the regulation of their conduct, particularly that they should abstain from eating animal food, and be only silent hearers for the first five years of their scholarship: the former of these rules depended upon the preceding doctrine of the soul's transmigration to the bodies of animals; the latter rested on that simple principle of education, the entire devotion of the scholar to the master.

We are said to believe in doctrines; to obey precepts; to imbibed or hold principles. The doctrine is that which enters into the composition of our faith; 'To make new articles of faith and doctrine no man thinketh it lawful; new laws of government what church or commonwealth is there which maketh not either at one time or other.'—HOOKER. 'This seditious, unconstitutional doctrine of electing kings is now publicly taught, avowed, and printed.'—BURKE. The precept is that which is recommended for practice; 'Pythagoras's first rule directs us to worship the gods, as is ordained by law, for that is the most natural interpretation of the precept.'—ADDISON. Both are the subjects of rational assent, and suited only to the matured understanding: principles are often admitted without examination; and imbibed as frequently from observation and circumstances, as from any direct personal efforts; children as well as men get principles; 'If we had the whole history of zeal, from the days of Cain to our times, we should see it filled with so many scenes of slaughter and bloodshed, as would make a wise man very careful not to suffer himself to be actuated by such a principle, when it regards matters of opinion and speculation.'—ADDISON.

DOCTRINE, DOGMA, TENET.

The doctrine (v. Doctrine) originates with the individual who teaches, in application to all subjects; the doctrine is whatever is taught or recommended to the belief of others; the dogma, from the Greek δόγμα and δοκέω to think, signifies the thing thought, admitted, or taken for granted; this lies with a body or number of individuals; the tenet, from the Latin teneo to hold or maintain, signifies the thing held or maintained, and is a species of principle (v. Doctrine) specifically maintained in matters of opinion by persons in general.

The doctrine rests on the authority of the individual by whom it is framed;

Unpractis'd he to fawn or seek for power
By doctrines fashion'd to the varying hour;
Far other aims his heart had learn'd to prize,
More skill'd to raise the wretch'd, than to rise.
GOLDSMITH.

The dogma rests on the authority of the body by whom it is maintained; 'Our poet was a stoick philosopher, and all his moral sentences are drawn from the dogmas of that sect.'—DRYDEN. The tenet rests on its own intrinsic merits or demerits; 'One of the puritanical tenets was the illegality of all games of chance.'—JOHNSON. Many of the doctrines of our blessed Saviour are held by faith in him; they are subjects of persuasion by the exercise of our rational powers: the dogmas of the Romish church are admitted by none but such as admit its authority: the tenets of republicans, levellers, and freethinkers, have been unblushingly maintained both in publick and private.

TENET, POSITION.

The tenet (v. Doctrine) is the opinion which we hold in our own minds; the position is that which we lay down for others. Our tenets may be hurtful, our positions false. He who gives up his tenets readily evinces an unstable mind; he who argues on a false position shows more tenacity and subtlety than good sense. The tenets of the different denominations of Christians are scarcely to be known or distinguished; they often rest upon such trivial points; 'The occasion of Luther's being first disgusted with the tenets of the Romish church, is known to every one, the least conversant with history.'—ROBERTSON. The positions which an author lays down must be very definite and clear when he wishes to build upon them any theory or system; 'To the position of Tully, that if virtue could be seen, she must be loved, may be added, that if truth could be heard, she must be obeyed.'—JOHNSON.

THEORY, SPECULATION.

Theory, from the Greek θεωρεω to behold, and speculation, from the Latin speculari to watch for or espy, are both employed to express what is seen with the mind's eye. Theory is the fruit of reflection, it serves the purposes of science; practice will be incomplete when the theory is false;

True piety without cessation tost

By theories, the practice past is lost.—DENHAM.

Speculation belongs more to the imagination; it has therefore less to do with realities: it is that which can not be reduced to practice, and can therefore never be brought to the test of experience; 'In all these things being fully persuaded that what they did, it was obedience to the will of God, and that all men should do the like; there remained after speculation practice whereunto the whole world might be framed.'—HOOKER. Hence it arises that theory is contrasted sometimes with the practice to designate its insufficiency to render a man complete;

True Christianity depends on fact,

Religion is not theory, but act.—HARTE.

And speculation is put for that which is fanciful or unreal; 'This is a consideration not to be neglected or thought an indifferent matter of mere speculation.'—LESLIE. A general who is so only in theory will acquit himself miserably in the field; a religionist who is only so in speculation will make a wretched Christian.

OPINION, SENTIMENT, NOTION.

Opinion, in Latin opinio from opinor, and the Greek ἐπινοέω, to think or judge, is the work of the head; sentiment, from sentio to feel, is the work of the heart; notion (vide Perception) is a simple operation of the thinking faculty.

We form opinions; we have sentiments; we get notions. Opinions are formed on speculative matters; they are the result of reading, experience, or reflection: sentiments are entertained on matters of practice; they are the consequence of habits and circumstances: notions are gathered upon sensible objects, and arise out of the casualties of hearing and seeing. We have opinions on religion as respects its doctrines; we have sentiments on religion as respects its practice and its precepts. The unity of the Godhead in the general sense, and the doctrine of the Trinity in the particular sense, are opinions; honour and gratitude towards the Deity, the sense of our dependence upon him, and obligations to him, are sentiments.

Opinions are more liable to error than sentiments; the former depend upon knowledge, and must therefore be inaccurate; the latter depend rather upon instinct, and a well organized frame of mind; 'Time wears out the fictions of opinion, and doth by degrees discover and unmask that fallacy of ungrounded persuasions, but confirms the dictates and sentiments of nature.'—WILKINS. Notions are still more liable to error than either; they are the immature decisions of the uninformed mind on the appearances of things; There is nothing made a more common subject of discourse than nature and its laws, and yet few agree in their notions about these words."—CHEYNE.

The difference of opinion among men, on the most important questions of human life, is a sufficient evidence that the mind of man is very easily led astray in matters of opinion; 'No, cousin, said Henry IV. when charged by the Duke of Bouillon with having changed his religion) I have changed no religion, but an opinion.'—HOWEL. Whatever difference of opinion there may be among Christians, there is but one sentiment of love and good-will among those who follow the example of Christ, rather than their own passions; 'There are never great numbers in any nation who can raise a pleasing discourse from their own stock of sentiments and images.'—JOHNSON. The notions of a Deity are so imperfect among savages in general, that they seem to amount to little more than an indistinct idea of some superior invisible agent; 'Being we are at this time to speak of the proper notion of the church, therefore I shall not look upon it as any more than the sons of men.'—PEARSON.

DEITY, DIVINITY

Deity, from Deus a God, signifies a divine person. Divinity, from divinus, signifies the divine essence or power: the deities of the heathens had little of divinity in them; 'The first original of the drama was religious worship, consisting only of a chorus, which was nothing else but a hymn to a Deity.'—ADDISON. The divinity of our Saviour is a fundamental article in the Christian faith;

Why shrinks the soul
Back on herself, and startles at destruction?
'Tis the divinity that stirs within us.—ADDISON.

CELESTIAL, HEAVENLY.

Celestial and heavenly derive their difference in signification from their different origin: they both literally imply belonging to heaven; but the former, from the Latin caelestium, signifies belonging to the heaven of heathens; the latter, which has its origin among believers in the true God, has acquired a superior sense, in regard to heaven as the habitation of the Almighty. This distinction is pretty faithfully observed in their application: celestial is applied mostly in the natural sense of the heavens; heavenly is employed more commonly in a spiritual sense. Hence we speak of the celestial globe as distinguished from the terrestrial, of the celestial bodies, of Olympus as the celestial abode of Jupiter, of the celestial deities;

Twice warn'd by the celestial messenger,
The pious prince arose, with hasty fear.—DRYDEN.
Unhappy son! (fair Thetis thus replies, While tears celestial trickle from her eyes.)—POPE.

But on the other hand, of the heavenly habitation, of heavenly joys or bliss, of heavenly spirits and the like. There are doubtless many cases in which celestial may be used for heavenly in the moral sense;

Thus having said, the hero bound his brows
With leafy branches, then perform'd his vows;
Adorning first the genius of the place,
Then Earth, the mother of the heavenly race.

DRYDEN.

But there are cases in which heavenly cannot so properly be substituted by celestial; 'As the love of heaven makes one heavenly, the love of virtue virtuous, so doth the love of the world make one become worldly.'—SIDNEY. Heavenly is frequently employed in the sense of superexcellent;

But now he seiz'd Briseis' heav'nly charms,
And of my valour's prize defrauds my arms.—POPE.

The poets have also availed themselves of the license to use celestial in a similar sense, as occasion might serve.

TO ADORE, WORSHIP.

Adore, in French adorer, Latin adoro, or ad and oro, signifies literally to pray to. Worship, in Saxon weorthscype, is contracted from worhtship, implying either the object that is worth, or the worth itself; whence it has been employed to designate the action of doing suitable homage to the object which has worth and, by a just distinction, of paying homage to our Maker by religious rites.

Adoration, strictly speaking, is the service of the heart towards a Superior Being, in which we acknowledge our dependence and obedience, by petition and thanksgiving: worship consists in the outward form of showing reverence to some supposed superior being. Adoration can with propriety be paid only to the one true God; 'Menander says, that "God, the Lord and Father of all things, is alone worthy of our humble adoration, being at once the maker and giver of all blessings."'—CUMBERLAND. But worship is offered by heathens to stocks and stones;

By reason, man a Godhead can discern,
But how he should be worship'd cannot learn.

DRYDEN

We may adore our Maker at all times and in all places, whenever the heart is lifted up towards him; but we worship him only at stated times, and according to certain rules; 'Solemn and serviceable worship we name, for distinction sake, whatsoever belongeth to the church or publick society of God, by way of external adoration.'—HOOKER. Outward signs are but secondary in the act of adoration; and in divine worship there is often nothing existing but the outward form. We seldom adore without worshipping; but we too frequently worship without adoring.

TO ADORE, REVERENCE, VENERATE, REVERE.

Adoration has been before considered only in relation to our Maker; it is here employed in an improper and extended application to express, in the strongest possible manner, the devotion of the mind towards sensible objects: Reverence, in Latin reverentia, reverence or awe, implies to show reverence, from revereor, to stand in awe of: Venerate, in Latin venereatus, participle of venereor, probably from venere beauty, signifying to hold in very high esteem for its superior qualities: revere is another form of the same verb.

Reverence is equally engendered by the contemplation of superiority in a being, whether of the Supreme Being, as our Creator, or any earthly being as our parent. It differs, however, from adoration, in as much as it has a mixture of fear arising from the consciousness of weakness and dependence, or of obligation for favours received; 'The fear acceptable to God, is a filial fear, an awful reverence of the Divine Nature, proceeding from a just esteem for his perfections, which produces in us an inclination to his service, and an unwillingness to offend him.'—ROGERS.

To revere and venerate are applied only to human beings, and that not so much from the relation we stand in to them, as from their characters and endowments; on which account these two latter terms are applicable to inanimate as well as animate objects.

Adoration in this case, as in the former, essentially requires no external form of expression; it is best expressed by the devotion of the individual to the service of him whom he adores; 'There is no end of his greatness.' The most exalted creature he has made is only capable of adoring it; none but himself can comprehend it.'—ADDISON. Reverencing our Maker is altogether an inward feeling; but reverencing our parents includes in it an outward expression of our sentiments by our deportment towards them;

The war protracted, and the siege delay'd,
Were due to Hector's and this hero's hand,
Both brave alike, and equal in command;
Æneas, not inferior in the field,
In pious reverence to the gods excell'd.—DRYDEN

Revering and venerating are confined to the breast of the individual, but they may sometimes display them selves in suitable acts of homage.

Good princes are frequently adored by their subjects: it is a part of the Christian character to reverence our spiritual pastors and masters, as well as all temporal authorities; 'It seems to be remarkable that death increases our veneration for the good, and extenuates our hatred of the bad.'—JOHNSON. We ought to venerate all truly good men while living, and to revere their memories when they are dead:

And had not men the hoary head rever'd,
And boys paid reverence when a man appear'd,
Both must have died, though richer skins they wore,
And saw more heaps of acorns in their store.

CREECH.

OFFERING, OBLATION.

Offering, from offer, and oblation, from oblatio and oblatus or oflatus, come both from offero (v. To offer): the former is however a term of much more general and familiar use than the latter. Offerings are both moral and religious; oblation, in the proper sense, is religious only; the money which is put into the sacramental plate is an offering; the consecrated bread and wine at the sacrament is an oblation. The offering, in a religious sense, is whatever one offers as a gift by way of reverence to a superior;

They are polluted offerings, more abhor'd
Than spotted livers in the sacrifice.

SHAKESPEARE.

The winds to heav'n the curling vapours bore,
Engrafting off'ring to the immortal pow'rs,
Whose wrath hung heavy o'er the Trojan tow'rs.

POPE.

The oblation is the offering which is accompanied with some particular ceremony; 'Many conceive in the oblation of Jephtha's daughter, not a natural but a civil kind of death.'—BROWN. The wise men made an offering to our Saviour; but not properly an oblation; the Jewish sacrifices, as in general all religious sacrifices, were in the proper sense oblations. The term oblation, in a figurative sense, may be as generally applied as offering;

Ye mighty princes, your oblations bring,
And pay due honours to your awful king.—PITT.
The kind oblation of a falling tear.—DRYDEN.

MALEDICTION, CURSE, IMPRECATION, EXECRATION, ANATHEMA.

Malediction, from malè and dico, signifies a saying ill, that is, declaring an evil wish against a person: curse, in Saxon kursian, comes in all probability from the Greek καρσος, to sanction or ratify, signifying a bad wish declared upon oath, or in a solemn manner: imprecation, from im and preco, signifies a praying down evil upon a person: execration, from the Latin excoror, that is, ex sacris excludere, signifies the same as to excommunicate, with every form of solemn imprecation: anathema, in Greek ἀνάθεμα, signifies a setting out, that is, a putting out of a religious community by way of penance.

The malediction is the most indefinite and general term, signifying simply the declaration of evil: curse is a solemn denunciation of evil: the former is employed mostly by men; the latter by God or man: the rest are species of the curse pronounced only by man. The malediction is caused by simple anger: the curse is occasioned by some grievous offence: men, in the heat of their passions, will utter maledictions against any object that offends them; 'With many praises of his good play, and many maledictions on the power of chance, he took up the cards and threw them in the fire.'—MACKENZIE. God pronounced a curse upon Adam, and all his posterity, after the fall;

But know, that ere your promis'd walls you build,
My curse shall severely be fulfill'd.—DRYDEN.

The curse differs in the degree of evil pronounced or wished; the imprecation and execration always imply some positive great evil, and, in fact, as much evil as can be conceived by man in his anger; 'Thus either host their imprecations join'd.'—POPE. The anathema respects the evil which is pronounced according to the canon law, by which a man is not only put out of the church, but held up as an object of offence. The malediction is altogether an unallowed expression of private resentment; the curse was admitted, in some cases, according to the Mosaic law; and that, as well as the anathema, at one time formed a part of the ecclesiastical discipline of the Christian church; 'The bare anathemas of the church fall like so many bruta fulmina upon the obstinate and schismatical.'—SOUTH. The imprecation formed a part of the heathenish ceremony of religion, whereby they invoked the Dira to bring down every evil on the heads of their enemies. They had different formulas of speech for different occasions, as to an enemy on his departure; 'Abeas nunquam rediturus.' Mela informs us that the Abrantes, a people of Africa, used to salute the rising and setting sun after this manner.

The execration is always the informal expression of the most violent personal anger; 'I have seen in Bedlam a man that has held up his face in a posture of adoration towards heaven to utter execrations and blasphemies.'—STEELE.

TEMPLE, CHURCH.

These words designate an edifice destined for the exercise of religion, but with collateral ideas, which sufficiently distinguish them from each other. The temple of the Latin signified originally an open elevated spot marked out by the augurs with their lituus, or sacred wand, whence they could best survey the heavens on all sides; the idea, therefore, of spacious, open, and elevated, enters into the meaning of this word in the same manner as it does in the Hebrew word היכל derived from הכל, which in the Arabick signifies great and lofty. The Greek ναός, from ναο to inhabit, signifies a dwelling-place, and by distinction the dwelling-place of the Almighty, in which sense the Hebrew word is also taken to denote the high and holy place where Jehovah peculiarly dwelleth, otherwise called the holy heavens, Jehovah's dwelling or resting-place; whence St. Paul calls our bodies the temples of God when the spirit of God dwelleth in us. The Roman poets used the word templum in a similar sense;

—Celi tonitralia templa.—LUCRET. (Lib. I.)
Qui templa cœli summa sonitu concutit.

TERENT. (Eun.)

Contremuit templum magnum Jovis altitonantis.

ENNIUS.

The word temple, therefore, strictly signifies a spacious open place set apart for the peculiar presence and worship of the Divine Being, and is applied with peculiar propriety to the sacred edifices of the Jews.

Church, which, through the medium of the Saxon circe, cyric, and the German kirche, is derived from the Greek κυριακός, signifying literally what belonged to κύριος, the Lord; whence it became a word among the earliest Christians for the Lord's Supper, the Lord's day, the Lord's house, and also for an assembly of the faithful, and is still used in the two latter meanings; 'That churches were consecrated unto none but the Lord only, the very general name chiefly doth sufficiently show; church doth signify no other thing than the Lord's house.'—HOOKER. 'The church being a supernatural society, doth differ from natural societies in this; that the persons unto whom we associate ourselves in the one, are men simply considered as men; but they to whom we be joined in the other, are God, angels, and holy men.'—HOOKER. The word church, having acquired a specific meaning, is never used by the poets, or in a general application like the word temple; 'Here we have no temple but the wood, no assembly but horn-beasts.'—SHAKESPEARE. On the other hand, it has a diversity of particular meanings; being taken sometimes in the sense of the ecclesiastical power in distinction from the state, sometimes for holy orders, &c.

TO DEDICATE, DEVOTE, CONSECRATE, HALLOW.

Dedicate, in Latin dedicatus, participle from de and dico, signifies to set apart by a promise; devote, in Latin devotus, participle from devovere, signifies to vow for an express purpose; consecrate, in Latin consecratus, from consecro or con and sacro, signifies to make sacred by a special act; hallow from holy, or the German heilig, signifies to make holy.

There is something more positive in the act of dedicating than in that of devoting; but less so than in that of consecrating.

To dedicate and devote may be employed in both temporal and spiritual matters; to consecrate and hallow only in the spiritual sense: we may dedicate or devote any thing that is at our disposal to the service of some object; but the former is employed mostly in regard to superiours, and the latter to persons without distinction of rank: we dedicate a house to the service of God;

Warn'd by the seer, to her offended name
We raise and dedicate this wond'rous frame.
DRYDEN.

Or we devote our time to the benefit of our friends, or the relief of the poor; 'Gilbert West settled himself in a very pleasant house at Wickham in Kent, where he devoted himself to piety.'—JOHNSON. We may dedicate or devote ourselves to an object; but the former always implies a solemn setting apart, springing from a sense of duty; the latter an entire application of one's self from zeal and affection; in this manner he who dedicates himself to God abstracts himself from every object which is not immediately connected with the service of God; he who devotes himself to the ministry pursues it as the first object of his attention and regard: such a dedication of oneself is hardly consistent with our other duties as members of society; but a devotion of one's powers, one's time, and one's knowledge to the spread of religion among men is one of the most honourable and sacred kinds of devotion.

To consecrate is a species of formal dedication by virtue of a religious observance; it is applicable mostly to places and things connected with religious works; 'The greatest conqueror in this holy nation did not only compose the words of his divine odes, but generally set them to music himself; after which his works, though they were consecrated to the tabernacle, became the national entertainment.'—ADDISON. Hallow is a species of informal consecration applied to the same objects: the church is consecrated; particular days are hallowed;

Without the walls a ruin'd temple stands,
To Ceres hallowed once.—DRYDEN.

FORM, CEREMONY, RITE, OBSERVANCE.

Form in its sense respects the form or manner of the action; ceremony, in Latin ceremonia, is supposed to signify the rites of Ceres; rite, in Latin ritus, is probably changed from ratus, signifying a custom that is esteemed; observance signifies the thing observed.

All these terms are employed with regard to particular modes of action in civil society. Form is here the most general in its sense and application; ceremony, rite, and observance are particular kinds of form, suited to particular occasions. Form, in its distinct application, respects all modes of acting and speaking, that are adopted by society at large, in every transaction of life; ceremony respects those forms of outward behaviour which are made the expressions of respect and deference; rite and observance are applied to national ceremonies in matters of religion. A certain form is requisite for the sake of order, method, and decorum, in every social matter, whether in affairs of state, in a court of law, in a place of worship, or in the private intercourse of friends. So long as distinctions are admitted in society, and men are agreed to express their sentiments of regard and respect to each other, it will be necessary to preserve the ceremonies of politeness which have been established. Every country has adopted certain rites founded upon its peculiar religious faith, and prescribed certain observances by which individuals could make a publick profession of their faith. Administering oaths by the magistrate is a necessary form in law; 'A long table and a square table, or seat about the walls, seem things of form, but are things of substance; for at a long table, a few at the upper end, in effect, sway all the business; but in the other form, there is more use of the counsellors' opinions that sit lower.'—BACON. Kissing the king's hand is a ceremony practised at court;

And what have kings that privates have not too,
Save ceremony?—SHAKESPEARE.

Baptism is one rite of initiation into the Christian church, and confirmation another; prayer, reading the Scriptures, and preaching are different religious observances.

As respects religion, the forms are the established practice, comprehending the rite, ceremony, and observance, but the word is mostly applied to that which is external, and suited for a community; 'He who affirmeth speech to be necessary among all men throughout the world doth not thereby import that all men must necessarily speak one language; even so the necessity of polity and regimen in all churches may be held without holding any one certain form to be necessary in them all.'—HOOKER. The ceremony may be said either of an individual or a community; the rite is said only of a community; the observance, more properly of the individual either in publick or private. The ceremony of kneeling during the time of prayer is the most becoming posture for a suppliant, whether in publick or private;

Bring her up to the high altar, that she may
The sacred ceremonies there partake.—SPENSER

The discipline of a Christian church consists in its rites, to which every member, either as a layman or a priest, is obliged to conform;

Live thou to mourn thy love's unhappy fate,
To bear my mangled body from the foe,
Or buy it back, and fun'ral rites bestow.—DRYDEN.

Publick worship is an observance which no Christian thinks himself at liberty to neglect; 'Incorporated minds will always feel some inclination towards exterior acts and ritual observances.'—JOHNSON.

It betrays either gross ignorance or wilful impertinence, in the man who sets at nought any of the established forms of society, particularly in religious matters; 'You may discover tribes of men without policy, or laws, or cities, or any of the arts of life; but no where will you find them without some form of religion.'—BLAIR. When ceremonies are too numerous, they destroy the ease of social intercourse; but the absence of ceremony destroys all decency; 'Not to use ceremonies at all, is to teach others not to use them again, and so diminish respect to himself.'—BACON. In publick worship the excess of ceremony is apt to extinguish the warmth and spirit of devotion; but the want of ceremony deprives it of all solemnity.

LORD'S SUPPER, EUCHARIST, COMMUNION, SACRAMENT.

The Lord's supper is a term of familiar and general use among Christians, as designating in literal terms the supper of our Lord; that is, either the last solemn supper which he took with his disciples previous to his crucifixion, or the commemoration of that event which, conformably to his commands has been observed by the professors of Christianity; 'To the worthy participation of the Lord's supper, there is indispensably required a suitable preparation.'—SOUTH. Eucharist is a term of peculiar use among the Roman Catholics, from the Greek ευχαριστω to give thanks, because personal adoration, by way of returning thanks, constitutes in their estimation the chief part of the ceremony; 'This ceremony of feasting belongs most properly both to marriage and to the eucharist, as both of them have the nature of a covenant.'—SOUTH. As the social affections are kept alive mostly by the common participation of meals, so is brotherly love, the essence of Christian fellowship, cherished and warmed in the highest degree by the common participation in this holy festival: hence, by distinction, it has been denominated the communion; 'One woman he could not bring to the communion, and when he reproved or exhorted her, she only answered that she was no scholar.'—JOHNSON. As the vows which are made at the altar of our Lord are the most solemn which a Christian can make, comprehending in them the entire devotion of himself to Christ, the general term sacrament, signifying an oath, has been employed by way of emphasis for this ordinance; 'I could not have the consent of the physicians to go to church yesterday; I therefore received the holy sacrament at home.'—JOHNSON. The Roman Catholics have employed the same term to six other ordinances; but the Protestants, who attach a similar degree of sacredness to no other than baptism, annex this appellation only to these two.

MARRIAGE, WEDDING, NUPTIALS.

Marriage, from to marry, denotes the act of marrying; wedding and nuptials denote the ceremony of being married. As marry, in French marrier, comes from the Latin marito to be joined to a male; hence marriage comprehends the act of choosing and being legally bound to a man or a woman: wedding from wed, and the Teutonic wetten, to promise or betroth, implies the ceremony of marrying, inasmuch as it is binding upon the parties. Nuptials comes from the Latin nubo to veil, because the Roman ladies were veiled at the time of marriage: hence the word has been put for the whole ceremony itself. Marriage is a general term, which conveys no collateral meaning. Marriage is an institution which, by those who have been blessed with the light of Divine revelation, has always been considered as sacred;

O fatal maid! thy marriage is endow'd
With Phrygian, Latian, and Rutulian blood.

DRYDEN.

Wedding has always a reference to the ceremony; with some persons, particularly among the lower orders of society, the day of their wedding is converted into a day of riot and intemperance; 'Asa say one how he has been employed to-day: he will tell you, perhaps, I have been at the ceremony of taking the manly robe: this friend invited me to a wedding; that desired me to attend the hearing of his cause.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny). Nuptials may either be used in a general or particular import; among the Roman Catholics in England it is a practice for them to have their nuptials solemnized by a priest of their own persuasion as well as by the Protestant clergyman;

Fir'd with disdain for Turnus disposess'd,
And the new nuptials of the Trojan guest.—DRYDEN.

MARRIAGE, MATRIMONY, WEDLOCK.

Marriage (v. Marriage) is oftener an act than a state; matrimony and wedlock both describe states.

Marriage is taken in the sense of an act, when we speak of the laws of marriage, the day of one's marriage, the congratulations upon one's marriage, a happy or unhappy marriage, &c.; 'Marriage is rewarded with some honourable distinctions which celibacy is forbidden to usurp.'—JOHNSON. It is taken in the sense of a state, when we speak of the pleasures or pains of marriage; but in this latter case, matrimony, which signifies a married life abstractedly from all agents or acting persons, is preferable; so likewise, to think of matrimony, and to enter into the holy state of matrimony, are expressions founded upon the signification of the term. As matrimony is derived from mater a mother, because married women are in general mothers, it has particular reference to the domestic state of the two parties; broils are but too frequently the fruits of matrimony; yet there are few cases in which they might not be obviated by the good sense of those who are engaged in them. Hasty marriages cannot be expected to produce happiness: young people who are eager for matrimony before they are fully aware of its consequences will purchase their experience at the expense of their peace; 'As love generally produces matrimony, so it often happens that matrimony produces love.'—SPECTATOR.

Wedlock is the old English word for matrimony, and is in consequence admitted in law, when one speaks of children born in wedlock; agreeably to its derivation it has a reference to the bond of union which follows the marriage: hence one speaks of living happily in a state of wedlock, of being joined in holy wedlock; 'The men who would make good husbands, if they visit public places, are frighted at wedlock and resolve to live single.'—JOHNSON.

FUNERAL, OBSEQUIES.

Funeral, in Latin funus, is derived from funis a cord, because lighted cords, or torches, were carried before the bodies which were interred by night; the funeral, therefore, denotes the ordinary solemnity which attends the consignment of a body to the grave. Obsequies, in Latin exsequia, are both derived from sequor, which, in its compound sense, signifies to perform or execute; they comprehend, therefore, funerals attended with more than ordinary solemnity.

We speak of the funeral as the last sad office which we perform for a friend; it is accompanied by nothing but by mourning and sorrow;

That pluck'd my nerves, those tender strings of life,
Which, pluck'd a little more, will toll the bell
That calls my few friends to my funeral.—YOUNG.

We speak of the obsequies as the tribute of respect which can be paid to the person of one who was high in station or public esteem;

His body shall be royally interr'd.
I will, myself,

Be the chief mourner at his obsequies.—DRYDEN

The funeral, by its frequency, becomes so familiar an object that it passes by unheeded; the obsequies which are performed over the remains of the great, attract our notice from the pomp and grandeur with which they are conducted. The funeral is performed for one immediately after his decease; but the obsequies may be performed at any period afterward, and in this sense is not confined alone to the great;

Some in the flow'r-strew'd grave the corpse have lay'd
And annual obsequies around it paid.—JENYNS.

ETRIAL, INTERMENT, SEPULTURE.

Burial, from bury, in Saxon birian, birigan, German bergen, signifies, in the original sense, to conceal. Interment, from inter, compounded of in and terra, signifies the putting into the ground. Sepulture, in French sepulture, Latin sepultura, from sepultus, participle of sepelio to bury, comes from sepes a hedge, signifying an enclosure, and probably likewise from the Hebrew שָׁכַח to put to rest, or in a state of privacy.

Under burial is comprehended simply the purpose of the action; under interment and sepulture, the manner as well as the motive of the action. We bury in order to conceal; 'Among our Saxon ancestors, the dead bodies of such as were slain in the field were not laid in graves; but lying upon the ground were covered with turves or clods of earth, and the more in reputation the persons had been, the greater and higher were the turves raised over their bodies. This some used to call biriging, some berging of the dead; all being one thing though differently pronounced, and from whence we yet retain our speech of burying the dead, that is, hiding the dead.'—VERSTEGAN. Interment and sepulture are accompanied with religious ceremonies.

Bury* is confined to no object or place; we bury whatever we deposite in the earth, and wherever we please;

When he lies along
After your way his tale pronounc'd, shall bury
His reasons with his body.—SHAKESPEARE.

But interment and sepulture respect only the bodies of the deceased when deposited in a sacred place. Burial requires that the object be concealed under ground; interment may be used for depositing in vaults. Self-murderers are buried in the highways; Christians in general are buried in the church-yard,

If you have kindness left, there see me laid;
To bury decently the injur'd maid
Is all the favour.—WALLER.

The kings of England were formerly interred in Westminster Abbey;

His body shall be royally interr'd,
And the last funeral pomps adorn his hearse.
DRYDEN.

Burial is a term in familiar use; interment serves frequently as a more elegant expression;

But good Æneas ordered on the shore
A stately tomb, whose top a trumpet bore;
Thus was his friend interr'd, and deathless fame
Still to the lofty cape consigns his name.—DRYDEN.

Sepulture is an abstract term confined to particular cases, as in speaking of the rights and privileges of sepulture;

Ah! leave me not for Grecian dogs to tear,
The common rites of sepulture bestow;
To sooth a father's and a mother's woe;
Let their large gifts procure an urn at least,
And Hector's ashes in his country rest.—POPE

* Vide Trussler: "To bury, inter"

Interment and sepulture never depart from their religious import; bury is used figuratively for other objects and purposes. A man is said to bury himself alive who shuts himself out from the world; he is said to bury the talent of which he makes no use, or to bury in oblivion what he does not wish to call to mind;

This is the way to make the city flat
And bury all, which yet distinctly ranges
In heaps and piles of ruin.—SHAKESPEARE.

Inter is on one occasion applied by Shakspeare also to other objects;

The evil that men do lives after them,
The good is oft interred with their bones.

SHAKESPEARE.

BEATIFICATION, CANONIZATION.

These are two acts emanating from the pontifical authority, by which the Pope declares a person, whose life has been exemplary and accompanied with miracles, as entitled to enjoy eternal happiness after his death, and determines in consequence the sort of worship which should be paid to him.

In the act of beatification the Pope pronounces only as a private person, and uses his own authority only in granting to certain persons, or to a religious order, the privilege of paying a particular worship to a beatified object.

In the act of canonization, the Pope speaks as a judge after a judicial examination on the state, and decides the sort of worship which ought to be paid by the whole church.

FEAST, FESTIVAL, HOLIDAY.

Feast, in Latin festum, or festus, changed most probably from fesio, or feria, which, in all probability, comes from the Greek ἑρῆς, sacred, because these days were kept sacred or vacant from all secular labour: festival and holiday, as the words themselves denote, have precisely the same meaning in their original sense, with this difference, that the former derives its origin from heathenish superstition, the latter owes its rise to the establishment of Christianity in its reformed state.

A feast, in the Christian sense of the word, is applied to every day, except Sundays, which are regarded as sacred, and observed with particular solemnity; a holiday, or, according to its modern orthography, a holiday, is simply a day on which the ordinary business is suspended: among the Roman Catholics, there are many days which are kept holy, and consequently by them denominated feasts, which in the English reformed church are only observed as holidays, or days of exemption from public business; of this description are the Saints' days, on which the public offices are shut: on the other hand, Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, are regarded in both churches more as feasts than as holidays.

Feast, as a technical term, is applied only to certain specified holidays;

First, I provide myself a nimble thing,
To be my page, a varlet of all crafts;
Next, two new suits for feasts and gala days.

CUMBERLAND.

A holiday is an indefinite term, it may be employed for any day or time in which there is a suspension of business; there are, therefore, many feasts where there are no holidays, and many holidays where there are no feasts: a feast is altogether sacred; a holiday has frequently nothing sacred in it, not even in its cause; it may be a simple, ordinary transaction, the act of an individual;

It happen'd on a summer's holiday,
That to the green wood shade he took his way.

DRYDEN.

A feast has always either a sacred or a serious object; 'In so enlightened an age as the present, I shall perhaps be ridiculed if I hint, as my opinion, that the observation of certain festivals is something more than a mere political institution.'—WALPOLE. A feast is kept by religious worship; a holiday is kept by idleness; 'Many worthy persons urged how great the harmony was between the holidays and their attributes (if I may call them so), and what a confusion would follow if Michaelmas-day, for instance, was not to be celebrated when stubble geese are in their highest perfection.'—WALPOLE. A feast is kept by mirth and festivity: some feasts are festivals, as in the case of the carnival at Rome; some festivals are holidays, as in the case of weddings and public thanksgivings.

CLERGYMAN, PARSON, PRIEST, MINISTER.

Clergyman, altered from clerk, clericus, signified any one holding a regular office, and by distinction one who held the holy office; parson is either changed from person, that is, by distinction the person who spiritually presides over a parish, or contracted from parochianus; priest, in German, &c. priester, is contracted from presbyter, in Greek πρεσβύτερος, signifying an elder who holds the sacerdotal office; minister, in Latin minister, a servant, from minus, less or inferior, signifies literally one who performs a subordinate office, and has been extended in its meaning, to signify generally one who officiates or performs an office.

The word clergyman applies to such as are regularly bred according to the forms of the national religion, and applies to none else. In this sense we speak of the English, the French, and Scotch clergy, without distinction; 'By a clergyman I mean one in holy orders.'—STEELE. 'To the time of Edward III. it is probable that the French and English languages subsisted together throughout the kingdom; the higher orders, both of the clergy and laity, speaking almost universally French; the lower retaining the use of their native tongue.'—TYRWHITT. A parson is a species of clergyman, who ranks the highest in the three orders of inferior clergy; that is, parson, vicar, and curate; the parson being a technical term for the rector, or him who holds the living: in its technical sense it has now acquired a definite use; but in general conversation it is become almost a nickname. The word clergyman is always substituted for parson in polite society. When priest respects the Christian religion it is a species of clergyman, that is, one who is ordained to officiate at the altar in distinction from the deacon, who is only an assistant to the priest. But the term priest has likewise an extended meaning in reference to such as hold the sacerdotal character in any form of religion, as the priests of the Jews, or those of the Greeks, Romans, Indians, and the like; 'Call a man a priest, or parson, and you set him in some men's esteem ten degrees below his own servant.'—SOUTH. A minister is one who actually or habitually officiates. Clergymen are therefore not always strictly ministers; nor are all ministers clergymen. If a clergyman delegates his functions altogether he is not a minister; nor is he who presides over a dissenting congregation a clergyman. In the former case, however, it would be invidious to deprive the clergyman of the name of minister of the gospel, but in the latter case it is a misuse of the term clergyman to apply it to any minister who does not officiate according to the form of an established religion;

With leave and honour enter our abodes,
Ye sacred ministers of men and gods.—POPE.

BISHOPRICK, DIOCESS.

Bishoprick, compounded of bishop and rick or reich empire, signifies the empire or government of a bishop: Dioecesis, in Greek διοίκησις, compounded of διὰ and οἰκω, signifies an administration throughout.

Both these words describe the extent of an episcopal jurisdiction; the first with relation to the person who officiates, the second with relation to the charge. There may, therefore, be a bishoprick, either where there are many diocesses or no diocess; but according to the import of the term, there is properly no diocess where there is no bishoprick. When the jurisdiction is merely titular, as in countries where the Catholic religion is not recognised, it is a bishoprick, but not a diocess. On the other hand, the bishoprick of Rome or that of an archbishop comprehends all the diocesses of the subordinate bishops. Hence it arises that when we speak of the ecclesiastical distribution of a country we term the divisions bishopricks; but when we speak of the actual office, we term it a diocess. England is divided into a certain number of bishopricks, not diocesses. Every bishop visits his diocess, not his bishoprick, at stated intervals.

ECCLESIASTICK, DIVINE, THEOLOGIAN.

An ecclesiastick derives his title from the office which he bears in the ecclesia or church; a divine and theologian from their pursuit after, or engagement in, divine or theological matters. An ecclesiastick is connected with an episcopacy; a divine or theologian is not essentially connected with any form of church government.

An ecclesiastick need not in his own person perform any office, although he fills a station: a divine not only fills a station, but actually performs the office of teaching; a theologian neither fills any particular station, nor discharges any specific duty, but merely follows the pursuit of studying theology. An ecclesiastick is not always a divine, nor a divine an ecclesiastick; a divine is always more or less a theologian, but every theologian is not a divine.

Among the Roman Catholic monks, and in the Church of England the various dignitaries who perform the episcopal functions, are entitled ecclesiasticks; 'Our old English monks seldom let any of their kings depart in peace, who had endeavoured to diminish the power or wealth of which the ecclesiasticks were in those times possessed.'—ADDISON. There are but few denominations of Christians who have not appointed teachers who are called divines; 'Nor shall I dwell on our excellence in metaphysical speculations; because, he that reads the works of our divines will easily discover how far human subtilty has been able to penetrate.'—JOHNSON. Professors or writers on theology are peculiarly denominated theologians; 'I looked on that sermon (of Dr. Price's) as the publick declaration of a man much connected with literary caballers, intriguing philosophers, and political theologians.'—BURKE.

CLOISTER, CONVENT, MONASTERY.

Cloister, in French * clôître, from the word clos close, signifies a certain close place in a convent, or an enclosure of houses for canons, or in general a religious house; convent, from the Latin convetus, a meeting, and convencio to come together, signifies a religious assembly; monastery, in French monastère, signifies a habitation for monks, from the Greek μὸνᾶς alone.

The proper idea of cloister is that of seclusion; the proper idea of convent is that of community; the proper idea of a monastery is that of solitude. One is shut up in a cloister, put into a convent, and retires to a monastery.

Whoever wishes to take an absolute leave of the world, shuts himself up in a cloister;

Some solitary cloister will I choose,
And there with holy virgins live immur'd.

DRYDEN.

Whoever wishes to attach himself to a community that has renounced all commerce with the world, goes into a convent; 'Nor were the new abbots less industrious to stock their convents with foreigners.'—TYPHLETT. Whoever wishes to shun all human intercourse retires to a monastery; 'I drove my suitor to forswear the full stream of the world, and to live in a nook merely monastick.'—SHAKESPEARE.

In the cloister our liberty is sacrificed: in the convent our worldly habits are renounced, and those of a regular religious community being adopted, we submit to the yoke of established orders: in a monastery we impose a sort of voluntary exile upon ourselves; we live with the view of living only to God.

In the ancient and true monasteries, the members divided their time between contemplation and labour; but as population increased, and towns multiplied, monasteries were, properly speaking, succeeded by convents.

In ordinary discourse, cloister is employed in an absolute and indefinite manner: we speak of the cloister to designate a monastick state; as entering a cloister;

* Vide Abbe Roubaud: "Clôître, convent, monastère."

burying one's self in a cloister; penances and mortifications are practised in a cloister; but it is not the same thing when we speak of the cloister of the Benedictines and of their monastery; or the cloister of the Capuchins and their convent.

CONVERT, PROSELYTE.

Convert, from the Latin converto, signifies changed to something in conformity with the views of another; proselyte, from the Greek προσῆλυτος and προσέρχεται, signifies come over to the side of another.

Convert is more extensive in its sense and application than proselyte: convert in its full sense includes every change of opinion, without respect to the subject; proselyte in its strict sense refers only to changes from one religious belief to another: there are many converts to particular doctrines of Christianity, and proselytes from the Pagan, Jewish, or Mahomedan, to the Christian faith: there are political as well as religious converts, who could not with the same strict propriety be termed proselytes.

Conversion is a more voluntary act than proselytism; it emanates entirely from the mind of the agent, independent of foreign influence; it extends not merely to the abstract or speculative opinions of the individual, but to the whole current of his feelings and spring of his actions: it is the conversion of the heart and soul. Proselytism is an outward act, which need not extend beyond the conformity of one's words and actions to a certain rule; convert is therefore always taken in a good sense: it bears on the face of it the stamp of sincerity; 'A believer may be excused by the most hardened atheist for endeavouring to make him a convert, because he does it with an eye to both their interests.'—ADDISON. Proselyte is a term of more ambiguous meaning; the proselyte is often the creature and tool of a party; there may be many proselytes where there are no converts; 'False teachers commonly make use of base, and low, and temporal considerations, of little tricks and devices, to make disciples and gain proselytes.'—TILLOTSON.

The conversion of a sinner is the work of God's grace, either by his special interposition, or by the ordinary influence of his Holy Word on the heart; it is an act of great presumption, therefore, in those men who rest so strongly on their own particular modes and forms in bringing about this great work: they may without any breach of charity be suspected of rather wishing to make proselytes to their own party.

TO TRANSFIGURE, TRANSFORM, METAMORPHOSE.

Transfigure is to make to pass over into another figure; transform and metamorphose is to put into another form: the former being said mostly of spiritual beings, and particularly in reference to our Saviour; the other two terms being applied to that which has a corporeal form.

Transformation is commonly applied to that which changes its outward form; in this manner a harlequin transforms himself into all kinds of shapes and likenesses;

Something you have heard
Of Hamlet's transformation; so I call it,
Since not the exterior, nor the inward man
Resembles what it was.—SHAKESPEARE.

Sometimes however the word is applied to moral objects; 'Can a good intention, or rather a very wicked one so misalled, transform perjury and hypocrisy into merit and perfection?'—SOUTH. Metamorphosis is applied to the form internal as well as external, that is, to the whole nature; in this manner Ovid describes among others, the metamorphoses of Narcissus into a flower, and Daphne into a laurel: with the same idea we may speak of a rustic being metamorphosed, by the force of art, into a fine gentleman; 'A lady's shift may be metamorphosed into billets-doux, and come into her possession a second time.'—ADDISON. Transfiguration is frequently taken for a painting of our Saviour's transfiguration; 'We have of this gentleman a piece of the transfiguration, which I think is held a work second to none in the world.'—STEELE.

PRAYER, PETITION, REQUEST, ENTREATY, SUIT.

Prayer, from the Latin preco, and the Greek ὑποκαί to pray, is a general term, including the common idea of application to some person for any favour to be granted; petition, from peto to seek; request, from the Latin requisitus and requiro, or re, and quæro to look after, or seek for with desire; entreaty, from the French en and traiter, signifying to act upon; suit, from su, in French suivre, Latin sequor to follow after; denote different modes of prayer, varying in the circumstances of the action and the object acted upon.

The prayer is made more commonly to the Supreme Being; the petition is made more generally to one's fellow-creatures; we may, however, pray our fellow-creatures, and petition our Creator: the prayer is made for every thing which is of the first importance to us as living beings; the petition is made for that which may satisfy our desires: hence our prayers to the Almighty respect all our circumstances as moral and responsible agents; our petitions respect the temporary circumstances of our present existence. When the term prayer is applied to one's fellow-creatures it carries with it the idea of earnestness and submission; 'Prayer among men is supposed a means to change the person to whom we pray; but prayer to God doth not change him, but fits us to receive the things prayed for.'—STILLINGFLEET.

Torture him with thy softness,
Nor till thy prayers are granted set him free.

ORWAY.

The petition and request are alike made to our fellow-creatures; but the former is a public act, in which many express their wishes to the Supreme Authority; the latter is an individual act between men in their private relations; the people petition the king or the parliament; a school of boys petition their master;

She takes petitions, and dispenses laws,
Hears and determines every private cause.

DRYDEN.

A child makes a request to its parent; one friend makes a request to another;

Thus spoke Ilioneus; the Trojan crew,
With cries and clamours his request renew.

DRYDEN.

The request marks an equality, but the entreaty defines no condition; it differs, however, from the former in the nature of the object and the mode of preferring: the request is but a simple expression; the entreaty is urgent: the request may be made in trivial matters; the entreaty is made in matters that deeply interest the feelings: we make the request of a friend to lend a book; we use every entreaty in order to divert a person from the purpose which we think detrimental: one complies with a request; one yields to entreaties. It was the dying request of Socrates, that they would sacrifice a cock to Æsculapius; Regulus was deaf to every entreaty of his friends, who wished him not to return to Carthage; 'Arguments, entreaties, and promises were employed in order to sooth them (the followers of Cortes).'
—ROBERTSON.

The suit is a higher kind of prayer, varying both in the nature of the subject, and the character of the agent. A gentleman pays his suit to a lady; a courtier makes his suit to the prince; 'Seldom or never is there much spoke, whenever any one comes to prefer a suit to another.'
—SOUTH.

TO ATONE FOR, EXPIATE.

Atone, or at one, signifies to be in unity, at peace, or good friends; expiate, in Latin expiatus, participle of expio, compounded of ex and pio, signifies to put out or make clear by an act of piety.

Both these terms express a satisfaction for an offence; but atone is general, expiate is particular. We may atone for a fault by any species of suffering; we expiate a crime only by suffering a legal punishment. A female often sufficiently atones for her violation of chastity by the misery she entails on herself;

O let the blood, already spilt, atone

For the past crimes of curs'd Laomedon.—DRYDEN

There are too many unfortunate wretches in England who expiate their crimes on a gallows;

How sacred ought kings' lives be held,
When but the death of one
Demands an empire's blood for expiation.—LEE.

Neither atonement nor expiation always necessarily require punishment or even suffering from the offender. The nature of the atonement depends on the will of the individual who is offended; and oftentimes the word implies simply an equivalent given or offered for something; 'I would earnestly desire the story-teller to consider, that no wit or mirth at the end of a story can atone for the half hour that has been lost before they come at it.'—STEELE. Expiations are frequently made by means of performing certain religious rites or acts of piety. Offences between man and man are sometimes atoned for by an acknowledgment of error; but offences towards God require an expiatory sacrifice, which our Saviour has been pleased to make of himself, that we, through Him, might become partakers of eternal life. Expiation, therefore, in the religious sense, is to atonement as the means to the end: atonement is often obtained by an expiation, but there may be expiations where there is no atonement.

Atonement replaces in a state of favour; expiation produces only a real or supposed exemption from sin and its consequences. Among the Jews and heathens there was expiation, but no atonement; under the Christian dispensation there is atonement as well as expiation.

ABSTINENCE, FAST.

Abstinence is a general term, applicable to any object from which we abstain; fast is a species of abstinence, namely, an abstaining from food; 'Fridays are appointed by the Church as days of abstinence; and Good Friday as a day of fast.'—TAYLOR. The general term is likewise used in the particular sense, to imply a partial abstinence from particular food; but fast signifies an abstinence from food altogether; 'I am verily persuaded that if a whole people were to enter into a course of abstinence, and eat nothing but water gruel for a fortnight, it would abate the rage and animosity of parties;' 'Such a fast would have the natural tendency to the procuring of those ends for which a fast is proclaimed.'
—ADDISON.

TO FORGIVE, PARDON, ABSOLVE, REMIT.

Forgive, compounded of the privative for and give; and pardon, in French pardonner, compounded likewise of the privative par or per and donner to give, both signify not to give the punishment that is due, to relax from the rigour of justice in demanding retribution. Forgive is the familiar term; pardon is adapted to the serious style. Individuals forgive each other personal offences; they pardon offences against law and morals: the former is an act of Christian charity; the latter an act of clemency: the former is an act that is confined to no condition; the latter is peculiarly the act of a superiour. He who has the right of being offended has an opportunity of forgiving the offender.

No more Achilles draws

His conqu'ring sword in any woman's cause.

The gods command me to forgive the past,
But let this first invasion be the last.—POPE.

He who has the authority of punishing the offence may pardon; 'A being who has nothing to pardon in himself may reward every man according to his works; but he whose very best actions must be seen with a grain of allowance, cannot be too mild, moderate, and forgiving.'—ADDISON. Next to the principle of not taking offence easily, that of forgiving real injuries should be instilled into the infant mind: it is the happy prerogative of the monarch that he can extend his pardon to all criminals, except to those whose crimes have rendered them unworthy to live: they may be both used in relation to our Maker, but with a similar distinction in sense. God forgives the sins of his creatures as a father pitying his children; he pardons their sins as a judge extending mercy to criminals, as far as is consistent with just ce.

* Pardon, when compared with remission, is the consequence of offence; it respects principally the person offending; it depends upon him who is offended; it produces reconciliation when it is sincerely granted and sincerely demanded. Remission is the consequence of the crime; it has more particular regard to the punishment; it is granted either by the prince or magistrate; it arrests the execution of justice;

With suppliant prayers their powers appease;

The soft Neapean race will soon repent

Their anger, and remit the punishment.—DRYDEN.

Remission, like pardon, is peculiarly applicable to the sinner with regard to his Maker. Absolution is taken in no other sense: it is the consequence of the fault or the sin, and properly concerns the state of the culprit; it properly loosens him from the tie with which he is bound; it is pronounced either by the civil judge or the ecclesiastical minister; it re-establishes the accused or the penitent in the rights of innocence;

Round in his urn the blended baits he rolls.

Absolves the just, and dooms the guilty souls.

—DRYDEN.

The pardon of sin obliterates that which is past, and restores the sinner to the Divine favour; it is promised throughout Scripture to all men on the condition of faith and repentance; remission of sin only averts the Divine vengeance, which otherwise would fall upon those who are guilty of it; it is granted peculiarly to Christians upon the ground of Christ's expiatory sacrifice, which satisfies Divine justice for all offences: absolution of sin is the work of God's grace on the heart; it acts for the future as well as the past, by lessening the dominion of sin, and making those free who were before in bondage. The Roman Catholics look upon absolution as the immediate act of the Pope, by virtue of his sacred relationship to Christ; but the Protestants look to Christ only as the dispenser of this blessing to men, and his ministers simply as messengers to declare the Divine will to men.

REPENTANCE, PENITENCE, CONTRITION, COMPUCTION, REMORSE.

Repentance, from re back, and penitit to be sorry, signifies looking back with sorrow on what one has done amiss; penitence, from the same source, signifies simply sorrow for what is amiss. Contrition, from contero to rub together, or bruise as it were with sorrow; compunction, from compungo to prick thoroughly; and remorse, from remordeo to have a gnawing pain; all express modes of penitence differing in degree and circumstance.

Repentance refers more to the change of one's mind with regard to an object, and is properly confined to the time when this change takes place; we therefore, strictly speaking, repent of a thing but once; we may, however, have penitence for the same thing all our lives. Repentance may be felt for trivial matters; we may repent of going or not going, speaking or not speaking; penitence refers only to serious matters; we are penitent only for our sins. Errors of judgement will always be attended with repentance in a mind that is striving to do right; there is no human being so perfect but that, in the sight of God, he will have occasion to be penitent for many acts of commission and omission.

Repentance may be felt for errors which concern only ourselves, or at most offences against our fellow creatures; penitence, and the other terms, are applicable only to offences against the moral and divine law, that law which is engraven on the heart of every man. We may repent of not having made a bargain that we afterward find would have been advantageous, or we may repent of having done any injury to our neighbour; but our penance is awakened when we reflect on our unworthiness or sinfulness in the sight of our Maker. This penitence is a general sentiment, which belongs to all men as offending creatures; but contrition, compunction, and remorse are awakened by reflecting on particular offences: contrition is a continued and severe sorrow, appropriate to one who has been in a continued state of peculiar sinfulness; compunction is rather an occasional, but sharp sorrow provoked by a single offence, or a moment's reflection. Remorse may be temporary, but it is a still sharper pain awakened by some particular offence of peculiar magnitude and atrocity. The prodigal son was a contrite sinner; the brethren of Joseph felt great compunction when they were carried back with their sacks to Egypt; David was struck with remorse for the murder of Uriah.

These four terms depend not so much on the measure of guilt as on the sensibility of the offender. Whoever reflects most deeply on the enormity of sin, will be most sensible of repentance, when he sees his own liability to offend; 'This is the sinner's hard lot, that the same thing which makes him need repentance, makes him also in danger of not obtaining it.'—SOUTH. In those who have most offended, and are come to a sense of their own condition, penitence will rise to deep contrition;

Heaven may forgive a crime to penitence,

For heaven can judge if penitence be true.—DRYDEN.

'Contrition, though it may melt, ought not to sink, or overpower the heart of a Christian.'—BLAIR. There is no man so hardened that he will not some time or other feel compunction for the crimes he has committed; 'All men, even the most depraved, are subject more or less to compunctions of conscience.'—BLAIR. He who has the liveliest sense of the Divine goodness, will feel keen remorse whenever he reflects on any thing that he has done, by which he fears to have forfeited the favour of so good a Being;

The heart,

Pierc'd with a sharp remorse for guilt, disclaims

The costly poverty of hecatombs,

And offers the best sacrifice itself.—JEFFREY.

CONSCIENTIOUS, SCRUPULOUS.

Conscientious marks the quality of having a nice conscience; scrupulous, that of having a scruple. Conscience, in Latin conscientia, from consciens, signifies that by which a man becomes conscious to himself of right and wrong. Scruple, in Latin scrupulus a little hard stone, signifies that which gives pain to the mind, as the stone does to the foot in walking.

Conscientious is to scrupulous as a whole to a part. A conscientious man is so altogether; a scrupulous man may have only particular scruples: the one is therefore always taken in a good sense; and the other at least in an indifferent, if not a bad sense.

A conscientious man does nothing to offend his conscience; 'A conscientious person would rather distrust his own judgement than condemn his species. He would say, I have observed without attention, or judged upon erroneous maxims; I have trusted to profession when I ought to have attended to conduct.' BURKE.—But a scrupulous man has often his scruples on trifling or minor points; 'Others by their weakness, and fear, and scrupulousness, cannot fully satisfy their own thoughts.'—PULLER. The Pharisees were scrupulous without being conscientious; we must therefore strive to be conscientious without being over scrupulous; 'I have been so very scrupulous in this particular, of not hurting any man's reputation, that I have forborne mentioning even such authors as I could not name with honour.'—ADDISON.

HOLINESS, SANCTITY.

Holiness, which comes from the northern languages, has altogether acquired a Christian signification; it respects the life and temper of a Christian; sanctity which is derived from the Latin sanctus and sanctio, to sanction, has merely a moral signification, which it derives from the sanction of human authority.

Holiness is to the mind of a man what sanctity is to his exterior; with this difference, that holiness to a certain degree, ought to belong to every man professing Christianity; but sanctity, as it lies in the manners, the outward garb, and deportment, is becoming only to certain persons, and at certain times.

Holiness is a thing not to be affected; it is that genuine characteristic of Christianity which is altogether spiritual, and cannot be counterfeited; 'Habitual preparation for the Sacrament consists in a permanent habit or principle of holiness.'—SOUTH. Sanctity, on the other hand, is from its very nature exposed to falsehood, and the least to be trusted; when it displays itself in individuals, either by the sorrowfulness of their looks, or the singular cut of their garments, or other singularities of action and gesture, it is of the most questionable nature; but in one who performs the sacerdotal office, it is a useful appendage to the solemnity of the scene, which excites a reverential regard to the individual in the mind of the beholder, and the most exalted sentiments of that religion which he thus adorns by his outward profession; 'About an age ago it was the fashion in England for every one that would be thought religious, to throw as much sanctity as possible into his face.'—ADDISON. 'It was an observation of the ancient Romans, that their empire had not increased more by the strength of their arms, than by the sanctity of their manners.'—ADDISON.

HOLY, PIOUS, DEVOUT, RELIGIOUS.

Holy is here taken in the sense of holiness, as in the preceding article; pious, in Latin pius, is most probably changed from dius or deus, signifying regard for the gods; devout, in Latin devotus, from devo to engage by a vow, signifies devoted or consecrated; religious, in Latin religiosus, comes from religio and religo, to bind, because religion binds the mind, and produces in it a fixed principle.

A strong regard to the Supreme Being is expressed by all these epithets; but holy conveys the most comprehensive idea; pious and devout designate most fervour of mind; religious is the most general and abstract in its signification. A holy man is in all respects heavenly-minded; he is more fit for heaven than earth: holiness, to whatever degree it is possessed, abstracts the thoughts from sublunary objects, and fixes them on things that are above; it is therefore a Christian quality, which is not to be attained in its full perfection by human beings, in their present imperfect state, and is attainable by some to a much greater degree than by others. Our Saviour was a perfect pattern of holiness; his apostles after him, and innumerable saints and good men, both in and out of the ministry, have striven to imitate his example, by the holiness of their life and conversation: in such, however, as have exclusively devoted themselves to his service, this holiness may shine brighter than in those who are entangled with the affairs of the world; 'The holiest man, by conversing with the world insensibly draws something of soil and taint from it.'—SOUTH.

Pious is a term more restricted in its signification, and consequently more extended in its application, than holy: piety is not a virtue peculiar to Christians, it is common to all believers in a Supreme Being; it is the homage of the heart and the affections to a superior Being: from a similarity in the relationship between a heavenly and an earthly parent, devotedness of the mind has in both cases been denominated piety. Piety towards God naturally produces piety towards parents, for the obedience of the heart, which gives rise to the virtue in the one, seems instantly to dictate the exercise of it in the other. The difference between holiness and piety is obvious from this, that our Saviour and his apostles are characterized as holy, but not pious, because piety is swallowed up in holiness. 'On the other hand, Jew and Gentile, Christian and Heathen, are alike termed pious, when they cannot be called holy, because piety is not only a more practicable virtue, but because it is more universally applicable to the dependant condition of man; 'In every age the practice has prevailed of substituting certain appearances of piety in the place of the great duties of humanity and mercy.'—BLAIR.

Devotion is a species of piety peculiar to the worshipper; it bespeaks that devotedness of mind which displays itself in the temple, when the individual seems by his outward services solemnly to devote himself, soul and body, to the service of his Maker; 'Devotion expresses not so much the performance of any particular duty, as the spirit which must animate all religious duties.'—BLAIR. Piety, therefore, lies in the heart, and may appear externally; but devotion does not properly exist except in an external observance: a man piously resigns himself to the will of God, in the midst of his afflictions; he prays devoutly in the bosom of his family; 'A state of temperance, sobriety, and justice, without devotion, is a lifeless insipid condition of virtue.'—ADDISON.

Religious is a term of less import than either of the other terms; it denotes little more than the simple existence of religion, or a sense of religion in the mind: the religious man is so, more in his principles than in his affections; he is religious in his sentiments, in as much as he directs all his views according to the will of his Maker; and he is religious in his conduct, in as much as he observes the outward formalities of homage that are due to his Maker. A holy man fits himself for a higher state of existence, after which he is always aspiring; a pious man has God in all his thoughts, and seeks to do his will; a devout man bends himself in humble adoration and pays his vows of prayer and thanksgiving; a religious man conforms in all things to what the dictates of his conscience require from him, as a responsible being, and a member of society.

When applied to things they preserve a similar distinction: we speak of the holy sacrament; of a pious discourse, a pious ejaculation; of a devout exercise, a devout air; a religious sentiment, a religious life, a religious education, &c.

HOLY, SACRED, DIVINE.

Holy is here, as in the former article, a term of higher import than either sacred or divine: sacred, in Latin sacer, is derived either from the Greek ἅγιος holy or ἁγός whole, perfect, and the Hebrew zakah pure. Whatever is most intimately connected with religion and religious worship, in its purest state, is holy, is unhallowed by a mixture of inferior objects, is elevated in the greatest possible degree, so as to suit the nature of an infinitely perfect and exalted Being. Among the Jews, the holy of holies was that place which was intended to approach the nearest to the heavenly abode, consequently was preserved as much as possible from all contamination with that which is earthly, among Christians, that religion or form of religion is termed holy, which is esteemed purest in its doctrine, discipline, and ceremonies, and is applied with equal propriety by the Roman Catholics and the English Protestants to that which they have in common; 'To fit us for a due access to the holy Sacrament, we must add actual preparation to habitual.'—SOUTH. Upon this ground we speak of the church as a holy place, of the sacrament as the holy sacrament, and the ordinances of the church as holy.

Sacred is less than holy; the sacred derives its sanction from human institutions, and is connected rather with our moral than our religious duties: what is holy is altogether spiritual, and abstracted from the earthly; what is sacred may be simply the human purified from what is gross and corrupt: what is holy must be regarded with awe, and treated with every possible mark of reverence; what is sacred must not be violated nor infringed upon. The laws are sacred, but not holy; a man's word should be sacred, though not holy; for neither of these things is to be revered, but both are to be kept free from injury or external violence. The holy is not so much opposed to, as it is set above every thing else; the sacred is opposed to the profane the Scriptures are properly denominated holy, because they are the word of God, and the fruit of his Holy Spirit; but other writings may be termed sacred which appertain to religion, in distinction from the profane, which appertain only to worldly matters; 'Common sense could tell them, that the good God could not be pleased with any thing cruel, nor the most holy God with any thing filthy and unclean.'—SOUTH. 'Religion properly consists in a reverential esteem of things sacred.'—SOUTH.

Divine is a term of even less import than sacred; it signifies either belonging to the Deity, or being like the Deity; but from the looseness of its application it has lost in some respects the dignity of its meaning. The divine is often contrasted with the human: but there are many human things which are denominated divine: Milton's poem is entitled a divine poem, not merely on account of the subject, but from the exalted manner in which the poet has treated his subject: what is divine, therefore, may be so superlatively excellent as to be conceived of as having the stamp of inspiration from the Deity, which of course, as it respects human performances, is but a hyperbolical mode of speech.

From the above explanation of these terms, it is clear that there is a manifest difference between them, and yet that their resemblance is sufficiently great for them to be applied to the same objects. We speak of the Holy Spirit, and of Divine inspiration; by the first of which epithets is understood not only what is superhuman, but what is a constituent part of the Deity; by the second is represented merely in a general manner the source of the inspiration as coming from the Deity, and not from man; 'When a man resteth and assureth himself upon Divine protection, he gathereth a force and faith which human nature in itself could not obtain.'—BACON. Subjects are denominated either sacred or divine, as when we speak of sacred poems, or divine hymns; sacred here characterizes the subjects of the poems, as those which are to be held sacred; and divine designates the subject of the hymns as not being ordinary or merely human; it is clear, therefore, that what is holy is in its very nature sacred, but not vice versa; and that what is holy and sacred is in its very nature divine; but the divine is not always either holy or sacred.

GODLIKE, DIVINE, HEAVENLY.

Godlike bespeaks its own meaning, as like God, or after the manner of God; divine, in Latin divinus from divus or Deus, signifies appertaining to God; heavenly, or heavenlike, signifies like or appertaining to heaven.

Godlike is a more expressive, but less common term than divine; the former is used only as an epithet of peculiar praise for a particular object; divine is generally employed for that which appertains to a superior being, in distinction from that which is human. Benevolence is a godlike property:

Sure he that made us with such large discourse,
Looking before and after, gave us not
That capability and godlike reason,
To rust in us unused.—SHAKESPEARE.

The Divine image is stamped on the features of man, whence the face is called by Milton 'the human face Divine.' 'The benefit of nature's light is not thought excluded as unnecessary, because the necessity of a divine light is magnified.'—HOOKER. Divine is however frequently used by the poets for what is super-excellent.

Of all that see or read thy comedies,
Whoever in those glasses looks may find
The spots return'd, or graces of his mind;
And by the help of so divine an art,
At leisure view and dress his nobler part.

WALLER.

As divine is opposed to human, so is heavenly to earthly: the Divine Being is a term of distinction for the Creator from all other beings; but a heavenly being denotes the angels or inhabitants of heaven, in distinction from earthly beings or the inhabitants of earth. A divine influence is to be sought for only by prayer to the Giver of all good things; but a heavenly temper may be acquired by a steady contemplation of heavenly things, and an abstraction from those which are earthly. The Divine will is the foundation of all moral law and obligation;

Instructed you'd explore
Divine contrivance, and a God adore.—BLACKMORE
Heavenly joys are the fruit of all our labours in this earthly course;

Reason, alas! It does not know itself;
But man, vain man! would with his short-lin'd plummet

Fathom the vast abyss of heavenly justice.—DRYDEN.

GODLY, RIGHTEOUS.

Godly is a contraction of godlike (v. Godlike); righteous signifies conformable to right or truth.

These epithets are both used in a spiritual sense, and cannot, without an indecorous affectation of religion, be introduced into any other discourse than that which is properly spiritual. Godliness, in the strict sense, is that outward deportment which characterizes a heavenly temper; prayer, reading of the Scriptures, public worship, and every religious act, enters into the signification of godliness, which at the same time supposes a temper of mind, not only to delight in, but to profit by such exercises: 'The same church is really holy in this world, in relation to all godly persons contained in it, by a real infused sanctity.'—PEARSON. Righteousness on the other hand comprehends Christian morality, in distinction from that of the heathen or unbeliever; a righteous man does right, not only because it is right, but because it is agreeable to the will of his Maker, and the example of his Redeemer: righteousness is therefore to godliness as the effect to the cause; 'It is the gospel's work to reduce man to the principles of his first creation, that is, to be both good and wise. Our ancestors, it seems, were clearly of this opinion. He that was pious and just was reckoned a righteous man. Godliness and integrity were called and accounted righteousness. And in their old Saxon righteousness was rightwise, and righteousness was originally rightwiseness.'—FELTHAM. The godly man goes to the sanctuary and by converse with his Maker assimilates all his affections to the character of that being whom he worships; when he leaves the sanctuary he proves the efficacy of his godliness by his righteous converse with his fellow-creatures. It is easy however for men to mistake the means for the end, and to rest with godliness without righteousness, as too many are apt to do who seem to make their whole duty to consist in an attention to religious observances, and in the indulgence of extravagant feelings; 'It hath been the great design of the devil and his instruments in all ages to undermine religion, by making an unhappy separation and divorce between godliness, and morality. But let us not deceive ourselves; this was always religion, and the condition of our acceptance with God, to endeavour to be like God in purity and holiness, in justice and righteousness.'—TILLOTSON.

SECULAR, TEMPORAL, WORLDLY.

Secular in Latin secularis, from seculum an age or division of time, signifies belonging to time, or this life; temporal, in Latin temporalis, from tempus time, signifies lasting only for a time; worldly signifies after the manner of the world.

Secular is opposed to ecclesiastical or spiritual, temporal and worldly are opposed to spiritual or eternal.

The ideas of the world, or the outward objects and pursuits of the world, in distinction from that which is set above the world, is implied in common by all the terms; but secular is an indifferent term, applicable to the allowed pursuits and concerns of men; temporal is used either in an indifferent or a bad sense; and worldly mostly in a bad sense, as contrasted with things of more value.

The office of a clergyman is ecclesiastical, but that of a schoolmaster is secular, which is frequently vested in the same hands; 'This, in several men's actions of common life, appertaineth unto moral; in publick and politick secular affairs, unto civil wisdom.'—HOOKER. The upper house of parliament consists of lords spiritual and temporal; 'There is scarce any of those decisions but gives good light, by way of authority or reason, to some questions that arise also between temporal dignities, especially to cases wherein some of our subordinate temporal titles have part in the controversy.'—SELDEN. Worldly interest has a more powerful sway upon the minds of the great bulk of mankind, than their spiritual interests; 'Compare the happiness of men and beasts no farther than it results from worldly advantages.'—ATTERBURY. Whoever enters into the holy office of the ministry with merely secular views of preferment, chooses a very unfit source of emolument; 'Some saw nothing in what has been done in France but a firm and temperate exertion of freedom, so consistent with morals and piety, as to make it deserving not only of the secular applause of dashing Machiavelian politicians, but to make it a fit theme for all the devout effusions of sacred eloquence.'—BURKE. A too eager pursuit after temporal advantages and temporal pleasures is apt to draw the mind away from its regard to those which are eternal; 'The ultimate purpose of government is temporal, and that of religion is eternal happiness.'—JOHNSON. Worldly applause will weigh very light when set in the balance against the reproach of one's own conscience; 'Worldly things are of such quality as to lessen upon dividing.'—GROVE.

ENTHUSIAST, FANATICK, VISIONARY.

The enthusiast, fanatick, and visionary have disordered imaginations; but the enthusiast is only affected inwardly with an extraordinary fervour, the fanatick and visionary betray that fervour by some outward mark; the former by singularities of conduct, the latter by singularities of doctrine. Fanaticks and visionaries are therefore always more or less enthusiasts; but enthusiasts are not always fanaticks or visionaries. ἔνθουζασι among the Greeks, from ἐν in and θεός; God, signified those supposed to have, or pretending to have, Divine inspiration. Fanatici were so called among the Latins, from fana the temples in which they spent an extraordinary portion of their time; they, like the ἐνθουζασι of the Greeks, pretended to revelations and inspirations, during the influence of which they indulged themselves in many extravagant tricks, cutting themselves with knives, and distorting themselves with every species of antick gesture and grimace.

Although we are professors of a pure religion, yet we cannot boast an exemption from the extravagancies which are related of the poor heathens; we have many who indulge themselves in similar practices under the idea of honouring their Maker and Redeemer. There are fanaticks who profess to be under extraordinary influences of the spirit; and there are enthusiasts whose intemperate zeal disqualifies them for taking a beneficial part in the sober and solemn services of the church. Visionary signifies properly one who deals in visions, that is, in the pretended appearance of supernatural objects; a species of enthusiasts who have sprung up in more modern times. The leaders of sects are commonly visionaries, having adopted this artifice to establish their reputation and doctrines among their deluded followers; Mahomet was one of the most successful visionaries that ever pretended to divine inspiration; and since his time there have been visionaries, particularly in England, who have raised religious parties, by having recourse to the same expedient: of this description was Swedenborg, Huntington, and Brothers.

Fanatick was originally confined to those who were under religious frenzy, but the present age has presented us with the monstrosity of fanaticks in irreligion and anarchy; 'They who will not believe that the philosophical fanaticks who guide in these matters have long entertained the design (of abolishing religion), are utterly ignorant of their character.'—BURKE. Enthusiast is a term applied in general to every one who is filled with an extraordinary degree of fervour;

Her little soul is ravish'd, and so pour'd
Into loose ecstasies, that she is placed
Above herself, Musick's enthusiast.—CRASHAW.

Enthusiasts pretend that they have the gift of prophecy by dreams.'—PAGITT'S HERMISTOGRAPHY. Visionary is a term applied to one who deals in fanciful speculation; 'This account exceeded all the Nottambuli or visionaries I have met with.'—TURNER. The former may sometimes be innocent, if not laudable, according to the nature of the object; the latter is always censurable: the enthusiast has mostly a warm heart; the visionary has only a fanciful head. The enthusiast will mostly be on the side of virtue even though in an error; the visionary pleads no cause but his own. The enthusiast suffers his imagination to follow his heart; the visionary makes his understanding bend to his imagination. Although in matters of religion, enthusiasm should be cautiously guarded against, yet we admire to see it roused in behalf of one's country and one's friends; 'Cherish true religion as precious as you will, fly with abhorrence and contempt, superstition and enthusiasm.'—CHATHAM. Visionaries, whether in religion, politics, or science, are dangerous as members of society, and offensive as companions; 'The sons of infamy ridicule every thing as romantick that comes in competition with their present interest, and treat those persons as visionaries who dare stand up in a corrupt age, for what has not its immediate reward joined to it.'—ADDISON.

DREAM, REVERIE.

Dream, in Dutch drom, &c. comes either from the Celtic drem, a sight, or the Greek δρῆμα, a fable, or as probably from the word roam, signifying to wander, in Hebrew רָמַח to be agitated; reverie, in French reverie, like the English rave, comes from the Latin rabies, signifying that which is wandering or incoherent.

Dreams and reveries are alike opposed to the reality, and have their origin in the imagination; but the former commonly pass in sleep, and the latter when awake: the dream may and does commonly arise when the imagination is in a sound state; the reverie is the fruit of a heated imagination; 'Reverie is when ideas float in our mind, without reflection or regard of the understanding.'—LOCKE. Dreams come in the course of nature; reveries are the consequence of a peculiar ferment.

When the dream is applied to the act of one that is awake, it admits of another distinction from reverie. They both designate what is confounded, but the dream is less extravagant than the reverie. Ambitious men please themselves with dreams of future greatness; enthusiasts debase the purity of the Christian religion by blending their own wild reveries with the doctrines of the Gospel. He who indulges himself in idle dreams lays up a store of disappointment for himself when he recovers his recollection, and finds that it is nothing but a dream; 'Gay's friends persuaded him to sell his share of South-sea stock, but he dreamed of dignity and splendour, and could not bear to obstruct his own fortune.'—JOHNSON. A love of singularity operating on an ardent mind will too often lead men to indulge in strange reveries; 'I continued to sit motionless, with my eyes fixed upon the curtain, some moments after it fell. When I was roused from my reverie I found myself almost alone.'—HAWKSWORTH.

IRRATIONAL, FOOLISH, ABSURD, PREPOSTEROUS.

Irrational, compounded of ir or in and ratio, signifies contrary to reason, and is employed to express the want of the faculty itself, or a deficiency in the exercise of this faculty; foolish denotes the perversion of this faculty; absurd, from surdus, deaf, signifies that to which one would turn a deaf ear; preposterous from præ before and post behind, signifies literally that side foremost which is unnatural and contrary to common sense.

Irrational is not so strong a term as foolish: it is applicable more frequently to the thing than to the person, to the principle than to the practice; 'The schemes of freethinkers are altogether irrational, and require the most extravagant credulity to embrace them.'—ADDISON. Foolish on the contrary is commonly applicable to the person as well as the thing, to the practice rather than the principle; 'The same well meaning gentleman took occasion at another time to bring together such of his friends as were addicted to a foolish habitual custom of swearing, in order to show them the absurdity of the practice.'—ADDISON. Skepticism is the most irrational thing that exists; the human mind is formed to believe, but not to doubt: he is of all men most foolish who stakes his eternal salvation on his own fancied superiority of intelligence and illumination. Foolish, absurd, and preposterous, rise in degree; a violation of common sense is implied by them all, but they vary according to the degree of violence which is done to the understanding: foolish is applied to any thing, however trivial, which in the smallest degree offends our understandings: the conduct of children is therefore often foolish, but not absurd and preposterous, which are said only of serious things that are opposed to our judgements: it is absurd for a man to persuade another to do that which he is like circumstances would object to do himself;

But grant that those can conquer, these can cheat,
'Tis phrase absurd to call a villain great;
Who wickedly is wise or madly brave
Is but the more a fool, the more a knave.—POPE.

It is preposterous for a man to expose himself to the ridicule of others, and then be angry with those who will not treat him respectfully; 'By a preposterous desire of things in themselves indifferent men forego the enjoyment of that happiness which those things are instrumental to obtain.'—BERKELEY

IRRELIGIOUS, PROFANE, IMPIOUS.

As epithets to designate the character of the person, they seem to rise in degree. the irreligious is negative; the profane and impious are positive; the latter being much stronger than the former: The profane of the Latins, from pro and fano, i. e. procul a fano, far from the temple, were those not initiated, who were not permitted to take any part in the sacred mysteries and rites, whence by a natural consequence those who despised what was sacred. All men who are not positively actuated by principles of religion are irreligious; 'An officer of the army in Roman Catholic countries, would be afraid to pass for an irreligious man if he should be seen to go to bed without offering up his devotions.'—ADDISON. Who, if we include all such as show a disregard to the outward observances of religion, form a too numerous class: profanity and impiety are however of a still more heinous nature; they consist not in the mere absence of regard for religion, but in a positive contempt of it and open outrage against its laws; the profane man treats what is sacred as if it were profane; 'These have caused the weak to stumble and the profane to blaspheme, offending the one and hardening the other.'—SOUTH. What a believer holds in reverence, and utters with awe, is pronounced with an air of indifference or levity, and as a matter of common discourse, by a profane man; he knowing no difference between sacred and profane; but as the former may be converted into a source of scandal towards others; 'Fly, ye profane; if not, draw near with awe.'—YOUNG. The impious man is directly opposed to the pious man; the former is filled with defiance and rebellion against his Maker, as the latter is with love and fear; the former curses, while the latter prays; the former is bloated with pride and conceit: the latter is full of humility and self-abasement: we have a picture of the former in the devils, and of the latter in the saints. When applied to things, the term irreligious seems to be somewhat more positively opposed to religion: an irreligious book is not merely one in which there is no religion, but that also which is detrimental to religion, such as skeptical or licentious writings: the profane in this case is not always a term of reproach, but is employed to distinguish what is expressly spiritual in its nature, from that which is temporal: the history of nations is profane, as distinguished from the sacred history contained in the Bible: the writings of the heathens are altogether profane as distinguished from the moral writings of Christians, or the believers in Divine Revelation. On the other hand, when we speak of a profane sentiment, or a profane joke, profane lips, and the like, the sense is personal and reproachful; 'Nothing is profane that serveth to holy things.'—RALEIGH. Impious is never applied but to what is personal, and in the very worst sense; an impious thought, an impious wish, or an impious vow, are the fruits of an impious mind;

Love's great divinity rashly maintains
Weak impious war with an immortal God.

CUMBERLAND.

TO FORSWEAR, PERJURE, SUBORN.

Forswear is Saxon; perjure is Latin; the preposition for and per are both privative, and the words signify literally to swear contrary to the truth; this is, however, not their only distinction: to forswear is applied to all kinds of oaths; to perjure is employed only for such oaths as have been administered by the civil magistrate.

A soldier forswears himself who breaks his oath of allegiance by desertion; and a subject forswears himself who takes an oath of allegiance to his Majesty which he afterward violates;

False as thou art, and more than false forsworn!
Not sprung from noble blood, nor goddess born;
Why should I own? what worse have I to fear?

DRYDEN.

A man perjures himself in a court of law who swears to the truth of that which he knows to be false; 'The common oath of the Scythian was by the sword and the fire, for that they accounted those two special divine powers which should work vengeance on the perjurers.'—SPENSER. Forswear is used only in the proper sense; perjure may be used figuratively with regard to lovers' vows; he who deserts his mistress to whom he has pledged his affection is a perjured man;

Be gone, for ever leave this happy sphere;

For perjur'd lovers have no mansions here.—LEE.

Forswear and perjure are the acts of individuals; suborn, from the Latin subornare, signifies to make to forswear; a perjured man has all the guilt upon himself; but he who is suborned shares his guilt with the suborner,

They were suborn'd;

Matcolm and Donalbain, the king's two sons,

Are stole away and fled.—SHAKESPEARE

DEVIL, DEMON.

Devil, in old German tielf, Saxon deofl, Welsh diafol, French diable, Italian diavolo, Dutch duyfel, Greek διδυλος, from διαδύλλω, to traduce, signifies properly a calumniator, and is always taken in the bad sense, for the spirit which incites to evil, and tempts men through the medium of their evil passions; demon, in Latin dæmon, Greek δαίμων, from δῶω to know, signifies one knowing, that is, having preter-natural knowledge, and is taken either in a bad or good sense for the power that acts within us and controls our actions.

Since the *devil is represented as the father of all wickedness, associations have been connected with the name that render its pronunciation in familiar discourse offensive to the chastened ear; while demon is a term of indifferent application, that is commonly substituted in its stead to designate either a good or an evil spirit.

Among Jews and Christians the term demon is taken always in a bad sense; but the Greeks and Romans understood by the word dæmon any spirit or genius good or evil, but particularly the good spirit or guardian angel, who was supposed to accompany a man from his birth. Socrates professed to be always under the direction of such a dæmon, and his example has been followed by other heathen philosophers, particularly those of the Platonic sect. Hence the use of these terms in ordinary discourse, the devil being always considered as the supernatural agent, who, by the divine permission, acts on the hearts and minds of men; but a demon is applied generally and indefinitely in the sense of any spirit. The devil is said in proverbial discourse to be in such things as go contrary to the wish; the demon of jealousy is said to possess the mind that is altogether carried away with that passion. Men who wish to have credit for more goodness than they possess, and to throw the load of guilt off themselves, attribute to the devil a perpetual endeavour to draw them into the commission of crimes; 'The enemies we are to contend with are not men but devils.'—TILLOTSON. Wherever the demon of discord has got admittance, there is a farewell to all the comforts of social life; 'My good demon, who sat at my right hand during the course of this whole vision, observing in me a burning desire to join that glorious company, told me he highly approved of that generous ardour with which I seemed transported.'—ADDISON.

HERETICK, SCHISMATICK, SECTARIAN OR SECTARY, DISSENTER, NONCONFORMIST.

A heretick is the maintainer of heresy (v. Heterodox); the schismatick is the author or promoter of schism; the sectarian or sectary is the member of a sect; the dissenter is one who dissents from the establishment; and the nonconformist one who does not conform to the establishment. A man is a heretick only for matters of faith and doctrine, but he is a schismatick in matters of discipline and practice. The heretick therefore is not always a schismatick, nor the schismatick a heretick. Whoever holds the doctrines that are common to the Roman Catholic and the reformed Churches, is not a heretick in the Protestant sense of the word; although he may in many outward formalities be a schismatick. The Calvinists are not hereticks, but they are for the most part schismaticks; on the other hand, there are many members of the establishment, who hold though they do not avow heretical notions.

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Diable, demon

The heretick is considered as such with regard to the Catholic Church, or the whole body of Christians, holding the same fundamental principles; 'When a Papist uses the word hereticks he generally means Protestants, when a Protestant uses the word, he generally means any persons wilfully and contentiously obstinate in fundamental errors.'—WATTS. But the schismatick and sectarian are considered as such with regard to particular established bodies of Christians. Schism, from the Greek σχίσμα, to split, denotes an action, and the schismatick is an agent who splits for himself in his own individual capacity: the sectarian does not expressly perform a part, he merely holds a relation; he does not divide any thing himself, but belongs to that which is already cut or divided. The schismatick, therefore, takes upon himself the whole moral responsibility of the schism; but the sectarian does not necessarily take an active part in the measures of his sect: whatever guilt attaches to schism attaches to the schismatick; he is a voluntary agent, who acts from an erroneous principle, if not an unchristian temper: the sectarian is often an involuntary agent; he follows that to which he has been incidentally attached. It is possible, therefore, to be a schismatick, and not a sectarian; as also to be a sectarian, and not a schismatick. Those professed members of the establishment who affect the title of evangelical, and wish to palm upon the Church the peculiarities of the Calvinistic doctrine, and to ingraft their own modes and forms into its discipline, are schismaticks, but not sectarians; 'The schismaticks disturb the sweet peace of our Church.'—HOWEL. On the other hand, those who by birth and education are attached to a sect, are sectarians, but not always schismaticks; 'In the house of Sir Samuel Luke, one of Cromwell's officers, Butler observed so much of the character of the sectaries, that he is said to have written or begun his poem at this time.'—JOHNSON. Consequently, schismatick is a term of much greater reproach than sectarian.

The schismatick and sectarian have a reference to any established body of Christians of any country; but dissenter is a term applicable only to the inhabitants of Great Britain, and bearing relation only to the established Church of England: it includes not only those who have individually and personally renounced the doctrines of the Church, but those who are in a state of dissent or difference from it. Dissenters are not necessarily either schismaticks or sectarians, for British Roman Catholics, and the Presbyterians of Scotland, are all dissenters, although they are the reverse of what is understood by schismatick and sectarian: it is equally clear that all schismaticks and sectarians are not dissenters, because every established community of Christians, all over the world, have had individuals, or smaller bodies of individuals, setting themselves up against them: the term dissenter being in a great measure technical, it may be applied individually or generally without conveying any idea of reproach; 'Of the dissenters, Swift did not wish to infringe the toleration, but he opposed their encroachments.'—JOHNSON. The same may be said of nonconformist, which is a more special term, including only such as do not conform to some established or national religion; 'Watts is at least one of the few poets with whom youth and ignorance may be safely pleased; and happy will that reader be, whose mind is disposed, by his verses or his prose, to imitate him in all but his nonconformity.'—JOHNSON. Consequently, all members of the Romish Church, or of the Kirk of Scotland, are excluded from the number of nonconformists; while, on the other hand, all British-born subjects, not adhering to these two forms, and at the same time renouncing the established form of their country, are of this number, among whom may be reckoned Independents, Presbyterians, Baptists, Quakers, Methodists, and all other such sects as have been formed since the reformation.

HETERODOXY, HERESY.

Heterodoxy, from the Greek ἑτερος and δόξη, signifies another or a different doctrine; heresy, from the Greek αἵρεσις a choice, signifies an opinion adopted by individual choice.

* To be of a different persuasion is heterodoxy; to have a faith of one's own is heresy; the heterodoxy characterizes the opinions formed; the heresy characterizes the individual forming the opinion: the heterodoxy exists independently and for itself; 'All wrong notions in religion are ranked under the general name of heterodox.'—GOLDING. The heresy sets itself up against others; 'Heterodoxies, false doctrines, yea, and heresies, may be propagated by prayer as well as preaching.'—BULL. As all division supposes error either on one side or on both, the words heterodoxy and heresy are applied only to human opinions, and strictly in the sense of a false opinion, formed in distinction from that which is better founded; but the former respects any opinions, important or otherwise; the latter refers only to matters of importance: the heresy is therefore a fundamental error. There has been much heterodoxy in the Christian world at all times, and among these have been heresies denying the plainest and most serious truths which have been acknowledged by the great body of Christians since the Apostles.

OMEN, PROGNOSTICK, PRESAGE.

All these terms express some token or sign of what is to come; omen, in Latin omen, probably comes from the Greek οἶμα to think, because it is what gives rise to much conjecture; prognostick, in Greek προγνωστικόν, from προγνώσκω, to know before, signifies the sign by which one judges a thing before hand, because a prognostick is rather a deduction by the use of the understanding; the presage is the sentiment of presaging, or the thing by which one presages.

The omen and prognostick are both drawn from external objects; the presage is drawn from one's own feelings. The omen is drawn from objects that have no necessary connexion with the thing they are made to represent; it is the fruit of the imagination, and rests on superstition: the prognostick, on the contrary, is a sign which partakes in some degree of the quality of the thing denoted. Omens were drawn by the heathens from the flight of birds, or the entrails of beasts; 'Aves dant omnia dira.'—TRIBULLUS. And oftentimes from different incidents; thus Ulysses, when landed on his native island, prayed to Jupiter that he would give him a double sign by which he might know that he should be permitted to slay the suitors of his wife; and when he heard the thunder, and saw a maiden supplicating the gods in the temple, he took these for omens that he should immediately proceed to put in execution his design; the omen was therefore considered as a supernatural sign sent for a particular purpose; 'A signal omen stopp'd the passing host.'—POPE. Prognosticks, on the other hand, are discovered only by an acquaintance with the objects in which they exist, as the prognosticks of a mortal disease are known to none so well as the physician; the prognosticks of a storm or tempest are best known to the mariner;

Though your prognosticks run too fast,
They must be verified at last.—SWIFT.

In an extended sense, the word omen is also applied to objects which serve as a sign, or enable a person to draw a rational inference, which brings it nearer in sense to the prognostick and the presage; but the omen may be used of that which is either good or bad, the prognostick mostly of that which is bad. It is an omen of our success, if we find those of whom we have to ask a favour in a good humour; 'Hammond would steal from his fellows into places of his privacy there to say his prayers, omens of his future pacific temper and eminent devotion.'—FELL. The spirit of discontent which pervades the countenances and discourse of a people is a prognostick of some popular commotion;

Careful observers

By sure prognosticks may foretell a shower.—SWIFT.

Presage, when signifying a sentiment, is commonly applied to what is unfavourable; 'I know but one way of fortifying my soul against these gloomy presages that is, by securing to myself the protection of that Being who disposes of events.'—ADDISON. But when taken for that by which one presages, it is understood favourably, or in an indifferent sense. The quickness of powers discoverable in a boy is sometimes a presage of his future greatness;

Ours joy fill'd, and shout
Presage of victory.—MILTON.

• O AUGUR, PRESAGE, FOREBODE, BETOKEN, PORTEND.

Augur, in French augurer, Latin augurium, comes from avis a bird, as an augury was originally, and at all times, principally drawn from the song, the flight, or other actions of birds. The augurium of the Latins, and the olōvovra of the Greeks, was a species of divination practised by the augurs, who professed to foretell events, either from the heavenly phenomena, from the chattering or flight of birds, from the sacred chickens, according to the manner of their eating their meat; from quadrupeds, such as wolves, foxes, goats, &c.; or, lastly, from what they called the dira, or the accidents which befell persons, as sneezing, stumbling, spilling salt, or meeting particular objects; whence by a natural extension in the meaning of the term, it has been used to signify any conjecture respecting futurity. Presage, in French présage, from the Latin præ and sagio to be instinctively wise, signifies to be thus wise about what is to come; forebode is compounded of fore, and the Saxon bodan, and the English bid, to offer or to declare, signifying to pronounce on futurity; betoken signifies to serve as a token; portend, in Latin portendo, compounded of por for pro and tendo, signifies to set or show forth.

To augur signifies either to serve or make use of as an augury; to forebode and presage is to form a conclusion in one's own mind: to betoken or portend is to serve as a sign. Persons or things augur or presage; persons only forebode; things only betoken or portend. Auguring is a calculation of some future event, in which the imagination seems to be much concerned as the understanding; presaging rather a conclusion or deduction of what may be from what is; it lies in the understanding more than in the imagination; foreboding lies altogether in the imagination. Things are said to betoken, which present natural signs; those are said to portend, which present extraordinary or supernatural signs.

It augurs ill for the prosperity of a country or a state when its wealth has increased so as to take away the ordinary stimulus to industry, and to introduce an inordinate love of pleasure; 'There is always an augury to be taken of what a peace is likely to be, from the preliminary steps that are made to bring it about.'—BURKE. We presage the future greatness of a man from the indications which he gives of possessing an elevated character; 'An opinion has been long conceived, that quickness of invention, accuracy of judgement, or extent of knowledge, appearing before the usual time, presage a short life.'—JOHNSON. A distempered mind is apt to forebode every ill from the most trivial circumstances; 'What conscience forebodes, revelation verifies, assuring us that a day is appointed when God will render to every man according to his works.'—BLAIR. We see with pleasure those actions in a child which betoken an ingenuous temper;

All more than common menaces an end:

A blaze betokens brevity of life,

As if bright embers should emit a flame.—YOUNG.

A mariner sees with pain the darkness of the sky which portends a storm;

Skill'd in the wing'd inhabitants of the air,

What auspices their notes and flights declare,

O! say—for all religious rites portend

A happy voyage and a prosperous end.—DRYDEN

The moralist augurs no good to the morals of a nation from the lax discipline which prevails in the education of youth; he presages the loss of independence to the minds of men in whom proper principles of subordination have not been early engendered. Men sometimes forebode the misfortunes which happen to them, but they oftener forebode evils which never come.

TO FORETELL, PREDICT, PROPHECY, PROGNOSTICATE.

To foretell, compounded of fore and tell; predict, from præ and dico; prophecy, in French prophetiser, Latin prophetisio, Greek προφητεῖν, all signify to tell, expound, or declare what is to happen, and convey the idea of a verbal communication of futurity to others prognosticate, from the Greek προγνώσκειν to know beforehand, to bode or imagine to one's self before hand, denotes the action of feeling rather than speaking of things to come.

• Foretell is the most general in its sense, and familiar in its application; we foretell common events; we may predict that which is common or uncommon; prophecies are for the most part important; foretelling is an ordinary gift; one foretells by a simple calculation or guess;

Above the rest, the sun, who never lies

Foretells the change of weather in the skies.

DRYDEN.

To predict and prophecy are extraordinary gifts; one predicts either by a superiour degree of intelligence, or by a supernatural power real or supposed; 'The consequences of suffering the French to establish themselves in Scotland, are predicted with great accuracy and discernment.'—ROBERTSON. 'In Christ they all meet with an invincible evidence, as if they were not predictions, but after relations; and the penmen of them not prophets, but evangelists.'—SOUTH. One propheesies by means of inspiration real or supposed;

An ancient augur propheesied from hence,
 "Behold on Latician shores a foreign prince!"

DRYDEN.

Men of discernment and experience easily foretell the events of undertakings which fall under their notice. The priests among the heathens, like the astrologers and conjurers of more modern times, pretended to predict events that effected nations and empires. The gift of prophecy was one among the number of the supernatural gifts communicated to the primitive Christians by the Holy Ghost. 'No arguments made a stronger impression on these Pagan converts, than the predictions relating to our Saviour, in those old prophetic writings deposited among the hands of the greatest enemies to Christianity.'—ANDERSON.

Prediction as a noun is employed for both the verbs foretell and predict; it is therefore a term of less value than prophecy. We speak of a prediction being verified, and a prophecy fulfilled: the predictions of almanack-makers respecting the weather are as seldom verified as the prophecies of visionaries and enthusiasts are fulfilled respecting the death of princes or the affairs of governments. To prognosticate is an act of the understanding; it is guided by outward symptoms as a rule; it is only stimulated and not guided by outward objects; a physician prognosticates the crisis of a disorder by the symptoms discoverable in the patient, 'Who that should view the small beginnings of some persons could imagine or prognosticate those vast increases of fortune that have afterward followed them'—SOUTH.

CONJECTURE, SUPPOSITION, SURMISE.

Conjecture, in French conjecture, Latin conjectura from conjicio or con and jacio to throw together, signifies the thing put together or framed in the mind without design or foundation; supposition, in French supposition, from suppono, compounded of sub and pono to put in the place of a thing, signifies to one's thoughts in the place of reality; surmise, compounded of sur or sub and misc, Latin missus a p.ciple of mitto to send or put forth, has an original meaning similar to the former.

All these terms convey an idea of something in the mind independent of the reality; but conjecture is founded less on rational inference than supposition; and surmise less than either; any circumstance, however trivial, may give rise to a conjecture; some reasons are requisite to produce a supposition; a particular state of feeling or train of thinking may of itself create a surmise.

Although the same epithets are generally applicable to all these terms, yet we may with propriety say that a conjecture is idle; a supposition false; a surmise fanciful.

Conjectures are employed on events, their causes, consequences, and contingencies; 'In the casting of lots, a man cannot, upon any ground of reason, bring the event so much as under conjecture.'—SOUTH. Supposition is concerned in speculative points; 'This is only an infallibility upon supposition, that if a thing be true it is impossible to be false.'—TILLOTSON. Surmise is employed on personal concerns; 'To let go private surmises whereby the thing is not made better or worse; if just and allowable reasons might lead them to do as they did, then are these censures frustrated.'—HOKER. The secret measures of government give rise to various conjectures; all the suppositions which are formed respecting comets seem at present to fall short of the truth: the behaviour of a person will often occasion a surmise respecting his intentions and proceedings, let them be ever so disguised. Antiquarians and etymologists deal much in conjectures; they have ample scope afforded them for asserting what can be neither proved nor denied; 'Persons of studious and contemplative natures often entertain themselves with the history of past ages, or raise schemes and conjectures upon futurity.'—ADDISON. Religionists are pleased to build many suppositions of a doctrinal nature on the Scriptures, or, more properly, on their own partial and forced interpretations of the Scriptures; 'Even in that part which we have of the journey to Canterbury, it will be necessary, in the following Review of Chaucer, to take notice of certain defects and inconsistencies, which can only be accounted for upon the supposition that the work was never finished by the author.'—TYRWHITT. It is the part of prudence, as well as justice, not to express any surmises which we may entertain, either as to the character or conduct of others, which may not redound to their credit; 'Any the least surmise of neglect has raised an aversion in one man to another.'—SOUTH.

TO CONJECTURE, GUESS, DIVINE

Conjecturing, in the same sense as before (vide Conjecture), in nearly allied to guessing and divining; guess, in Saxon and Low German gissen, is connected with the word ghost, and the German geist, &c. spirit, signifying the action of a spirit; divine, from the Latin divinus and Deus a God, signifies to think and know as independently as a God.

We conjecture that which may be; 'When we look upon such things as equally may or may not be, human reason can then, at the best, but conjecture what will be.'—SOUTH. We guess that a thing actually is or was;

Incapable and shallow innocents!

You cannot guess who caused your father's death.

SHAKESPEARE.

We conjecture at the meaning of a person's actions; we guess that it is a certain hour. The conjecturing is opposed to the full conviction of a thing; the guessing is opposed to the certain knowledge of a thing;

And these discoveries make us all confess

That sublimary science is guess.—DENHAM.

A child guesses at that portion of his lesson which he has not properly learned; a fanciful person employs conjecture where he cannot draw any positive conclusion.

To guess and conjecture both imply, for the most part, the judging or forming an opinion without any grounds; but sometimes they are used for a judgement on some grounds; 'One may guess by Plato's writings, that his meaning as to the inferior deities, was, that they who would have them might, and they who would not might leave them alone; but that himself had a right opinion concerning the true God.'—STILLINGFLEET.

Now hear the Grecian fraud, and from this one Conjecture all the rest.—DRYDEN.

To guess and conjecture are the natural acts of the mind: divine, in its proper sense, is a supernatural act; in this sense the heathens affected to divine that which was known only to an Omniscent Being; and impostors in our time presume to divine in matters that are set above the reach of human comprehension. The term is however employed to denote a species of guessing in different matters, as to divine the meaning of a mystery;

Walking they talk'd, and fruitlessly divin'd

What friend the priestess by those words design'd.

DRYDEN.

TO DOUBT, QUESTION, DISPUTE.

Doubt, in French douter, Latin dubito from dubus, comes from δύω and ἐνδύω, in the same manner as our frequentative doubt, signifying to have two opinions; question, in Latin quæstio, from quæro, to inquire, signifies to make a question or inquiry; dispute, from the Latin disputo, or dis asunder and puto to think, signifies literally to think differently.

These terms express the act of the mind in staying its decision. The doubt lies altogether in the mind; it is a less active feeling than questioning or disputing; by the former we merely suspend decision; by the latter we actually demand proofs in order to assist us in deciding. We may doubt in silence; we cannot question or dispute without expressing it directly or indirectly.

He who suggests doubts does it with caution; he who makes a question throws in difficulties with a degree of confidence. Doubts insinuate themselves into the mind oftentimes involuntarily on the part of the doubter; questions are always made with an express design. We doubt in matters of general interest, on abstruse as well as common subjects; we question mostly in ordinary matters that are of a personal interest; disputing is no less personal than questioning, but the dispute respects the opinions or assertions of another; the question respects his moral character or qualities; we doubt the truth of a position; 'For my part I think the being of a God is so little to be doubted, that I think it is almost the only truth we are sure of.'—ADDISON. We question the veracity of an author;

Our business in the field of fight

Is not to question, but to prove our might.—POPE.

The existence of mermaids was doubted for a great length of time; but the testimony of creditable persons, who have lately seen them, ought now to put it out of all doubt. When the practicability of any plan is questioned, it is unnecessary to enter any farther into its merits. When the authority of the person is disputed it is in vain for him to offer his advice or opinion;

Now I am sent, and am not to dispute
My prince's orders, but to execute.

The doubt is frequently confined to the individual, the question and dispute frequently respect others. We doubt whether we shall be able to succeed; we question another's right to interfere; we dispute a person's claim to any honour; we doubt whether a thing will answer the end proposed; we question the utility of any one making the attempt; we dispute the justice of any legal sentence; in this application of the terms question and dispute, the former expresses a less decisive feeling and action than the latter.

There are many doubtful cases in medicine, where the physician is at a loss to decide; there are many questionable measures proposed by those who are in or out of power which demand consideration. There are many disputable points between man and man which cause much angry feeling and disposition; to doubt every thing is more inimical to the cause of truth, than the readiness to believe every thing; a disposition to question whatever is said or done by others, is much more calculated to give offence than to prevent deception. A disposition to dispute every thing another says or does renders a person very unfit to be dealt with.

DOUBT, SUSPENSE.

The doubt respects that which we should believe; the suspense, from the Latin suspensus and suspendo to hang upon, has regard to that which we wish to know or ascertain. We are in doubt for the want of evidence; we are in suspense for the want of certainty. The doubt interrupts our progress in the attainment of truth; 'Could any difficulty have been proposed, the resolution would have been as early as the proposal; it could not have had time to settle into doubt.'—SOUTH. The suspense impedes us in the attainment of our objects, or in our motives to action: the former is connected principally with the understanding; the latter acts upon the hopes; it is frequently a state between hope and fear. We have our doubts about things that have no regard to time; 'Gold is a wonderful clearer of the understanding; it dissipates every doubt and scruple in an instant.'—ADDISON. We are in suspense about things that are to happen in future, or that are about to be done; 'The bundle of hay on either side striking his (the ass's) sight and smell in the same proportion, would keep him in perpetual suspense."—ADDISON. Those are the least inclined to doubt who have the most thorough knowledge of a subject; those are the least exposed to the unpleasant feeling of suspense who confine their wishes to the present;

Ten days the prophet in suspense remain'd,
Would no man's fate pronounce; at last constrain'd
By Ithacus, he solemnly design'd
We for the sacrifice.—DRYDEN.

DOUBTFUL, DUBIOUS, UNCERTAIN, PRECARIOUS.

The doubtful admits of doubt (v. Doubt, suspense): the dubious creates suspense. The doubtful is said of things in which we are required to have an opinion; the dubious respects events and things that must speak for themselves. In doubtful cases it is advisable for a judge to lean to the side of mercy; 'In handling the right of war, I am not willing to intermix matter doubtful with that which is out of doubt.'—BACON. While the issue of a contest is dubious, all judgment of the parties, or of the case, must be carefully avoided;

His utmost pow'r, with adverse power oppos'd
In dubious battle on the plains of heav'n.

MILTON,

It is worthy of remark, however, that doubtful and dubious, being both derivations from the same Latin words dubito and dubius, are or may be indifferently used in many instances, according as it may suit the verse or otherwise;

The Greeks with slain Tlepolemus retir'd,
Whose fall Ulysses view'd with fury fir'd;
Doubtful if Jove's great son he should pursue,
Or pour his vengeance on the Lycian crew.—POPE.

'At the lower end of the room is to be a side-table for persons of great fame, but dubious existence, such as Hercules, Theseus, Æneas, Achilles, Hector, and others.'—SWIFT.

Doubtful and dubious have always a relation to the person forming the opinion on the subject in question; uncertain and precarious are epithets which designate the qualities of the things themselves. Whatever is uncertain may from that very circumstance be doubtful or dubious to those who attempt to determine upon them; but they may be designated for their uncertainty without any regard to the opinions which they may give rise to.

A person's coming may be doubtful or uncertain; the length of his stay is oftener described as uncertain than as doubtful. The doubtful is opposed to that on which we form a positive conclusion; the uncertain to that which is definite or prescribed. The efficacy of any medicine is doubtful; the manner of its operation may be uncertain. While our knowledge is limited, we must expect to meet with many things that are doubtful; 'In doubtful cases reason still determines for the safer side; especially if the case be not only doubtful, but also highly concerning, and the venture be a soul, and an eternity.'—SOUTH. As every thing in the world is exposed to change, and all that is future is entirely above our control, we must naturally expect to find every thing uncertain, but what we see passing before us;

Near old Antandros, and at Ida's foot,
The timber of the sacred grove we cut
And build our fleet, uncertain yet to find
What place the gods for our repose assign'd.

DRYDEN.

Precarious, from the Latin precarious and precor to pray, signifies granted to entreaty, depending on the will or humor of another, whence it is applicable to whatever is obtained from others. Precarious is the highest species of uncertainty, applied to such things as depend on future casualties in opposition to that which is fixed and determined by design. The weather is uncertain; the subsistence of a person who has no stated income or source of living must be precarious. It is uncertain what day a thing may take place, until it is determined; 'Man, without the protection of a superior Being, is secure of nothing that he enjoys, and uncertain of every thing he hopes for.—TILLOTSON. There is nothing more precarious than what depends upon the favour of statesmen; 'The frequent disappointments incident to hunting induced men to establish a permanent property in their flocks and herds, in order to sustain themselves in a less precarious manner.'—BLACKSTONE.

DEMUR, DOUBT, HESITATION, OBJECTION

The demur, the doubt, and the hesitation are here employed in the sense either of what causes demur, doubt, and hesitation, or of the states of mind themselves; the objection, from objicio, or ob and jacio to throw in the way, signifies what is thrown in the way so as to stop our progress.

Demurs are often in matters of deliberation; doubt in regard to matters of fact; hesitation in matters of ordinary conduct; and objections in matters of common consideration. It is the business of one who gives counsel to make demurs; it is the business of the inquirer to suggest doubts; it is the business of all occasionally to make a hesitation who are called upon to decide; it is the business of those to make objections whose opinion is consulted. Artabanus made many demurs to the proposed invasion of Greece by Xerxes. 'Certainly the highest and dearest concerns of a temporal life are infinitely less valuable than those of an eternal; and consequently ought, without any demur at all, to be sacrificed to them whenever they come in competition with them.'—SOUTH. Doubts have been suggested respecting the veracity of Herodotus as an historian;

Our doubts are traitors,
And make us lose, by fearing to attempt
The good we oft might win.—SHAKESPEARE.

It is not proper to ask that which cannot be granted without hesitation; 'A spirit of revenge makes him curse the Grecians in the seventh book, when they hesitate to accept Hector's challenge.'—POPE. And it is not the part of an amiable disposition to make a hesitation in complying with a reasonable request; there are but few things which we either attempt to do or recommend to others that is not liable to some kind of an objection.

A demur stops the adjustment of any plan or the determination of any question:

But with rejoinders and replies,
Long bills, and answers stuff'd with lies,
Demur, imparlance, and assign,
The parties ne'er could issue join.—SWIFT

A doubt interrupts the progress of the mind in coming to a state of satisfaction and certainty; they are both applied to abstract questions or such as are of general interest; 'This skeptical proceeding will make every sort of reasoning on every subject vain and frivolous, even that skeptical reasoning itself which has persuaded us to entertain a doubt concerning the agreement of our perceptions.'—BURKE.

Hesitation and objection are more individual and private in their nature. Hesitation lies mostly in the state of the will; objection is rather the offspring of the understanding. The hesitation interferes with the action; 'If every man were wise and virtuous, capable to discern the best use of time and resolute to practise it, it might be granted, I think, without hesitation, that total liberty would be a blessing.'—JOHNSON. The objection affects the measure or the mode of action; 'Lloyd was always raising objections and moving them.'—JOHNSON.

TO DEMUR, HESITATE, PAUSE.

Demur, in French demeurer, Latin demorari, signifies to keep back; hesitate, in Latin hesitatum, participle of hesito, a frequentative from hero, signifies, first to stick at one thing and then another; pause, in Latin pansa, from the Greek παύω, to cease, signifies to make a stand.

The idea of stopping is common to these terms, to which signification is added some distinct collateral idea for each: we demur from doubt or difficulty; we hesitate from an undecided state of mind; we pause from circumstances. Demurring is the act of an equal; we demur in giving our assent; hesitating is often the act of a superlour; we hesitate in giving our consent: when a proposition appears to be unjust we demur in supporting it on the ground of its injustice; 'In order to banish an evil out of the world that does not only produce great uneasiness to private persons, but has also a very bad influence on the publick, I shall endeavour to show the folly of demurring.'—ADDISON. When a request of a dubious nature is made to us we hesitate in complying with it; 'I want no solicitations for me to comply where it would be ungenerous for me to refuse; for can I hesitate a moment to take upon myself the protection of a daughter of Correllius?'—MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF PLINY. Prudent people are most apt to demur; but people of a wavering temper are apt to hesitate; demurring may be often unnecessary, but it is seldom injurious; hesitating is mostly injurious when it is not necessary; the former is employed in matters that admit of delay; the latter in cases where immediate decision is requisite.

Demurring and hesitating are both employed as acts of the mind; pausing is an external action: we demur and hesitate in determining; we pause in speaking or doing any thing;

Think, O think,
And ere thou plunge into the vast abyss,
Pause on the verge awhile, look down and see
Thy future mansion.—PORTEUS.

TO SCRUPLE, HESITATE, WAVER, FLUCTUATE.

To scruple (v. Conscientious) simply keeps us from deciding; the hesitation, from the Latin hasito, frequentative of hæreo to stick, signifying to stick first at one thing and then another; the wavering, from the word wave, signifying to move backward and forward like a wave; and fluctuation, from the Latin fluctus a wave, all bespeak the variable state of the mind: we scruple simply from motives of doubt as to the propriety of a thing; we hesitate and waver from various motives, particularly such as affect our interests. Conscience produces scruples, fear produces hesitation, passion produces wavering: a person scruples to do an action which may hurt his neighbour or offend his Maker; he hesitates to do a thing which he fears may not prove advantageous to him; he wavers in his mind between going or staying, according as his inclinations impel him to the one or the other: a man who does not scruple to say or do as he pleases will be an offensive companion, if not a dangerous member of society; 'The Jacobins desire a change, and they will have it if they can: if they cannot have it by English cabal, they will make no sort of scruple to have it by the cabal of France.'—BURKE. He who hesitates only when the doing of good is proposed, evinces himself a worthless member of society; 'The lords of the congregation did not hesitate a moment whether they should employ their whole strength in one generous effort to rescue their religion and liberty from impending destruction.'—ROBERTSON. He who wavers between his duty and his inclination, will seldom maintain a long or doubtful contest; 'It is the greatest absurdity to be wavering and unsettled without closing with that side which appears the most safe and probable.'—ADDISON.

To fluctuate conveys the idea of strong agitation; to waver, that of constant motion backward and forward: when applied in the moral sense, to fluctuate designates the action of the spirits or the opinions; to waver is said only of the will or opinions: he who is alternately merry and sad in quick succession is said to be fluctuating; or he who has many opinions in quick succession is said to fluctuate; but he who cannot form an opinion, or come to a resolution, is said to waver.

Fluctuations and waverings are both opposed to a manly character; but the former evinces the uncontrolled influence of the passions, the total want of that equanimity which characterizes the Christian; the latter denotes the want of fixed principle, or the necessary decision of character: we can never have occasion to fluctuate, if we never raise our hopes and wishes beyond what is attainable;

The tempter, but with show of zeal and love
To man, and indignation at his wrong,
New part puts on, and as to passion mov'd
Fluctuates disturb'd.—MILTON.

We can never have occasion to waver, if we know and feel what is right, and resolve never to swerve from it; 'Let a man, without trepidation or wavering, proceed in discharging his duty.'—BLAIR.

TO HESITATE, FAULTER, STAMMER, STUTTER.

Hesitate signifies the same as in the preceding article; fault or faulter seems to signify to commit a fault or blunder, or it may be a frequentative of to fall signifying to stumble; stammer, in the Teutonic stammern, comes most probably from the Hebrew סָמַם to obstruct; stutter is but a variation of stammer.

A defect in utterance is the idea which is common in the signification of all these terms: they differ either as to the cause or the mode of the action. With regard to the cause, a hesitation results from the state of the mind, and an interruption in the train of thoughts; fault arises from a perturbed state of feeling; stammer and stutter arise either from an incidental circumstance, or more commonly from a physical defect in the organs of utterance. A person who is not in the habits of public speaking, or of collecting his thoughts into a set form, will be apt to hesitate even in familiar conversation; he who first addresses a public assembly will be apt to fault. Children who first begin to read will stammer at hard words; and one who has an impediment in his speech will stutter when he attempts to speak in a hurry.

With regard to the mode or degree of the action, hesitate expresses less than fault: stammer less than stutter.

The slightest difficulty in uttering words constitutes a hesitation; a pause or the repetition of a word may be termed hesitating; 'To look with solicitude and speak with hesitation is attainable at will; but the show of wisdom is ridiculous when there is nothing to cause doubt, as that of valour when there is nothing to be feared.'—JOHNSON. To fault supposes a failure in the voice as well as the lips when they refuse to do their office;

And yet was every faulting tongue of man,
Almighty Father! silent in thy praise,
Thy works themselves would raise a general voice.

THOMSON.

Stammering and stuttering are confined principally to the useless moving of the mouth;

Lagean juice
Will stamm'ring tongues and stagg'ring feet produce.
DRYDEN.

He who stammers brings forth sounds, but not the right sounds, without trials and efforts; he who stutters remains for some time in a state of agitation without uttering a sound.

QUESTION, QUERY.

The question is the thing called in question, or that which is sought for by a question; query is but a variation of quare, from the verb quare to seek or inquire, signifying simply the thing sought for.

Questions and queries are both put for the sake of obtaining an answer; but the former may be for a reasonable or unreasonable cause; a query is mostly a rational question: idlers may put questions from mere curiosity; learned men put queries for the sake of information.

TO ASK, INQUIRE, QUESTION, INTERROGATE.

Ask, comes from the Saxon ascian, low German esken, eschen, German heischen, Danish adske, &c. which for the most part signify to wish for, and come from the Greek ἀξίω to think worthy; whence this word in English has been employed for an expression of our wishes, for the purpose of obtaining what we want from others; inquire, Latin inquiri, compounded of in and quæro, signifies to search after; question, in Latin is a variation of the same word; interrogate Latin interrogatus, participle of interrogo, compounded of inter and rogo, signifies to ask alternately or an asking between different persons.

We perform all these actions in order to get info:

mation: but we ask for general purposes of conversation; we inquire from motives of curiosity; we question and interrogate from motives of discretion. To ask respects simply one thing; to inquire respects one or many subjects; to question and interrogate is to ask repeatedly, to examine by questioning and interrogating, and in the latter case more authoritatively than in the former.

Indifferent people ask of each other whatever they wish to know; 'Upon my asking her who it was, she told me it was a very grave elderly gentleman, but that she did not know his name.'—ADDISON. Learners inquire the reasons of things which are new to them;

You have oft inquir'd
After the shepherd that complain'd of love.

SHAKESPEARE.

Masters question their servants, or parents their children, when they wish to ascertain the real state of any case;

But hark you, Kate,
I must not henceforth have you question me
Whither I go.—SHAKESPEARE.

Magistrates interrogate criminals when they are brought before them; 'Thomson was introduced to the Prince of Wales, and being gayly interrogated about the state of his affairs, said, "that they were in a more poetical posture than formerly."'—JOHNSON. It is very uncivil not to answer whatever is asked even by the meanest person: it is proper to satisfy every inquiry, so as to remove doubt: questions are sometimes so impertinent that they cannot with propriety be answered: interrogations from unauthorized persons are little better than insults. To ask and interrogate are always personal acts; to inquire and question are frequently applied to things, the former in the sense of seeking (v. Examination), and the latter in that of doubting (v. To Doubt).

EXAMINATION, ²SEARCH, INQUIRY, RESEARCH, INVESTIGATION, SCRUTINY.

Examination comes from the Latin examinum and examen, the beam by which the poise of the balance is held, because the judgement keeps itself as it were in a balance in examining; search, in French chercher, is a variation of seek and see; inquiry signifies the same as in the preceding article; research is an intensive of search; investigation, from the Latin vestigium, a track, signifies seeking by the tracks or foot-steps; scrutiny, from the Latin scrutor, to search, and scrutum, lumber, signifies looking for among lumber and rubbish, i. e. to ransack and turn over.

Examination is the most general of these terms, which all agree in expressing an active effort to find out that which is unknown. The examination is made either by the aid of the senses or the understanding, the body or the mind; the search is principally a physical action; the inquiry is mostly intellectual; we examine a face or we examine a subject; we search a house or a dictionary; we inquire into a matter. An examination is made for the purpose of forming a judgement; the search is made for ascertaining a fact; the inquiry is made in order to arrive at truth. To examine a person, is either by means of questions to get at his mind, or by means of looks to become acquainted with his person; to search a person is by corporeal contact to learn what he has about him. We examine the features of those who interest us; officers of justice search those who are suspected; but, with the prepositions for or after, the verb search may be employed in a moral application; 'If you search purely for truth, it will be indifferent to you where you find it.'—BUDGELL. Examinations and inquiries are both made by means of questions; but the former is an official act for a specific end, the latter is a private act for purposes of convenience or pleasure. Students undergo examinations from their teachers; they pursue their inquiries for themselves.

An examination or an inquiry may be set on foot on any subject; but the examination is direct; it is the setting of things before the view, corporeal or mental, in order to obtain a conclusion; 'The body of man, such a subject as stands the utmost test of examination.'—ADDISON. The inquiry is indirect; it is a circuitous method of coming to the knowledge of what was not known before; 'Inquiries after happiness are not so necessary and useful to mankind as the arts of consolation.'—ADDISON. The student examines the evidences of Christianity, that he may strengthen his own belief; the government institute an inquiry into the conduct of subjects. A research is an inquiry into that which is remote; an investigation is a minute inquiry; a scrutiny is a strict examination. Learned men of inquisitive tempers make their researches into antiquity;

To all inferior animals 'tis giv'n
To enjoy the state allotted them by heav'n;
No vain researches e'er disturb their rest.—JENYNS

Magistrates investigate doubtful and mysterious affairs; physicians investigate the causes of diseases; 'We have divided natural philosophy into the investigation of causes, and the production of effects.'—BACON. Men scrutinize the actions of those whom they hold in suspicion; 'Before I go to bed, I make a scrutiny what peccant humours have reigned in me that day.'—HOWELL. Acuteness and penetration are peculiarly requisite in making researches; patience and perseverance are the necessary qualifications of the investigator; a quick discernment will essentially aid the scrutinizer.

TO EXAMINE, SEEK, SEARCH, EXPLORE

These words are here considered as they designate the looking upon places or objects, in order to get acquainted with them. To examine (v. Examination) expresses less than to seek and search; and these less than to explore, which, from the Latin ex and ploro, signifies to burst forth, whether in lamentation or examination.

We examine objects that are near; we seek those that are remote or not at hand; search those that are hidden or out of sight; we explore those that are unknown or very distant. The painter examines a landscape in order to take a sketch of it;

Compare each phrase, examine ev'ry line,
Weigh ev'ry word, and ev'ry thought refine.—POPE

One friend seeks another when they have parted;

I have a venturous fairy, that shall seek
The squirrel's hoard, and fetch thee thence new nuts
SHAKESPEARE.

The botanist searches after curious plants; the inquisitive traveller explores unknown regions; the writer examines the books from which he intends to draw his authorities; 'Men will look into our lives, and examine our actions, and inquire into our conversations; by these they will judge the truth and reality of our profession.'—TILLOTSON. A person seeks an opportunity to effect a purpose;

Sweet peace, where dost thou dwell?

I humbly crave

Let me once know,

I sought thee in a secret cave,

And ask'd if peace were there.—HERBER

The antiquarian searches every corner in which he hopes to find a monument of antiquity;

Not thou, nor they shall search the thoughts that roll
Up in the close recesses of my soul.—POPE.

The classic explores the learning and wisdom of the ancients;

Hector, he said, my courage bids me meet

This high achievement, and explore the fleet.—POPE

TO DISCUSS, EXAMINE.

Discuss, in Latin discussus, participle of discutio, signifies to shake asunder or to separate thoroughly so as to see the whole composition; examine has the same signification as in the preceding article, because the judgement holds the balance in examining.

The intellectual operation expressed by these terms is applied to objects that cannot be immediately discerned or understood, but they vary both in mode and degree. Discussion is altogether carried on by verbal and personal communication; examination proceeds by reading, reflection, and observation; we often examine therefore by discussion, which is properly one mode of examination: a discussion is always carried on by two or more persons; an examination may be carried on by one only: politicks are a frequent though not always a pleasant subject of discussion in social meetings; 'A country fellow distinguishes himself as much in the church-yard as a citizen does upon the change; the whole parish politicks being generally discussed in that place either after sermon or before the bell rings.'—ADDISON. Complicated questions cannot be too thoroughly examined; 'Men follow their inclinations without examining whether there be any principles which they ought to form for regulating their conduct.'—BLAIR. Discussion serves for amusement rather than for any solid purpose; the cause of truth seldom derives any immediate benefit from it, although the minds of men may become invigorated by a collision of sentiment: examination is of great practical utility in the direction of our conduct: all decisions must be partial, unjust, or imprudent, which are made without previous examination.

TO PRY, SCRUTINIZE, DIVE INTO.

Pry is in all probability changed from prove, in the sense of try; scrutinize comes from the Latin scrutor to search thoroughly (v. Examination) dive expresses the physical action of going under water to the bottom, and figuratively of searching to the bottom.

Pry is taken in the bad sense of looking more narrowly into things than one ought: scrutinize and dive into are employed in the good sense of searching things to the bottom.

A person who pries looks into that which does not belong to him; and too narrowly also into that which may belong to him; it is the consequence of a too eager curiosity or a busy, meddling temper: a person who scrutinizes looks into that which is intentionally concealed from him; it is an act of duty flowing out of his office: a person who dives penetrates into that which lies hidden very deep; he is impelled to this action by the thirst of knowledge and a laudable curiosity.

A love of prying into the private affairs of families makes a person a troublesome neighbour; 'The peaceable man never officiously seeks to pry into the secrets of others.'—BLAIR. It is the business of the magistrate to scrutinize into all matters which affect the good order of society; 'He who enters upon this scrutiny (into the depths of the mind) enters into a labyrinth.'—SOUTH. There are some minds so imbued with a love of science that they delight to dive into the secrets of nature;

In man the more we dive, the more we see,
Heaven's signet stamping an immortal make.

YOUNG.

CURIOUS, INQUISITIVE, PRYING.

Curious, in French curieux, Latin curiosus, from cura care, signifying full of care; inquisitive, in Latin inquisitus, from inquirere to inquire or search into, signifies a disposition to investigate thoroughly; prying signifies the disposition to pry, try, or sift to the bottom.

The disposition to interest one's self in matters not of immediate concern to one's self is the idea common to all these terms. Curiosity is directed to all objects that can gratify the inclination, taste, or understanding; inquisitiveness to such things only as satisfy the understanding.

The curious person interests himself in all the works of nature and art; he is curious to try effects and examine causes: the inquisitive person endeavours to add to his store of knowledge. Curiosity employs every means which falls in its way in order to procure gratification; the curious man uses his own powers or those of others to serve his purpose; inquisitiveness is indulged only by means of verbal inquiry; the inquisitive person collects all from others. A traveller is curious who examines every thing for himself; 'Sir Francis Bacon says, some have been so curious as to remark the times and seasons, when the stroke of an envious eye is most effectually pernicious.'—STEELE. He is inquisitive when he minutely questions others. Inquisitiveness is therefore to curiosity as a part to the whole; whoever is curious will naturally be inquisitive, and he who is inquisitive is so from a species of curiosity; but inquisitiveness may sometimes be taken in an improper sense for moral objects; 'Checking our inquisitive solicitude about what the Almighty hath concealed, let us diligently improve what he hath made known.'—BLAIR.

Curious and inquisitive may be both used in a bad sense; prying is never used otherwise than in a bad sense. Inquisitive, as in the former case, is a mode of curiosity, and prying is a species of eager curiosity. A curious person takes unallowed means of learning that which he ought not to wish to know; an inquisitive person puts many impertinent and troublesome questions; a prying temper is unceasing in its endeavours to get acquainted with the secrets of others. Curiosity is a fault common to females; inquisitiveness is most general among children; a prying temper belongs only to people of low character.

A well-disciplined mind checks the first risings of idle curiosity; children should be taught early to suppress an inquisitive temper, which may so easily become burdensome to others: those who are of a prying temper are insensible to every thing but the desire of unveiling what lies hidden; such a disposition is often engendered by the unlicensed indulgence of curiosity in early life, which becomes a sort of passion in riper years; 'By adhering tenaciously to his opinion, and exhibiting other instances of a prying disposition, Lord George Sackville had rendered himself disagreeable to the commander-in-chief.'—SMOLLET.

CONCEIT, FANCY.

Conceit comes immediately from the Latin concepit, participle of concipio to conceive, or form in the mind; fancy, in French phantasie, Latin phantasia, Greek φαντασία, from φαντασσω to make appear, and φαῖναι to appear.

These terms equally express the working of the imagination in its distorted state; but conceit denotes a much greater degree of distortion than fancy; what we conceit is preposterous; what we fancy is unreal or only apparent. Conceit applies only to internal objects; it is mental in the operation and the result; it is a species of invention; 'Strong conceit, like a new principle, carries all easily with it, when yet above common sense.'—LOCKE. Fancy is applied to external objects, or whatever acts on the senses: nervous people are subject to strange conceits; timid people fancy they hear sounds, or see objects in the dark which awaken terror.

Those who are apt to conceit oftener conceit that which is painful than otherwise;

Some have been wounded with conceit,
And died of mere opinion strait.—BUTLER.

Conceiting either that they are always in danger of dying, or that all the world is their enemy. 'There are however insane people who conceit themselves to be kings and queens; and some indeed who are not called insane, who conceit themselves very learned while they know nothing, or very wise and clever, while they are exposing themselves to perpetual ridicule for their folly, or very handsome while the world calls them plain, or very peaceable while they are always quarrelling with their neighbours, or very humble while they are tenaciously sticking for their own: it would be well if such conceits afforded a harmless pleasure to their authors, but unfortunately they only render them more offensive and disgusting than they would otherwise be.

Those who are apt to fancy, never fancy any thing to please themselves;

Desponding fear, of feeble fancies full,
Weak and unmanly, loosens every power.

THOMSON.

They fancy that things are too long or too short, too thick or too thin, too cold or too hot, with a thousand other fancies equally trivial in their nature; thereby proving that the slightest aberration of the mind is a serious evil, and productive of evil.

When taken in reference to intellectual objects, conceit is mostly in a bad sense; 'Nothing can be more plainly impossible than for a man "to be profitable to God," and consequently nothing can be more absurd than for a man to cherish so irrational a conceit.'—ADDISON. But fancy may be employed in a good sense; 'My friend, Sir Roger de Coverley, told me

'Other day, that he had been reading my paper upon Westminster Abbey, in which, says he, there are a great many ingenious fancies.'—ADDISON.

OPINIATED OR OPINIATIVE, CONCEITED, EGOISTICAL.

A fondness for one's opinion bespeaks the opiniated man: a fond conceit of one's self bespeaks the conceited man: a fond attachment to one's self bespeaks the egotistical man: a liking for one's self or one's own is evidently the common idea that runs through these terms; they differ in the mode and in the object.

An opiniated man is not only fond of his own opinion, but full of his own opinion: he has an opinion on every thing, which is the best possible opinion, and is delivered therefore freely to every one, that they may profit in forming their own opinions; 'Down was he cast from all his greatness, as it is pity but all such polittick opiniators should.'—SOUTH. A conceited man has a conceit or an idle, fond opinion of his own talent; it is not only high in competition with others, but it is so high as to be set above others. The conceited man does not want to follow the ordinary means of acquiring knowledge: his conceit suggests to him that his talent will supply labour, application, reading and study, and every other contrivance which men have commonly employed for their improvement; he sees by intuition what another learns by experience and observation; he knows in a day what others want years to acquire; he learns of himself what others are contented to get by means of instruction; 'No great measure at a very difficult crisis can be pursued which is not attended with some mischief; none but conceited pretenders in publick business hold any other language.'—BURKE. The egotistical man makes himself the darling theme of his own contemplation; he admires and loves himself to that degree that he can talk and think of nothing else; his children, his house, his garden, his rooms, and the like, are the incessant theme of his conversation, and become invaluable from the mere circumstance of belonging to him; 'To show their particular aversion to speaking in the first person, the gentlemen of Port Royal branded this form of writing with the name of egotism.'—ADDISON.

An opiniated man is the most unfit for conversation, which only affords pleasure by an alternate and equable communication of sentiment. A conceited man is the most unfit for co-operation, where a junction of talent and effort is essential to bring things to a conclusion; an egotistical man is the most unfit to be a companion or friend, for he does not know how to value or like any thing out of himself.

SELF-WILL, SELF-CONCEIT, SELF-SUFFICIENCY.

Self-will signifies the will in one's self: self-conceit, conceit of one's self: self-sufficiency, sufficiency in one's self. As characteristics they come very near to each other, but that depravity of the will which refuses to submit to any control either within or without is born with a person, and is among the earliest indications of character; in some it is less predominant than in others, but if not early checked, it is that defect in our natures which will always prevail; self-conceit is a vicious habit of the mind which is superinduced on the original character; it is that which determines in matters of judgement; a self-willed person thinks nothing of right or wrong; whatever the impulse of the moment suggests, is the motive to action;

To wilful men

The injuries that they themselves procur'd,
Must be their schoolmasters.—SHAKESPEARE.

The self-conceited person is always much concerned about right and wrong, but it is only that which he conceives to be right and wrong; 'Nothing so haughty and assuming as ignorance, where self-conceit bids it set up for infallible.'—SOUTH. Self-sufficiency is a species of self-conceit applied to action: as a self-conceited person thinks of no opinion but his own; a self-sufficient person refuses the assistance of every one in whatever he is called upon to do:

There safe in self-sufficient impudence
Without experience, honesty, or sense,
Unknowing in her interest, trade, or laws,
He vainly undertakes his country's cause.—JENYNS

PRIDE, VANITY, CONCEIT.

Pride is in all probability connected with the word parade, and the German pracht show or splendour, as it signifies that high-flown temper in a man which makes him paint to himself every thing in himself as beautiful or splendid; vanity, in Latin vanitas, from vain and vanus, is compounded of ve or valde and inanis, signifying exceeding emptiness; conceit signifies the same as in the preceding article (v. Conceit, Fancy).

The valuing of one's self on the possession of any property is the idea common to these terms, but they differ either in regard to the object or the manner of the action. Pride is the term of most extensive import and application, and comprehends in its signification not only that of the other two terms, but likewise ideas peculiar to itself.

Pride is applicable to every object, good or bad, high or low, small or great; vanity is applicable only to small objects: pride is therefore good or bad; vanity is always bad, it is always emptiness or nothingness. A man is proud who values himself on the possession of his literary or scientific talent, on his wealth, on his rank, on his power, on his acquirements, or his superiority over his competitors; he is vain of his person, his dress, his walk, or any thing that is frivolous. Pride is the inherent quality in man; and while it rests on noble objects, it is his noblest characteristic; vanity is the distortion of one's nature flowing from a vicious constitution or education: pride shows itself variously according to the nature of the object on which it is fixed; a noble pride seeks to display itself in all that can command the respect or admiration of mankind; the pride of wealth, of power, or of other adventitious properties, commonly displays itself in an unseemly deportment towards others; vanity shows itself only by its eagerness to catch the notice of others. 'Vanity makes men ridiculous, pride odious, and ambition terrible.'—STEELE.

'Tis an old maxim in the schools,

That vanity's the food of fools.—SWIFT.

Pride (says Blair) makes us esteem ourselves: vanity makes us desire the esteem of others. But if pride is, as I have before observed, self-esteem, or, which is nearly the same thing, self-valuation, it cannot properly be said to make us esteem ourselves. Of vanity I have already said that it makes us anxious for the notice and applause of others; but I cannot with Dr. Blair say that it makes us desire the esteem of others, because esteem is too substantial a quality to be sought for by the vain. Besides, that which Dr. Blair seems to assign as a leading and characteristic ground of distinction between pride and vanity is only an incidental property. A man is said to be vain of his clothes, if he gives indications that he values himself upon them as a ground of distinction; although he should not expressly seek to display himself to others.

Conceit is that species of self-valuation that respects one's talents only; it is so far therefore closely allied to pride; but a man is said to be proud of that which he really has, but to be conceited of that which he really has not: a man may be proud to an excess, of merits which he actually possesses; but when he is conceited his merits are all in his own conceit; the latter is therefore obviously founded on falsehood altogether; 'The self-conceit of the young is the great source of those dangers to which they are exposed.'—BLAIR.

PRIDE, HAUGHTINESS, LOFTINESS, DIGNITY.

Pride is here employed principally as respects the temper of the mind; the other terms are employed either as respects the sentiment of the mind, or the external behaviour.

Pride is here as before (v. Pride) a generic term: haughtiness, or the spirit of being haughty or high-spirited (v. Haughty); loftiness, or the spirit of being lifted up; and dignity, or the sense of worth or value, are but modes of pride. Pride, inasmuch as it consists purely of self-esteem, is a positive sentiment which one may entertain independently of other persons: it lies in the inmost recesses of the human heart, and mingles itself insensibly with our affections and passions; it is our companion by night and by day; in publick or in private; it goes with a man wherever he goes, and stays with him where he stays; it is a never-failing source of satisfaction and self-complacency under every circumstance and in every situation of human life. Haughtiness is that mode of pride which springs out of one's comparison of one's self with others; the haughty man dwells on the inferiority of others; the proud man in the strict sense dwells on his own perfections. Loftiness is a mode of pride which raises the spirit above objects supposed to be inferior; it does not set a man so much above others as above himself, or that which concerns himself. Dignity is a mode of pride which exalts the whole man, it is the entire consciousness of what is becoming himself and due to himself.

Pride assumes such a variety of shapes, and puts on such an infinity of disguises, that it is not easy always to recognise it at the first glance; but an insight into human nature will suffice to convince us that it is the spring of all human actions. Whether we see a man professing humility and self-abasement, or a singular degree of self-debasement, or any degree of self-exaltation, we may rest assured that his own pride or conscious self-importance is not wounded by any such measures; but that in all cases he is equally stimulated with the desire of giving himself in the eyes of others that degree of importance to which in his own eyes he is entitled; 'Every demonstration of an implacable rancour and an unteachable pride were the only encouragements we received (from the regicides) to the renewal of our supplications.'—BURKE. Haughtiness is an unbending species or mode of pride which does not stoop to any artifices to obtain gratification; but compels others to give it what it fancies to be its due; 'Provoked by Edward's haughtiness, even the passive Balliol began to mutiny.'—ROBERTSON. Loftiness and dignity are equally remote from any subtle pliancy, but they are in no less degree exempt from the unamiable characteristic of haughtiness which makes a man bear with oppressive sway upon others. A lofty spirit and a dignity of character preserve a man from yielding to the contamination of outward objects, but leave his judgement and feeling entirely free and unbiassed with respect to others; 'Waller describes Sacharissa as a predominating beauty of lofty charms and imperious influence.'—JOHNSON. 'As soon as Almagro knew his fate to be inevitable, he met it with the dignity and fortitude of a veteran.'—ROBERTSON.

As respects the external behaviour, a haughty carriage is mostly unbecoming; a lofty tone is mostly justifiable, particularly as circumstances may require; and a dignified air is without qualification becoming the man who possesses real dignity.

HAUGHTINESS, DISDAIN, ARROGANCE.

Haughtiness is the abstract quality of haughty, as in the preceding article; disdain from the French de daigner, or the privative de and dignus worthy, signifies thinking a thing to be worthless; arrogance, from arrogare, or the Latin ar or ad rogo to ask, signifies claiming or taking to one's self.

Haughtiness (says Dr. Blair) is founded on the high opinion we entertain of ourselves; disdain, on the low opinion we have of others; arrogance is the result of both, but if any thing, more of the former than the latter. Haughtiness and disdain are properly sentiments of the mind, and arrogance a mode of acting resulting from a state of mind; there may therefore be haughtiness and disdain which have not betrayed themselves by any visible action; but the sentiment of arrogance is always accompanied by its corresponding action: the haughty man is known by the air of superiority which he assumes; the disdainful man by the contempt which he shows to others; the arrogant man by his lofty pretensions.

Haughtiness and arrogance are both vicious; they are built upon a false idea of ourselves; 'The same haughtiness that prompts the act of injustice will more strongly incite its justification.'—JOHNSON. 'Turbulent, discontented men of quality, in proportion as they are puffed up with personal pride and arrogance, generally despise their own order.'—BURKE. Disdain may be justifiable when provoked by what is infamous; a lady must treat with disdain the person who insults her honour; but otherwise it is a highly unbecoming sentiment;

Didst thou not think such vengeance must await
The wretch that, with his crimes all fresh about him,
Rushes, irreverent, unprepared, uncall'd,
Into his Maker's presence, throwing back
With insolent disdain his choicest gift?—PORTEUS.

HAUGHTY, HIGH, HIGH-MINDED.

Haughty, contracted from high-hearty, in Dutch hoogharty, signifies literally high-spirited, and like the word high, is derived through the medium of the Northern languages, from the Hebrew לם to be high.

Haughty characterizes mostly the outward behaviour; high respects both the external behaviour, and the internal sentiment; high-minded marks the sentiment only, or the state of the mind.

With regard to the outward behaviour, haughty is a stronger term than high: a haughty carriage bespeaks not only a high opinion of one's self, but a strong mixture of contempt for others; a high carriage denotes simply a high opinion of one's self; haughtiness is therefore always offensive, as it is burdensome to others; but height may sometimes be laudable in as much as it is justice to one's self; one can never give a command in a haughty tone without making others feel their inferiority in a painful degree; we may sometimes assume a high tone in order to shelter ourselves from insult.

With regard to the sentiment of the mind, high denotes either a particular or an habitual state; high minded is most commonly understood to designate an habitual state; the former may be either good or bad according to circumstances; the latter is expressly inconsistent with Christian humility. He is high whom virtue ennobles; his height is independent of adventitious circumstances, it becomes the poor as well as the rich; he is properly high who is set above any mean condescension; high-mindedness, on the contrary, includes in it a self-complacency that, rests upon one's personal and incidental advantages rather than upon what is worthy of ourselves as rational agents. Superiors are apt to indulge a haughty temper which does but excite the scorn and hatred of those who are compelled to endure it;

Let gifts be to the mighty queen design'd,
And mollify with pray'rs her haughty mind.

DRYDEN

A high spirit is not always serviceable to one in dependent circumstances; but when regulated by discretion, it enhances the value of a man's character; 'Who knows whether indignation may not succeed to terror, and the revival of high sentiments, spurning away the illusion of safety purchased at the expense of glory, may not drive us to a generous despair.'—BURKE. No one can be high-minded without thinking better of himself, and worse of others, than he ought to think; 'The wise will determine from the gravity of the case; the irritable, from sensibility to oppression; the high-minded from disdain and indignation at abusive power in unworthy hands.'—BURKE.

TO CONTEMN, DESPISE, SCORN, DISDAIN

Contemn, in Latin contemno, compounded of con and temno, is probably changed from temino, and is derived from the Hebrew נמל to pollute or render worthless, which is the cause of contempt; despise, in Latin despicio, compound of de and specio, signifies to look down upon, which is a strong mark of contempt; scorn, varied from our word shorn, signifies stripped of all honours and exposed to derision, which situation is the cause of scorn; disdain has the same signification as in the preceding article.

The above elucidations sufficiently evince the feeling towards others which gives birth to all these actions. But the feeling of contempt is not quite so strong as that of despising, nor that of despising so strong as those of scorning and disdaining; the latter of which expresses the strongest sentiment of all. Persons are contemned for their moral qualities; they are despised on account of their outward circumstances, their characters, or their endowments. Superiours may be contemned; inferiours only, real or supposed, are despised.

Contempt, as applied to persons, is not incompatible with a Christian temper when justly provoked by their character; but despising is distinctly forbidden and seldom warranted. Yet it is not so much our business to contemn others as to contemn that which is contemptible; but we are not equally at liberty to despise the person, or any thing belonging to the person, of another. Whatever springs from the free will of an other may be a subject of contempt; but the casualties of fortune or the gifts of Providence, which are alike independent of personal merit, should never expose a person to be despised. We may, however, contemn a person for his impotent malice, or despise him for his meanness.

Persons are not scorned or disdained, but they may be treated with scorn or disdain; they are both improper expressions of contempt or despise; scorn marks the sentiment of a little, vain mind; disdain of a haughty and perverted mind. A beautiful woman looks with scorn on her whom she despises for the want of this natural gift. The wealthy man treats with disdain him whom he despises for his poverty. There is nothing excites the contempt of mankind so powerfully as a mixture of pride and meanness; 'Contempt and derision are hard words; but in what manner can one give advice to a youth in the pursuit and possession of sensual pleasures, or afford pity to an old man in the impotence and desire of enjoying them.'—

STEELE. A moment's reflection will teach us the folly and wickedness of despising another for that to which by the will of Providence we may the next moment be exposed ourselves; 'It is seldom that the great or the wise suspect that they are cheated and despised.'—JOHNSON. There are silly persons who will scorn to be seen in the company of such as have not an equal share of finery Infamous wretch!

So much below my scorn, I dare not kill thee.

DRYDEN.

And there are weak upstarts of fortune, who disdain to look at those who cannot measure purses with themselves;

Yet not for those,
For what the potent victor in his rage
Can else inflict, do I repent or change,
Though chang'd in outward lustre, that fix'd mind
And high disdain from sense of injur'd merit.

MILTON.

In speaking of things independently of others, or as immediately connected with ourselves, all these terms may be sometimes employed in a good or an indifferent sense.

When we contemn a mean action, and scorn to conceal by falsehood what we are called upon to acknowledge, we act the part of the gentleman as well as the Christian; 'A man of spirit should contemn the praise of the ignorant.'—STEELE. And it is inconsistent with our infirm and dependent condition, that we should feel inclined to despise any thing that falls in our way;

Thrice happy they, beneath their northern skies,
Who that worst fear, the fear of death, despise;
Provoke approaching fate, and bravely scorn
To spare that life which must so soon return.

ROWE.

Much less are we at liberty to disdain to do any thing which our station requires; 'It is in some sort owing to the bounty of Providence that disdaining a cheap and vulgar happiness, they frame to themselves imaginary goods, in which there is nothing can raise desire but the difficulty of obtaining them.'—BERKELEY. We ought to think nothing unworthy of us, nothing degrading to us, but that which is inconsistent with the will of God: there are, however, too many who affect to despise small favours as not reaching their fancied deserts, and others who disdain to receive any favour at all, from mistaken ideas of dependence and obligation;

Virtue disdains to lend an ear
To the mad people's sense of right.—FRANCIS.

CONTEMPTIBLE, CONTEMPTUOUS.

These terms are very frequently, though very erroneously, confounded in common discourse.

Contemptible is applied to the thing deserving contempt; Contemptuous to that which is expressive of contempt. Persons, or what is done by persons, may be either contemptible or contemptuous; but a thing is only contemptible.

A production is contemptible; a sneer or look is contemptuous; 'Silence, or a negligent indifference, proceeds from anger mixed with scorn, that shows another to be thought by you too contemptible to be regarded.'—ADDISON. 'My sister's principles in many particulars differ; but there has been always such a harmony between us that she seldom smiles upon those who have suffered me to pass with a contemptuous negligence.'—HAWKSWORTH.

CONTEMPTIBLE, DESPICABLE, PITIFUL.

Contemptible is not so strong as despicable or pitiful. A person may be contemptible for his vanity or weakness; but he is despicable for his servility and baseness of character; he is pitiful for his want of manliness and becoming spirit. A lie is at all times contemptible; it is despicable when it is told for purposes of gain or private interest; it is pitiful when accompanied with indications of unmanly fear. It is contemptible to take credit to one's self for the good action one has not performed; 'Were every man persuaded from how mean and low a principle this passion (for flattery) is derived, there can be no doubt but the person who should attempt to gratify it would then be as contemptible as he is now successful.'—STEELE. It is despicable to charge another with the faults which we ourselves have committed; 'To put on an artful part to obtain no other but an unjust praise from the undiscerning is of all endeavours the most despicable.'—STEELE. It is pitiful to offend others, and then attempt to screen ourselves from their resentment under any shelter which offers; 'There is something pitifully mean in the inverted ambition of that man who can hope for annihilation, and please himself to think that his whole fabric shall crumble into dust.'—STEELE. It is contemptible for a man in a superior station to borrow of his inferiours; it is despicable in him to forfeit his word; it is pitiful in him to attempt to conceal aught by artifice.

CONTEMPTUOUS, SCORNFUL, DISDAINFUL.

These epithets rise in sense by a regular gradation.

Contemptuous is general, and applied to whatever can express contempt; scornful and disdainful are particular; they apply only to outward marks: one is contemptuous who is scornful or disdainful; but not vice versa.

Words, actions, and looks are contemptuous; looks sneers, and gestures are scornful and disdainful.

Contemptuous expressions are always unjustifiable whatever may be the contempt which a person's conduct deserves, it is unbecoming in another to give him any indications of the sentiment he feels. Scornful and disdainful smiles are resorted to by the weakest or the worst of mankind; 'Prior never sacrifices accuracy to haste, nor indulges himself in contemptuous negligence or impatient idleness.'—JOHNSON. 'As soon as Maria began to look round, and saw the vagabond Mirtillo who had so long absented himself from her circle, she looked upon him with that glance which in the language of ogles is called the scornful.'—STEELE.

In vain he thus attempts her mind to move,
With tears and prayers and late repenting love;
Disdainfully she looked, then turning round,
She fix'd her eyes unmov'd upon the ground.

DRYDEN

TO LAUGH AT, RIDICULE.

Laugh, through the medium of the Saxon hlahan old German lahan, Greek γέλωδ, comes from the He brew pn̄ with no variation in the meaning; ridicule, from Latin video, has the same original meaning. Both these verbs are used here in the improper sense for laughter, blended with more or less of contempt; but the former displays itself by the natural expression of laughter; the latter shows itself by a verbal expression: the former is produced by a feeling of mirth, on observing the real or supposed weakness of another; the latter is produced by a strong sense of the absurd or irrational in another: the former is more immediately directed to the person who has excited the feeling; the latter is more commonly produced by the thing than by persons. We laugh at a person to his face; but we ridicule his notions by writing or in the course of conversation; we laugh at the individual; we ridicule that which is maintained by one or many. It is better to laugh at the fears of a child than to attempt to restrain them by violence, but it is still better to overcome them if possible by the force of reason; 'Men laugh at one another's cost.'—SWIFT. Ridicule is not the test of truth; he therefore who attempts to misuse it against the cause of truth, will bring upon himself the contempt of all mankind; but folly can be assailed with no weapon so effectual as ridicule; 'It is easy for a man who sits idle at home and has nobody to please but himself, to ridicule or censure the common practices of mankind.'—JOHNSON. The philosopher Democritus preferred to laugh at the follies of men, rather than weep for them like Heracitus; infidels have always employed ridicule against Christianity, by which they have betrayed not only their want of argument, but their personal depravity in laughing where they ought to be most serious.

LAUGHABLE, LUDICROUS, RIDICULOUS, COMICAL, OR COMICK, DROLL.

Laughable signifies exciting or fit to excite laughter; ludicrous, in Latin ludicor or ludicrus, from ludus a game, signifies causing game or sport; ridiculous exciting or fit to excite ridicule; comical, or comick, in Latin comicus, from the Greek κωμῳδία comedy, and κῶμη a village, because comedies were first performed in villages, signifies after the manner of comedy; droll, in French drôle, is doubtless connected with the German rolle a part, in the phrase étne rolle spielen to play a trick or perform a part.

Either the direct action of laughter or a corresponding sentiment is included in the signification of all these terms: they differ principally in the cause which produces the feeling; the laughable consists of objects in general whether personal or otherwise; the ludicrous and ridiculous have more or less reference to that which is personal. What is laughable may excite simple merriment independently of all personal reference, unless we admit what Mr. Hobbes, and after him Addison, have maintained of all laughter, that it springs from pride. But without entering into this nice question, I am inclined to distinguish between the laughable which arises from the reflection of what is to our own advantage or pleasure, and that which arises from reflecting on what is to the disadvantage of another. The droll tricks of a monkey, or the humorous stories of wit, are laughable from the nature of the things themselves; without any apparent allusion, however remote, to any individual but the one whose senses or mind is gratified;

They'll not show their teeth in way of smile,
Though Nestor swear the jest be laughable.

SHAKESPEARE.

The ludicrous and ridiculous are however species of the laughable which arise altogether from reflecting on that which is to the disadvantage of another. The ludicrous lies mostly in the outward circumstances of the individual, or such as are exposed to view and serve as a show; 'The action of the theatre, though modern states esteem it but ludicrous unless it be satirical and biting, was carefully watched by the ancients that it might improve mankind in virtue.'—BACON. The ridiculous applies to every thing personal, whether external or internal; 'Infelix peupertas has nothing in it more intolerable than this, that it renders men ridiculous.'—SOUTH. The ludicrous does not comprehend that which is so much to the disparagement of the individual as the ridiculous; whatever there is in ourselves which excites laughter in others, is accompanied in their minds with a sense of our inferiority: and consequently the ludicrous always produces this feeling; but only in a slight degree compared with the ridiculous, which awakens a positive sense of contempt. Whoever is in a ludicrous situation is, let it be in ever so small a degree, placed in an inferior station, with regard to those by whom he is thus viewed; but he who is rendered ridiculous is positively degraded. It is possible, therefore, for a person to be in a ludicrous situation without any kind of moral demerit, or the slightest depreciation of his moral character; since that which renders his situation ludicrous is altogether independent of himself; or it becomes ludicrous only in the eyes of incompetent judges. 'Let an ambassador,' says Mr. Pope, 'speak the best sense in the world, and deport himself in the most graceful manner before a prince, yet if the tail of his shirt happen, as I have known it happen to a very wise man, to hang out behind, more people will laugh at that than attend to the other.' This is the ludicrous. The same can seldom be said of the ridiculous; for as this springs from positive moral causes, it reflects on the person to whom it attaches in a less questionable shape, and produces positive disgrace. Persons very rarely appear ridiculous without being really so; and he who is really ridiculous justly excites contempt.

Droll and comical are in the proper sense applied to things which cause laughter, as when we speak of a droll story, or a comical incident, or a comick song;

A comick subject loves an humble verse,
Thyestes scorns a low and comick style.

ROSCOMMON

In the Augustinian age itself, notwithstanding the censure of Horace, they preferred the low buffoonery and drollery of Plautus to the delicacy of Terence.—WARTON. These epithets may be applied to the person, but not so as to reflect disadvantageously on the individual, like the preceding terms.

TO DERIDE, MOCK, RIDICULE, RALLY, BANTER.

Deride, compounded of de and the Latin rideo; and ridicule, from rideo, both signify to laugh at; mock, in French moquer, Dutch mocken, Greek μωκω, signifies likewise to laugh at; rally is doubtless connected with rail, which is in all probability a contraction of revile; and banter is possibly a corruption of the French badiner to jest.

Strong expressions of contempt are designated by all these terms.

Derision and mockery evince themselves by the outward actions in general; ridicule consists more in words than actions; rallying and bantering almost entirely in words. Deride is not so strong a term as mock, but much stronger than ridicule. There is always a mixture of hostility in derision and mockery; but ridicule is frequently unaccompanied with any personal feeling of displeasure. Derision is often deep, not loud; it discovers itself in suppressed laughs, contemptuous sneers or gesticulations, and cutting expressions; mockery is mostly noisy and outrageous; it breaks forth in insulting buffoonery, and is sometimes accompanied with personal violence: the former consists of real but contemptuous laughter; the latter often of affected laughter and grimace. Derision and mockery are always personal; ridicule may be directed to things as well as persons. Derision and mockery are a direct attack on the individual, the latter still more so than the former; ridicule is as often used in writing as in personal intercourse.

Derision and mockery are practised by persons in any station; ridicule is mostly used by equals. A person is derided and mocked for that which is offensive as well as apparently absurd or extravagant; he is ridiculed for what is apparently ridiculous. Our Saviour was exposed both to the derision and mockery of his enemies: they derided him for what they dared to think his false pretensions to a superior mission; they mocked him by planting a crown of thorns, and acting the farce of royalty before him.

Derision may be provoked by ordinary circumstances; mockery by that which is extraordinary. When the prophet Elijah in his holy zeal mocked the false prophets of Baal, or when the children mocked the prophet Elisha, the term deride would not have suited either for the occasion or the action; but two people may deride each other in their angry disputes or unprincipled people may deride those whom they cannot imitate, or condemn. Derision and mockery are altogether incompatible with the Christian temper; ridicule is justifiable in certain cases, particularly when it is not personal. When a man renders himself an object of derision, it does not follow that any one is justified in deriding him;

Satan beheld their plight,
And to his mates thus in derision call'd:
O friends, why come not on those victors proud?

MILTON.

Insults are not the means for correcting faults: mockery is very seldom used but for the gratification of a malignant disposition; hence it is a strong expression when used figuratively;

Impell'd with steps unceasing to pursue
Some fleeting good that mocks me with the view.

GOLDSMITH.

Although ridicule is not the test of truth, and ought not to be employed in the place of argument, yet there are some follies too absurd to deserve more serious treatment;

Want is the scorn of every fool,
And wit in rags is turn'd to ridicule.—DRYDEN.

Rally and banter, like derision and mockery, are altogether personal acts, in which application they are very analogous to ridicule. Ridicule is the most general term of the three; we often rally and banter by ridiculing. There is more exposure in ridiculing; reproof in rallying; and provocation in bantering. A person may be ridiculed on account of his eccentricities; he is rallied for his defects; he is bantered for accidental circumstances: the two former actions are often justified by some substantial reason; the latter is an action as puerile as it is unjust, it is a contemptible species of mockery. Self-conceit and extravagant follies are oftentimes best corrected by good-natured ridicule; a man may deserve sometimes to be rallied for his want of resolution; 'The only piece of pleasantry in Paradise Lost, is where the evil spirits are described as rallying the angels upon the success of their new invented artillery.'—ADDISON. Those who are of an ill-natured turn of mind will banter others for their misfortunes, or their personal defects, rather than not say something to their annoyance; 'As to your manner of behaving towards these unhappy young gentlemen (at College) you describe, let it be manly and easy; if they banter your regularity, order, decency, and love of study, banter in return their neglect of it.'

CHATHAM.

RIDICULE, SATIRE, IRONY, SARCASM.

Ridicule signifies the same as in the preceding article; satire and irony have the same original meaning as given under the head of Wit; sarcasm, from the Greek σαρκασμός, and σαρκίζω, from σάρξ, flesh, signifies literally to tear the flesh.

Ridicule has simple laughter in it; satire has a mixture of ill-nature or severity; the former is employed in matters of a shameless or trifling nature, sometimes improperly on deserving objects; 'Nothing is a greater mark of a degenerate and vicious age than the common ridicule which passes on this state of life (marriage).'—ADDISON. Satire is employed either in personal or grave matters; 'A man resents with more bitterness a satire upon his abilities than his practice.'—HAWKESWORTH. Irony is disguised satire; an ironist seems to praise that which he really means to condemn; 'When Regan (in King Lear) counsels him to ask her sister forgiveness, he falls on his knees and asks her with a striking kind of irony how such supplicating language as this becometh him.'—JOHNSON. Sarcasm is bitter and personal satire; all the others may be successfully and properly employed to expose folly and vice; but sarcasm, which is the indulgence only of personal resentment, is never justifiable; 'The severity of this sarcasm stung me with intolerable rage.'—HAWKESWORTH.

TO JEST, JOKE, MAKE GAME, SPORT.

Jest is in all probability abridged from gesticulate, because the ancient mimicks used much gesticulation in breaking their *jest*s on the company; joke, in Latin iocus, comes in all probability from the Hebrew יָחַק to laugh; to make game signifies here to make the subject of game or play; to sport signifies here to sport with, or convert into a subject of amusement.

One *jest*s in order to make others laugh; one jokes in order to please one's self. The jest is directed at the object; the joke is practised with the person or on the person. One attempts to make a thing laughable or ridiculous by jesting about it, or treating it in a jesting manner; one attempts to excite good humour in others, or indulge it in one's self by joking with them. Jests are therefore seldom harmless: jokes are frequently allowable. The most serious subject may be degraded by being turned into a jest;

But those who aim at ridicule,
Should fix upon some certain rule,
Which fairly hints they are in jest.—SWIFT.

Melancholy or dejection of the mind may be conveniently dispelled by a joke;

How fond are men of rule and place,
Who court it from the mean and base,
They love the cellar's vulgar joke,
And lose their hours in ale and smoke.—GAY.

Court fools and buffoons used formerly to break their *jest*s upon every subject by which they thought to entertain their employers: those who know how to joke with good-nature and discretion may contribute to the mirth of the company; to make game of is applicable only to persons; to make a sport of or sport with, is applied to objects in general, whether persons or things. Both are employed like jest in the bad sense of treating a thing more lightly than it deserves; 'When Samson's eyes were out, of a public magistrate he was made a public sport.'—SOUTH.

To jest consists of words or corresponding signs; it is peculiarly appropriate to one who acts a part: to joke consists not only of words, but of simple actions, which are calculated to produce mirth; it is peculiarly applicable to the social intercourse of friends: to make game of consists more of laughter than any; it has not the ingenuity of the jest, nor the good-nature of the joke; it is the part of the fool who wishes to make others appear what he himself really is: to sport with or to make sport of, consists not only of simple actions, but of conduct; it is the error of a weak mind that does not know how to set a due value on any thing, the fool sports with his reputation, when he risks the loss of it for a bauble.

TO SCOFF, GIBE, JEER, SNEER.

Scoff comes from the Greek σκάπτω to deride; gibe and jeer are connected with the word gabbie and jabbler, denoting an unseemly mode of speech; sneer is connected with sneeze and nose, the member by which sneering is performed.

Scoffing is a general term for expressing contempt; we may scoff either by gibes, jeers, or sneers; or we may scoff by opprobrious language and contemptuous looks: to gibe, jeer, and sneer, are personal acts; the gibe and jeer consist of words addressed to an individual; the former has most of ill-nature and reproach in it;

Where town and country vicars flock in tribes,
Secur'd by numbers from the laymen's gibes.—SWIFT.
The latter has more of ridicule or satire in it;

Midas, expos'd to all their jeers,
Had lost his art, and kept his ears.—SWIFT.

They are both, however, applied to the actions of vulgar people, who practise their coarse jokes on each other;

Shrewd fellows and such arch wags! A tribe
That meet for nothing but to gibe.—SWIFT.

'That jeering demeanour is a quality of great offence to others, and danger towards a man's self.'—LORD WENTWORTH. Scoff and sneer are directed either to persons or things as the object; gibe and jeer only towards persons: scoff is taken only in the proper sense; sneer derives its meaning from the literal act of sneering: the scoffer speaks lightly of that which deserves serious attention;

The fop, with learning at defiance
Scoffs at the pedant and the science.—GAY

The sneerer speaks either actually with a sneer or as it were by implication with a sneer; 'There is one short passage still remaining (of Alexis the poet's) which conveys a sneer at Pythagoras.'—CUMBERLAND. The scoffers at religion set at naught all thoughts of decorum, they openly avow the little estimation in which they hold it; the sneers at religion are more sly, but not less malignant; they wish to treat religion with contempt, but not to bring themselves into the contempt they deserve;

And sneers as learnedly as they,
Like females o'er their morning tea.—SWIFT

TO DISPARAGE, DETRACT, TRADUCE, DEPRECIATE, DEGRADE, DECRY.

Disparage, compounded of dis and parage, from par equal, signifies to make unequal or below what it ought to be; detract, in Latin detractum, participle of detraho, from de and traho to draw down, signifies to set a thing below its real value; traduce, in Latin traduco or transduco, signifies to carry from one to another that which is unfavourable; depreciate, from the Latin pretium, a price, signifies to bring down the price; degrade, compounded of de and gradus a step, degree, signifies to bring a degree or step lower than one has been before; decry signifies literally to cry down.

The idea of lowering the value of an object is common to all these words, which differ in the circumstances and object of the action. Disparagement is the most indefinite in the manner: detract and traduce are specific in the forms by which an object is lowered: disparagement respects the mental endowments and qualifications: detract and traduce are said of the moral character; the former, however, in a less specific manner than the latter. We disparage a man's performance by speaking slightly of it; we detract from the merits of a person by ascribing his success to chance; we traduce him by handing about tales that are unfavourable to his reputation: thus authors are apt to disparage the writings of their rivals; 'It is a hard and nice subject for a man to speak of himself; it grates his own heart to say any thing of disparagement, and the reader's ears to hear any thing of praise from him.'—COWLEY. A person may detract from the skill of another; 'I have very often been tempted to write invectives upon those who have detracted from my works; but I look upon it as a peculiar happiness that I have always hindered my resentments from proceeding to this extremity.'—ADDISON. Or he may traduce him by relating scandalous reports: 'Both Homer and Virgil had their compositions usurped by others; both were envied and traduced during their lives.'—WALSH.

To disparage, detract, and traduce, can be applied only to persons, or that which is personal; depreciate, degrade, and decry, to whatever is an object of esteem; we depreciate and degrade, therefore, things as well as persons, and decry things: to depreciate is, however, not so strong a term as to degrade; for the language which is employed to depreciate will be mild compared with that used for degrading: we may depreciate an object by implication, or in indirect terms; but harsh and unseemly epithets are employed for degrading: thus a man may be said to depreciate human nature, who does not represent it as capable of its true elevation; he degrades it who sinks it below the scale of rationality. We may depreciate or degrade an individual, a language, and the like; we decry measures and principles: the two former are an act of an individual; the latter is properly the act of many. Some men have such perverted notions that they are always depreciating whatever is esteemed excellent in the world; 'The business of our modish French authors is to depreciate human nature, and consider it under its worst appearances.'—ADDISON. They whose interests have stifled all feelings of humanity, have degraded the poor Africans, in order to justify the enslaving of them; 'A kenside certainly retained an unnecessary and outrageous zeal for what he called and thought liberty; a zeal which sometimes disguises from the world an envious desire of plundering wealth, or degrading greatness.'—JOHNSON. Political partisans commonly decry the measures of one party, in order to exalt those of another; 'Ignorant men are very subject to decry those beauties in a celebrated work which they have not eyes to discover.'—ADDISON.

TO DISPARAGE, DEROGATE, DEGRADE.

Disparage and degrade have the same meaning as given in the preceding article; derogate, in Latin derogatus, from derogo to repeal in part, signifies to take from a thing.

Disparage is here employed, not as the act of persons, but of things, in which case it is allied to derogate, but retains its indefinite and general sense as before: circumstances may disparage the performance of a writer; or they may derogate from the honours and dignities of an individual: it would be a high disparagement to an author to have it known that he had been guilty of plagiarism; it derogates from the dignity of a magistrate to take part in popular measures. To degrade is here, as in the former case, a much stronger expression than the other two: whatever disparages or derogates does but take away a part from the value; but whatever degrades sinks it many degrees in the estimation of those in whose eyes it is degraded; in this manner religion is degraded by the low arts of its enthusiastick professors; 'Of the mind that can deliberately pollute itself with ideal wickedness, for the sake of spreading the contagion in society, I wish not to conceal or excuse the depravity. Such degradation of the dignity of genius cannot be contemplated but with grief and indignation.'—JOHNSON. Whatever may tend to the disparagement of a religious profession, does injury to the cause of truth; 'Tis no disparagement to philosophy, that it cannot deify us.'—GLANVILLE. Whatever derogates from the dignity of a man in any office is apt to degrade the office itself; 'I think we may say, without derogating from those wonderful performances (the Iliad and Æneid), that there is an unquestionable magnificence in every part of Paradise Lost, and indeed a much greater than could have been formed upon any Pagan system.'—ADDISON.

TO ASPERSE, DETRACT, DEFAME,
SLANDER, CALUMNIATE.

Asperse, in Latin aspergus, participle of aspergo to sprinkle, signifies in a moral sense to stain with spots, detract has the same signification as given under the head of disparage; defame, in Latin defamo, compounded of the privative de and fama fame, signifies to deprive of reputation; slander is doubtless connected with the words slur, sully, and soil, signifying to stain with some spot; calumniate, from the Latin calumniā, and the Hebrew סלם infamy, signifies to load with infamy.

All these terms denote an effort made to injure the character by some representation. Asperse and detract mark an indirect misrepresentation; defame, slander, and calumniate, a positive assertion.

To asperse is to fix a stain on a moral character; to detract is to lessen its merits and excellencies. Aspersions always imply something bad, real or supposed; detractions are always founded on some supposed good in the object that is detracted: to defame is openly to advance some serious charge against the character: to slander is to expose the faults of another in his absence: to calumniate is to communicate secretly, or otherwise, circumstances to the injury of another.

Aspersions and detractions are never positive falsehoods, as they never amount to more than insinuations; defamation is the publick communication of facts, whether true or false: slander involves the discussion of moral qualities, and is consequently the declaration of an opinion as well as the communication of a fact: calumny, on the other hand, is a positive communication of circumstances known by the narrator at the time to be false. Aspersions are the effect of malice and meanness; they are the resource of the basest persons, insidiously to wound the characters of those whom they dare not openly attack: the most virtuous are exposed to the malignity of the asperser; 'It is certain, and observed by the wisest writers, that there are women who are not nicely chaste, and men not severely honest, in all families; therefore let those who may be apt to raise aspersions upon ours, please to give us an impartial account of their own, and we shall be satisfied.'—STEELE. Detraction is the effect of envy: when a man is not disposed or able to follow the example of another, he strives to detract from the merit of his actions by questioning the purity of his motives: distinguished persons are the most exposed to the evil tongues of detractors; 'What made their enmity the more entertaining to all the rest of their sex was, that in their detracting from each other, neither could fall upon terms which did not hit herself as much as her adversary.'—STEELE. Defamation is the consequence of personal resentment, or a busy interference with other men's affairs; it is an unjustifiable exposure of their errors or vices, which is often visited with the due vengeance of the law upon the offender; 'What shall we say of the pleasure a man takes in a defamatory libel? Is it not a heinous sin in the sight of God?'—ADDISON. Slander arises either from a mischievous temper, or a gossiping humour; it is the resource of ignorant and vacant minds, who are in want of some serious occupation: the slanderer deals numerically with his neighbour, and speaks without regard to truth or falsehood;

Slander, that worst of poisons, ever finds
An easy entrance to ignoble minds.—HERVEY.

Calumny is the worst of actions, resulting from the worst of motives; to injure the reputation of another by the sacrifice of truth, is an accumulation of guilt which is hardly exceeded by any one in the whole catalogue of vices; 'The way to silence calumny, says Bias, is to be always exercised in such things as are praiseworthy.'—ADDISON. Slanderers and calumniators are so near a-kin, that they are but too often found in the same person: it is to be expected that when the slanderer has exhausted all his surmises and censure upon his neighbour, he will not hesitate to calumniate him rather than remain silent.

If I speak slightly of my neighbour, and insinuate any thing against the purity of his principles, or the rectitude of his conduct, I aspere him: if he be a charitable man, and I ascribe his charities to a selfish motive, or otherwise take away from the merit of his conduct, I am guilty of detracting: if I publish any thing openly that injures his reputation, I am a defamer: if I communicate to others the reports that are in circulation to his disadvantage, I am a slanderer: if I fabricate any thing myself and spread it abroad, I am a calumniator.

TO ABASE, HUMBLE, DEGRADE, DISGRACE, DEBASE.

To abase expresses the strongest degree of self-humiliation, from the French abaisser, to bring down or make low, which is compounded of the intensive syllable a or ad and baisser from bas low, in Latin basis the base, which is the lowest part of a column. It is at present used principally in the Scripture language, or in a metaphorical style, to imply the laying aside all the high pretensions which distinguish us from our fellow-creatures, the descending to a state comparatively low and mean; to humble, in French humilier, from the Latin humilis humble, and humus the ground, naturally marks a prostration to the ground, and figuratively a lowering the thoughts and feelings. According to the principles of Christianity whoever abaseth himself shall be exalted, and according to the same principles whoever reflects on his own littleness and unworthiness will daily humble himself before his Maker.

To degrade (v. To disparage), signifies to lower in the estimation of others. It supposes already a state of elevation either in outward circumstances or in public opinion; disgrace is compounded of the privative dis and the noun grace or favour. To disgrace properly implies to put out of favour, which is always attended more or less with circumstances of ignominy, and reflects contempt on the object; debase is compounded of the intensive syllable de and the adjective base, signifying to make very base or low.

The modest man abases himself by not insisting on the distinctions to which he may be justly entitled; the penitent man humbles himself by confessing his errors; the man of rank degrades himself by a too familiar deportment with his inferiours; he disgraces himself by his meanness and irregularities, and debases his character by his vices.

We can never be abased by abasing ourselves, but we may be humbled by unseasonable humiliations, or improper concessions; we may be degraded by descending from our rank, and disgraced by the exposure of our unworthy actions.

The great and good man may be abased and humiliated, but never degraded or disgraced; his glory follows him in his abatement or humiliation; his greatness protects him from degradation, and his virtue shields him from disgrace.

'Tis immortality, 'tis that alone
Amid life's pains, abasements, emptiness,
The soul can comfort.—YOUNG.

My soul is justly humbled in the dust.—ROWE.

It is necessary to abase those who will exalt themselves; to humble those who have lofty opinions of themselves; 'If the mind be curbed and humbled too much in children; if their spirits be abased and broken much by too strict a hand over them; they lose all their vigour and industry.'—LOCKE. Those who act inconsistently with their rank and station are frequently degraded; but it is more common for others to be unjustly degraded through the envy and ill-will of their inferiours; 'It is very disingenuous to level the best of mankind with the worst, and for the faults of particulars to degrade the whole species.'—HUGHES. Folly and wickedness bring disgrace on courts, where the contrary ought to be found;

You'd think no fools disgraced the former reign,
Did not some grave examples still remain.—POPE.

The misuse of things for inferior purposes debases their value; 'It is a kind of taking God's name in vain, to debase religion with such frivolous disputes.'—HOOKER.

Of all these terms degrade and disgrace are the most nearly allied to each other; but the former has most regard to the external rank and condition, the latter to the moral estimation and character. Whatever is low and mean is degrading for those who are not of mean condition; whatever is immoral is disgraceful to all, but most so to those who ought to know better. It is degrading for a nobleman to associate with prize-fighters and jockeys; it is disgraceful for him to countenance the violation of the laws, which he is bound to protect; it is degrading for a clergyman to take part in the ordinary pleasures and occupations of mankind in general; it is disgraceful for him to indulge in any levities; Domitian degraded himself by the amusement which he chose of catching flies; he disgraced himself by the cruelty which he mixed with his meanness; king John of England degraded himself by his mean compliances to the pope and the barons, and disgraced himself by many acts of injustice and cruelty.

The higher the rank of the individual the greater his degradation: the higher his character, or the more sacred his office, the greater his disgrace, if he act inconsistently with its dignity: but these terms are not confined to any rank of life; there is that which is degrading and disgraceful for every person, however low his station; when a man forfeits that which he owes to himself, and sacrifices his independence to his vices, he degrades himself; 'When a hero is to be pulled down and degraded it is best done in doggerel.'—ADDISON. 'So deplorable is the degradation of our nature, that whereas before we bore the image of God, we now only retain the image of men.'—SOUTH. He who forfeits the good opinion of those who know him is disgraced, and he who fails to bestow on an object the favour or esteem which it is entitled to disgraces it; 'We may not so in any one kind admire her, that we disgrace her in any other; but let all her ways be according unto their place and degree adored.'—HOOKER. But although the term disgrace when generally applied is always taken in a bad sense, yet in regard to individuals it may be taken in an indifferent sense; it is possible to be disgraced, or to lose the favour of a patron, through his caprice, without any fault on the part of the disgraced person; 'Philips died honoured and lamented, before any part of his reputation had withered, and before his patron St. John had disgraced him.'

Men are very liable to err in their judgements on what is degrading and disgraceful; but all who are anxious to uphold the station and character in which they have been placed, may safely observe this rule, that nothing can be so degrading as the violation of truth and sincerity, and nothing so disgraceful as a breach of moral rectitude or propriety.

These terms may be employed with a similar distinction in regard to things; a thing is degraded which falls any degree in the scale of general estimation;

All higher knowledge, in her presence, falls
Degraded.—MILTON.

A thing is disgraced when it becomes or is made less lovely and desirable than it was;

And where the vales with violets once were crown'd,
Now knotty burs and thorns disgrace the ground.
—DRYDEN.

TO ABASH, CONFOUND, CONFUSE.

Abash is an intensive of abase, signifying to abase thoroughly in spirit; confound and confuse are derived from different parts of the same Latin verb confundo, and its participle confusus. Confundo is compounded of con and fundo to pour together. To confound and confuse then signify properly to melt together or into one mass what ought to be distinct; and figuratively, as it is here taken, to derange the thoughts in such manner as that they seem melted together.

Abash expresses more than confound, and confound more than confuse; shame contributes greatly to abashment; what is sudden and unaccountable serves to confound; hashfulness and a variety of emotions give rise to confusion.

The haughty man is abashed when he is humbled in the eyes of others, or the sinner when he stands convicted; 'If Peter was so abashed when Christ gave him a look after his denial; if there was so much dread in his looks when he was a prisoner; how much greater will it be when he sits as a judge.'—SOUTH. The wicked man is confounded when his villany is suddenly detected;

Alas! I am afraid they have awak'd,
And 'tis not done: th' attempt, and not the deed,
Confounds us!—SHAKESPEARE.

A modest person may be confused in the presence of his superiors; 'The various evils of disease and poverty, pain and sorrow, are frequently derived from others; but shame and confusion are supposed to proceed from ourselves, and to be incurred only by the misconduct which they furnish.'—HAWKESWORTH.

Abash is always taken in a bad sense: neither the scorn of fools, nor the taunts of the oppressor, will abash him who has a conscience void of offence towards God and man. To be confounded is not always the consequence of guilt; superstition and ignorance are liable to be confounded by extraordinary phenomena; and Providence sometimes thinks fit to confound the wisdom of the wisest by signs and wonders, far above the reach of human comprehension. Confusion is at the best an infirmity more or less excusable according to the nature of the cause: a steady mind and a clear head are not easily confused, but persons of quick sensibility cannot always preserve a perfect collection of thought in trying situations, and those who have any consciousness of guilt, and are not very hardened, will be soon thrown into confusion by close interrogatories.

DISHONOUR, DISGRACE, SHAME.

Dishonour implies the state of being without honour, or the thing which does away honour: disgrace signifies the state of disgrace, or that which causes the disgrace (v. Abase); shame denotes either the feeling of being ashamed, or that which causes this feeling.

Disgrace is more than dishonour, and less than shame. The disgrace is applicable to those who are not sensible of the dishonour, and the shame for those who are not sensible of the disgrace. The tender mind is alive to dishonour: those who yield to their passions, or are hardened in their vicious courses, are alike insensible to disgrace or shame. Dishonour is seldom the consequence of any offence, or offered with any intention of punishing; it lies mostly in the consciousness of the individual. Disgrace and shame are the direct consequences of misconduct: but the former applies to circumstances of less importance than the latter; consequently the feeling of being in disgrace is not so strong as that of shame. A citizen feels it a dishonour not to be chosen to those offices of trust and honour for which he considers himself eligible; it is a disgrace to a schoolboy to be placed the lowest in his class; which is heightened into shame if it brings him into punishment;

Like a dull actor now,
I have forgot my part, and I am out
Even to a full disgrace.—SHAKESPEARE.

'I was secretly concerned to see human nature in so much wretchedness and disgrace, but could not forbear smiling to hear Sir Roger advise the old woman to avoid all communications with the devil.'—ADISON.

The fear of dishonour acts as a laudable stimulus to the discharge of one's duty; the fear of disgrace or shame serves to prevent the commission of vices or crimes. A soldier feels it a dishonour not to be placed at the post of danger;

'T is no dishonour for the brave to die.—DRYDEN.

But he is not always sufficiently alive to the disgrace of being punished, nor is he deterred from his irregularities by the open shame to which he is sometimes put in the presence of his fellow-soldiers;

Where the proud theatres disclose the scene

Which interwoven Britons seem to raise,

And show the triumph which their shame displays.
—DRYDEN.

As epithets these terms likewise rise in sense, and are distinguished by other characteristics; a dishonourable action is that which violates the principles of honour; a disgraceful action is that which reflects disgrace; a shameful action is that of which one ought to be fully ashamed: it is very dishonourable for a man not to keep his word, or for a soldier not to maintain his post;

He did dishonourable find

Those articles which did our state decrease.
—DANIEL.

It is very disgraceful for a gentleman to associate with those who are his inferiours in station and education; 'Masters must correct their servants with gentleness, prudence, and mercy, not with upbraiding and disgraceful language.'—TAYLOR (Holy Living). It is very shameful for a gentleman to use his rank and influence over the lower orders only to mislead them from their duty;

This all through that great prince's pride did fall,

And came to shameful end.—SPENSER.

A person is likewise said to be dishonourable who is disposed to bring dishonour upon himself; but things only are disgraceful or shameful: a dishonourable man renders himself an outcast among his equals; he must then descend to his inferiours, among whom he may become familiar with the disgraceful and the shameful: men of cultivation are alive to what is dishonourable; men of all stations are alive to that which is for them disgraceful, or to that which is in itself shameful: the sense of what is dishonourable is to the superiour what the sense of the disgraceful is to the inferiour; but the sense of what is shameful is independent of rank or station, and forms a part of that moral sense which is inherent in the breast of every rational creature. Whoever therefore cherishes in himself a lively sense of what is dishonourable or disgraceful is tolerably secure of never committing any thing that is shameful.

DISCREDIT, DISGRACE, REPROACH, SCANDAL.

Discredit signifies the loss of credit; disgrace, the loss of grace, favour, or esteem; reproach stands for the thing that deserves to be reproached; and scandal for the thing that gives scandal or offence.

The conduct of men in their various relations with each other may give rise to the unfavourable sentiment which is expressed in common by these terms. Things are said to reflect discredit, or disgrace to bring reproach or scandal, on the individual. These terms seem to rise in sense one upon the other: disgrace is a stronger term than discredit; reproach than disgrace; and scandal than reproach.

Discredit interferes with a man's credit or respectability; disgrace marks him out as an object of unfavourable distinction; reproach makes him a subject of reproachful conversation; scandal makes him an of offence or even abhorrence. As regularity in hours, regularity in habits or modes of living, regularity in payments, are a credit to a family; so is any deviation from this order to its discredit: as moral rectitude, kindness, charity, and benevolence, serve to ensure the good-will and esteem of men; so do instances of unfair dealing, cruelty, inhumanity, and an unfeeling temper, tend to the disgrace of the offender: as a life of distinguished virtue or particular instances of moral excellence, may cause a man to be spoken of in strong terms of commendation; so will flagrant atrocities or a course of immorality cause his name and himself to be the general subject of reproach: as the profession of a Christian with a consistent practice is the greatest ornament which a man can put on: so is the profession with an inconsistent practice the greatest deformity that can be witnessed; it is calculated to bring a scandal on religion itself in the eyes of those who do not know and feel its intrinsic excellencies.

Discredit depends much on the character, circumstances, and situation of those who discredit and those who are discredited. Those who are in responsible situations, and have had confidence reposed in them, must have a peculiar guard over their conduct not to bring discredit on themselves: disgrace depends on the temper of men's minds as well as collateral circumstances; where a nice sense of moral propriety is prevalent in any community, disgrace inevitably attaches to a deviation from good morals. Reproach and scandal refer more immediately to the nature of the actions than the character of the persons; the former being employed in general matters; the latter mostly in a religious application: it is greatly to the discredit of all heads of public institutions, when they allow of abuses that interfere with the good order of the establishment, or divert it from its original purpose; 'T is the duty of every Christian to be concerned for the reputation or discredit his life may bring on his profession.'—ROGERS. 'When a man is made up wholly of the dove without the least grain of the serpent in his composition, he becomes ridiculous in many circumstances of his life, and very often discredits his best actions.'—ADDISON. In Sparta the slightest intemperance reflected great disgrace on the offender;

And he whose affluence disdain'd a place,
Brib'd by a title, makes it a disgrace.—BROWN.

In the present age, when the views of men on Christianity and its duties are so much more enlightened than they ever were, it is a reproach to any nation to continue to traffick in the blood of its fellow-creatures; 'The cruelty of Mary's persecution equalled the deeds of those tyrants who have been the reproach to human nature.'—ROBERTSON. The blasphemous indecencies of which religious enthusiasts are guilty in the excess of their zeal is a scandal to all sober-minded Christians;

His lustful orgies he enlarged
Even to the hill of scandal, by the grove
Of Moloch homicide.—MILTON.

INFAMOUS, SCANDALOUS.

Infamous, like infamy (v. Infamy), is applied to both persons and things; scandalous, or causing scandal, only to things: a character is infamous, or a transaction is infamous; but a transaction only is scandalous. Infamous and scandalous are both said of that which is calculated to excite great displeasure in the minds of all who hear it, and to degrade the offenders in the general estimation; but the infamous seems to be that which produces greater publicity, and more general reprehension, than the scandalous, consequently is that which is more serious in its nature, and a greater violation of good morals. Many of the leaders in the French revolution rendered themselves infamous by their violence, their rapine, and their murders; 'There is no crime more infamous than the violation of truth.'—JOHNSON. The trick which was played upon the subscribers to the South Sea Company was a scandalous fraud, 'It is a very great, though sad and scandalous truth, that rich men are esteemed and honoured, while the ways by which they grow rich are abhorred.'—SOUTH

INFAMY, IGNOMINY, OPPOBRIUM.

Infamy is the opposite to good fame; it consists in an evil report; ignominy, from nomen a name, signifies an ill name, a stained name; opprobrium, a Latin word, compounded of op or ob and probrium, signifies the highest degree of reproach or stain.

The idea of discredit or disgrace in the highest possible degree is common to all these terms: but infamy is that which attaches more to the thing than to the person; ignominy is thrown upon the person; and opprobrium is thrown upon the agent rather than the action.

The infamy causes either the person or thing to be ill spoken of by all; abhorrence of both is expressed by every mouth, and the ill report spreads from mouth to mouth; ignominy causes the name and the person to be held in contempt; and to become debased in the eyes of others: opprobrium causes the person to be spoken of in severe terms of reproach, and to be shunned as something polluted. The infamy of a traitorous proceeding is increased by the addition of ingratitude; the ignominy of a public punishment is increased by the wickedness of the offender; opprobrium sometimes falls upon the innocent, when circumstances seem to convict them of guilt.

Infamy is bestowed by the public voice; it does not belong to one nation or one age, but to every age: the infamy of a base transaction, as the massacre of the Danes in England, or of the Hugonots in France, will be handed down to the latest posterity; 'The share of infamy that is likely to fall to the lot of each individual in public acts is small indeed.'—BURKE. Ignominy is brought on a person by the act of the magistrate: the public sentence of the law, and the infliction of that sentence, exposes the name to public scorn; the ignominy, however, seldom extends beyond the individuals who are immediately concerned in it: every honest man, however humble his station and narrow his sphere, would fain preserve his name from being branded with the ignominy of either himself, or any of his family, suffering death on the gallows;

For strength from truth divided, and from just,
Illaudable naught merits but dispraise,
And ignominy.—MILTON.

Opprobrium is the judgement passed by the public; it is more silent and even more confined than the infamy and the ignominy; individuals are exposed to it according to the nature of the imputations under which they lie: every good man would be anxious to escape the opprobrium of having forfeited his integrity;

Nor he their outward only with the skins
Of beasts, but inward nakedness much more
Opprobrious, with his robe of righteousness
Arraying, cover'd from his father's sight.

MILTON.

TO REVILE, VILIFY.

Revile, from the Latin vilis, signifies to reflect upon a person, or retort upon him that which is vile: to vilify, signifies to make a thing vile, that is, to set it forth as vile.

To revile is a personal act, it is addressed directly to the object of offence, and is addressed for the purpose of making the person vile in his own eyes: to vilify is an indirect attack which serves to make the object appear vile in the eyes of others. Revile is said only of persons, for persons only are reviled; but vilify is said mostly of things, for things are often vilified. To revile is contrary to all Christian duty; it is commonly resorted to by the most worthless, and practised upon the most worthy;

But chief he gloried with licentious style,
To lash the great, and monarchs to revile.—POPE.

To vilify is seldom justifiable; for we cannot vilify without using improper language; it is seldom resorted to but for the gratification of ill nature: 'There is nobody so weak of invention that cannot make some little stories to vilify his enemy.'—ADDISON.

REPROACH, CONTUMELY, OBLOQUY.

Reproach has the same signification as given under To Blame; contumely, from contumeo, as contra tumeo, signifies to swell up against; obloquy, from ob and loquor, signifies speaking against or to the disparagement of.

The idea of contemptuous or angry treatment of others is common to all these terms; but reproach is the general, contumely and obloquy are the particular terms. Reproach is either deserved or undeserved; the name of Puritan is applied as a term of reproach to such as affect greater purity than others; the name of Christian is a name of reproach in Turkey; but reproach taken absolutely is always supposed to be undeserved, and to be itself a vice;

Has foul reproach a privilege from heav'n?—POPE.

Contumely is always undeserved; it is the insolent swelling of a worthless person against merit in distress; our Saviour was exposed to the contumely of the Jews; 'The royal captives followed in the train, amid the horrid yells, and frantic dances, and infamous contumelies, of the furies of hell.'—BURKE. Obloquy is always supposed to be deserved; it is applicable to those whose conduct has rendered them objects of general censure, and whose name therefore has almost become a reproach. A man who uses his power only to oppress those who are connected with him will naturally and deservedly bring upon himself much obloquy; 'Reasonable moderation hath freed us from being subject unto that kind of obloquy, whereby as the church of Rome doth, under the colour of love towards those things which lie harmless, maintain extremely most hurtful corruptions; so we, peradventure might be upbraided, that under colour of hatred towards those things that are corrupt, we are on the other side as extreme, even against most harmless ordinances.'—HOOKER.

REPROACHFUL, ABUSIVE, SCURRILOUS.

Reproachful, when applied to the person, signifies full of reproaches; when to the thing, deserving of reproach: abusive is only applied to the person, signifying after the manner of abuse: scurrilous, from scurra a buffoon, is employed as an epithet either for persons or things, signifying using scurrility, or the language of a buffoon. The conduct of a person is reproachful in as much as it provokes or is entitled to the reproaches of others; the language of a person is reproachful when it abounds in reproaches, or partakes of the nature of a reproach: a person is abusive who indulges himself in abuse or abusive language; and he is scurrilous who adopts scurrility or scurrilous language.

When applied to the same object, whether to the person or to the thing, they rise in sense. the reproachful is less than the abusive, and this than the scurrilous: the reproachful is sometimes warranted by the provocation; but the abusive and scurrilous are always unwarrantable: reproachful language may be consistent with decency and propriety of speech, but when the term is taken absolutely, it is generally in the bad sense; 'Honour teaches a man not to revenge a contumelious or reproachful word, but to be above it.'—SOUTH. Abusive and scurrilous language are outrages against the laws of good breeding, if not of morality;

Thus envy pleads a nat'ral claim
To persecute the Muse's fame,
Our poets in all times abusive,
From Homer down to Pope inclusive.

SWIFT.

'Let your mirth be ever void of all scurrility and biting words to any man.'—SIR HENRY SIDNEY. A parent may sometimes find it necessary to address an unruly son in reproachful terms; or one friend may adopt a reproachful tone to another; none, however, but the lowest orders of men, and those only when their angry passions are awakened, will descend to abusive or scurrilous language.

TO REPROBATE, CONDEMN.

To reprobate, which is a variation of reproach, is much stronger than to condemn, which bears the same general meaning as given under To Blame; we always condemn when we reprobate, but not vice versa: to reprobate is to condemn in strong and reproachful language. We reprobate all measures which tend to sow discord in society, and to loosen the ties by which men are bound to each other; 'Simulation (according to Mr Lord Chesterfield) is by no means to be reprobated as a disguise for chagrin or an engine of wit.'—MACKENZIE. We condemn all disrespectful language to wards superiors;

I see the right, and I approve it too;

Condemn the wrong, and yet the wrong pursue.

TATE.

We reprobate only the thing; we condemn the person also: any act of disobedience in a child cannot be too strongly reprobated; a person must expect to be condemned when he involves himself in embarrassments through his own imprudence.

ABUSE, INVECTIVE.

Abuse, which from the Latin abutor, signifying to injure by improperly using, is here taken in the metaphorical application for ill-treatment of persons; investive, from the Latin inveho, signifies to bear upon or against. Harsh and unseemly censure is the idea common to these terms; but the former is employed more properly against the person, the latter against the thing.

Abuse is addressed to the individual, and mostly by word of mouth: investive is communicated mostly by writing. Abuse is dictated by anger, which throws off all constraint, and violates all decency: investive is dictated by party spirit, or an intemperate warmth of feeling in matters of opinion. Abuse is always resorted to by the vulgar in their private quarrels: investive is the ebullition of zeal and ill-nature in public concerns.

The more rude and ignorant the man, the more liable he is to indulge in abuse; 'At an entertainment given by Pisistratus to some of his intimates, Thra-sippus, a man of violent passion, and inflamed with wine, took some occasion, not recorded, to break out into the most violent abuse and insult.'—CUMBERLAND. The more restless and opinionated the partisan, whether in religion or politics, the more ready he is to deal in investive; 'This is a true way of examining a libel; and when men consider that no man living thinks better of their heroes and patrons for the panegyric given them, none can think themselves lessened by their investive.'—STEELE. We must expect to meet with abuse from the vulgar whom we offend; and if we are in high stations, our conduct will draw forth investive from busybodies, whom spleen has converted into oppositionists.

DECLAIM, INVEIGH.

Declaim, in Latin declamo, that is, de and clamo, signifies literally to cry in a set form of words; inveigh is taken in the same sense as given in the preceding article.

To declaim is to speak either for or against a person; declaiming is in all cases a noisy kind of oratory; 'It is usual for masters to make their boys declaim on both sides of an argument.'—SWIFT. To inveigh signifies always to speak against the object; in this latter application public men and public measures are subjects for the declaimer; private individuals afford subjects for inveighing; the former is under the influence of particular opinions or prejudices; the latter is the fruit of personal resentment or displeasure: patriots (as they are called) are always declaiming against the conduct of those in power, or the state of the nation; and not unfrequently they profit by the opportunity of indulging their private pique by inveighing against particular members of the government who have disappointed their expectations of advancement. A declaimer is noisy; he is a man of words; he makes long and loud speeches; 'Tully (was) a good orator, yet no good poet; Sallust, a good historiographer, but no good declaimer.'—FOTHERBY. An inveigher is virulent and personal; he enters into private details, and often indulges his malignant feelings under an affected regard for morality; 'Ill-tempered and extravagant inveives against papists, made by men, whose persons wanting authority, as much as their speeches do reason, do nothing else but set an edge on our adversaries' sword.'—JACKSON. Although both these words may be applied to moral objects, yet declamations are more directed towards the thing, and invectives against the person; 'The grave and the merry have equally thought themselves at liberty to conclude, either with declamatory complaints, or satirical censures of female folly.'—JOHNSON.

Scarce were the flocks refresh'd with morning dew,
When Damon stretch'd beneath an olive shade,
And wildly staring upward thus inveigh'd
Against the conscious gods. —DRYDEN.

TO BLAME, REPROVE, REPROACH, UPBRAID, CENSURE, CONDEMN.

Blame, in French blamer, probably from the Greek βλάπτω, perfect of the verb βλάττω to hurt, signifying to deal harshly with; reprove comes from the Latin reprobo, which signifies the contrary of probo, to approve; reproach, in French reprocher, compounded of re and proche, proximus near, signifies to cast back upon a person; upbraid, compounded of up or upon, and braid or breed, signifies to hatch against one; censure, in French censure, Latin censura, the censorship, or the office of censor; the censor being a Roman magistrate, who took cognizance of the morals and manners of the people, and punished offences against either; condemn, in French condamner, Latin condemno, compounded of con and danno, from dammum, a loss or penalty, signifies to sentence to some penalty.

The expression of one's disapprobation of a person, or of that which he has done, is the common idea in the signification of these terms; but to blame expresses less than to reprove. We simply charge with a fault in blaming; but in reproving, severity is mixed with the charge. Reproach expresses more than either; it is to blame acrimoniously. We need not hesitate to blame as occasion may require; but it is proper to be cautious how we deal out reproof where the necessity of the case does not fully warrant it; and it is highly culpable to reproach without the most substantial reason.

To blame and reprove are the acts of a superiour; to reproach, upbraid, that of an equal: to censure and condemn leave the relative condition of the parties undefined. Masters blame or reprove their servants; parents their children; friends and acquaintances reproach and upbraid each other; persons of all conditions may censure or be censured, condemn or be condemned, according to circumstances.

Blame and reproof are dealt out on every ordinary occasion; reproach and upbraid respect personal matters, and always that which affects the moral character; censure and condemnation are provoked by faults and misconduct of different descriptions. Every fault, however trivial, may expose a person to blame, particularly if he perform any office for the vulgar, who are never contented;

Chafe not thyself about the rabble's censure:

They blame or praise, but as one leads the other.

PROWDE.

Intentional errors, however small, seem necessarily to call for reproof, and yet it is a mark of an imperious temper to substitute reproof in the place of admonition, when the latter might possibly answer the purpose; 'In all terms of reproof, when the sentence appears to arise from personal hatred or passion, it is not then made the cause of mankind, but a misunderstanding between two persons.'—STEELE. There is nothing which provokes a reproach sooner than ingratitude, although the offender is not entitled to so much notice from the injured person;

The prince replies: 'Ah cease, divinely fair,

Nor add reproaches to the wounds I bear.'—POPE.

Mutual upbraidings commonly follow between those who have mutually contributed to their misfortunes;

Have we not known thee, slave! Of all the host,
The man who acts the least upbraids the most.

POPE.

The defective execution of a work is calculated to draw down censure upon its author, particularly if he betray a want of modesty;

Though ten times worse themselves, you'll frequent view

Those who with keenest rage will censure you.—PITT.

The mistakes of a general, or a minister of state, will provoke condemnation, particularly if his integrity be called in question;

Thus they in mutual accusation spent

The fruitless hours, but neither self-condemning.

MILTON.

Blame, reproof, and upbraid, are always addressed directly to the individual in person; reproach, censure, and condemnation, are sometimes conveyed through an indirect channel, or not addressed at all to the party who is the object of them. When a master blames his servant, or a parent reproves his child, or one friend upbraids another, he directs his discourse to him to express his disapprobation. A man will always be reproached by his neighbours for the vices he commits, however he may fancy himself screened from their observation; 'The very regret of being surpassed in any valuable quality, by a person of the same abilities with ourselves, will reproach our own laziness, and even shame us into imitation.'—ROGERS. Writers censure each other in their publications;

Men may censure thine (weakness)

The gentler, if severely thou exact not

More strength from me, than in thyself was found.

MILTON

The conduct of individuals is sometimes condemned by the public at large; 'They who approve my conduct in this particular are much more numerous than those who condemn it.'—SPECTATOR.

Blame, reproach, upbraid, and condemn, may be applied to ourselves; reproof and censure are applied to others: we blame ourselves for acts of imprudence; our consciences reproach us for our weaknesses, and upbraid or condemn us for our sins.

REPREHENSION, REPROOF.

Personal blame or censure is implied by both these terms, but the former is much milder than the latter. By reprehension the personal independence is not so sensibly affected as in the case of reproof: people of all ages and stations whose conduct is exposed to the investigation of others are liable to reprehension; but children only or such as are in a subordinate capacity are exposed to reproof. The reprehension amounts to little more than passing an unfavourable sentence upon the conduct of another; 'When a man feels the reprehension of a friend, seconded by his own heart, he is easily heated into resentment.'—JOHNSON. Reproof adds to the reprehension an unfriendly address to the offender; 'There is an oblique way of reproof which takes off from the sharpness of it.'—STEELE. The master of a school may be exposed to the reprehension of the parents for any supposed impropriety: his scholars are subject to his frequent reproof.

TO CHECK, CHIDE, REPRIMAND, REPROVE, REBUKE.

Check derives its figurative signification from the check-mate, a movement in the game of chess, whereby one stops one's adversary from making a further move; whence to check signifies to stop the course of a person, and on this occasion by the exercise of authority; chide is in Saxon cidan, probably connected with cyldan to scold; reprimand is compounded of the privative syllable reprim and mand, in Latin mando to command, signifying not to commend; reprove, in French reprover, Latin reprobo, is compounded of the privative syllable re and probo, signifying to find the contrary of good, that is, to find bad, to blame; rebuks is compounded of re and buke, in French bouche the mouth, signifying to stop the mouth.

The idea of expressing one's disapprobation of a person's conduct is common to all these terms.

A person is checked that he may not continue to do what is offensive; he is chidden for what he has done that he may not repeat it; impertinent and forward people require to be checked, that they may not become intolerable;

I hate when vice can bolt her arguments,

And virtue has no tongue to check her pride.

MILTON.

Thoughtless people are chidden when they give hurtful proofs of their carelessness; 'What had he to do to chide at me?'—SHAKESPEARE.

People are checked by actions and looks, as well as words;

But if a clam'rous vile plebeian rose,
Him with reproof he check'd, or tam'd with blows.
POPE.

They are chidden by words only: a timid person is easily checked; the want even of due encouragement will serve to damp his resolution: the young are perpetually falling into irregularities which require to be chidden;

His house was known to all the vagrant train,
He chid their wanderings, but reliev'd their pain.
GOLDSMITH.

To chide marks a stronger degree of displeasure than reprimand, and reprimand than reprove or rebuke; a person may chide or reprimand in anger, he reproves and rebukes with coolness: great offences call for chidings; omissions or mistakes occasion or require a reprimand; 'This sort of language was very severely reprimanded by the Censor, who told the criminal "that he spoke in contempt of the court."'—ADDISON AND STEELE. Irregularities of conduct give rise to reproof; 'He who endeavours only the happiness of him whom he reproves, will always have the satisfaction of either obtaining or deserving kindness.'—JOHNSON. Improprieties of behaviour demand rebuke; 'With all the infirmities of his disciples he calmly bore; and his rebukes were mild when their provocations were great.'—BLAIR.

Chiding and reprimanding are employed for offences against the individual, and in cases where the greatest disparity exists in the station of the parties; a child is chid by his parent; a servant is reprimanded by his master.

Reproving and rebuking have less to do with the relation or station of the parties, than with the nature of the offence: wisdom, age, and experience, or a spiritual mission, give authority to reprove or rebuke those whose conduct has violated any law, human or divine: the prophet Nathan reproved king David for his heinous offences against his Maker; our Saviour rebuked Peter for his presumptuous mode of speech.

TO ACCUSE, CHARGE, IMPEACH, ARRAIGN.

Accuse, in Latin accuso, compounded of ac or ad and cuso or causa a cause or trial, signifies to bring to trial; charge, from the word cargo a burden, signifies to lay a burden; impeach, in French empecher to hinder or disturb, compounded of em or in and pes the foot, signifies to set one's foot or one's self against another; arraign, compounded of ar or ad and raign or range, signifies to range, or set at the bar of a tribunal.

The idea of asserting the guilt of another is common to these terms. Accuse in the proper sense is applied particularly to crimes, but it is also applied to every species of offence; charge may be applied to crimes, but is used more commonly for breaches of moral conduct; we accuse a person of murder; we charge him with dishonesty.

Accuse is properly a formal action; charge is an informal action; criminals are accused, and their accusation is proved in a court of judicature to be true or false; 'The Countess of Hertford, demanding an audience of the Queen, laid before her the whole series of his mother's cruelty, and exposed the improbability of an accusation, by which he was charged with an intent to commit a murder that could produce no advantage.'—JOHNSON (Life of Savage). Any person may be charged, and the charge may be either substantiated or refuted in the judgement of a third person; 'Nor was this irregularity the only charge which Lord Tyrconnel brought against him. Having given him a collection of valuable books stamped with his own arms, he had the mortification to see them in a short time exposed for sale.'—JOHNSON (Life of Savage).

Impeach and arraign are both species of accusing; the former in application to statesmen and state concerns, the latter in regard to the general conduct or principles; with this difference, that he who impeaches only asserts the guilt, but does not determine it; but those who arraign also take upon themselves to decide: statesmen are impeached for misdemeanours in the administration of government; 'Aristogiton, with revengeful cunning, impeached several courtiers and intimates of the tyrant.'—CUMBERLAND. Kings arraign governors of provinces and subordinate princes, and in this manner kings are sometimes arraigned before mock tribunals: our Saviour was arraigned before Pilate; and creatures in the madness of presumption arraign their Creator; 'O the inexpressible horror that will seize upon a poor sinner, when he stands arraigned at the bar of Divine justice.'—SOUTH.

TO ACCUSE, CENSURE.

To accuse (v. To Accuse) is only to assert the guilt of another; to censure (v. To Censure) is to take that guilt for granted. We accuse only to make known the offence, to provoke inquiry; we censure in order to inflict a punishment. An accusation may be false or true; a censure mild or severe: It is extremely wrong to accuse another without sufficient grounds; 'If the person accused maketh his innocence plainly to appear upon his trial, the accuser is immediately put to an ignominious death.'—SWIFT. But still worse to censure him without the most substantial grounds; 'A statesman, who is possessed of real merit, should look upon his political censurers with the same neglect that a good writer regards his critics.'—ADDISON.

Every one is at liberty to accuse another of offences which he knows him for a certainty to have committed; but none can censure who are not authorized by their age or station. Accusing is for the most part employed for public offences, or for private offences of much greater magnitude than those which call for censure; 'Mr. Locke accuses those of great negligence who discourse of moral things with the least obscurity in the terms they make use of.'—BUDGELL. 'If any man measure his words by his heart, and speak as he thinks, and do not express more kindness to every man than men usually have for any man, he can hardly escape the censure of the want of breeding.'—TILLOTSON.

TO CENSURE, ANIMADVERT, CRITICISE.

To censure (v. To Accuse) expresses less than to animadvert or criticise; one may always censure when one animadverts or criticises; animadvert, in Latin animadverto, i.e. animum verito ad, signifies to turn the mind towards an object, and, in this case, with the view of finding fault with it; to criticise, from the Greek κρίνω to judge, signifies to pass a judgement upon an other.

To censure and animadvert are both personal, the one direct, the other indirect; criticism is directed to things, and not to persons only.

Censuring consists in finding some fault real or supposed; it refers mostly to the conduct of individuals. Animadvert consists in suggesting some error or impropriety; it refers mostly to matters of opinion and dispute; criticism consists in minutely examining the intrinsic characteristics, and appreciating the merits of each individually, or the whole collectively; it refers to matters of science and learning.

To censure requires no more than simple assertion: its justice or propriety often rests on the authority of the individual; 'Many an author has been dejected at the censure of one whom he has looked upon as an idiot.'—ADDISON. Animadversions require to be accompanied with reasons; those who animadvert on the proceedings or opinions of others must state some grounds for their objections; 'I wish, Sir, you would do us the favour to animadvert frequently upon the false taste the town is in, with relation to the plays as well as operas.'—STEELE. Criticism is altogether argumentative and illustrative: it takes nothing for granted, it analyzes and decomposes, it compares and combines, it asserts and supports the assertions; 'It is ridiculous for any man to criticise on the works of another, who has not distinguished himself by his own performances.'—ADDISON.

The office of the censurer is the easiest and least honourable of the three; it may be assumed by ignorance and impertinence, it may be performed for the purpose of indulging an angry or imperious temper. The task of animadverting is delicate; it may be resorted to for the indulgence of an overweening self-conceit. The office of a critick is both arduous and honourable; it cannot be filled by any one incompetent or the charge without exposing his arrogance and folly to merited contempt.

TO CENSURE, CARP, CAVIL.

Censure has the same general meaning as given in the preceding articles (v. To Accuse); carp, in Latin carpo, signifies to pluck; cavil, in French caviller, in Latin cavillor, from cavillum a hollow man, and cavus hollow, signifies to be unsound or unsubstantial in speech.

To censure respects positive errors; to carp and cavil have regard to what is trivial or imaginary; the former is employed for errors in persons; the latter for supposed defects in things. Censures are frequently necessary from those who have the authority to use them; a good father will censure his children when their conduct is censurable; but censure may likewise be frequently unjust and frivolous; 'From a consciousness of his own integrity, a man assumes force enough to despise the little censures of ignorance and malice.'—BUDGELL. Carping and cavilling are resorted to only to indulge ill-nature or self-conceit; whoever owes another a grudge will be most disposed to carp at all he does in order to lessen him in the esteem of others: those who contend more for victory than truth will be apt to cavil when they are at a loss for fair argument: party politicians carp at the measures of administration; 'It is always thus with pedants; they will ever be carping, if a gentleman or man of honour puts pen to paper.'—STEELE. Infidels cavil at the evidences of Christianity, because they are determined to disbelieve; 'Envy and cavil are the natural fruits of laziness and ignorance, which was probably the reason that in the heathen mythology Momus is said to be the son of Nox and Somnus, of darkness and sleep.'—ADDISON.

ANIMADVERSION, CRITICISM, STRICTURE.

Animadversion (v. To Censure) includes censure and reproof; criticism implies scrutiny and judgement, whether for or against; and stricture, from the Latin strictura and stringo to touch lightly upon, comprehends a partial investigation mingled with censure. We animadvert on a person's opinions by contradicting or correcting them; we criticise a person's works by minutely and rationally exposing their imperfections and beauties; we pass strictures on public measures by descanting on them cursorily, and censuring them partially.

Animadversions are too personal to be impartial; consequently they are seldom just; they are mostly resorted to by those who want to build up one system on the ruins of another; but the term is sometimes employed in an indifferent sense; 'These things fall under a province you have partly pursued already, and therefore demand your animadversion for the regulating so noble an entertainment as that of the stage.'—STEELE. Criticism is one of the most important and honourable departments of literature; a critick ought justly to weigh the merits and demerits of authors, but of the two his office is rather to blame than to praise; much less injury will accrue to the cause of literature from the severity than from the laxity of criticism. Just criticism demands not only that every beauty or blemish be minutely pointed out in its different degree and kind, but also that the reason and foundation of excellencies and faults be accurately ascertained.'—WARTON. Strictures are mostly the vehicles of party spleen; like most ephemeral productions, they are too superficial to be entitled to serious notice; but this term is also used in an indifferent sense for cursory critical remarks; 'To the end of most plays I have added short strictures, containing a general censure of faults or praise of excellence.'—JOHNSON.

COMPLAINT, ACCUSATION.

Both these terms are employed in regard to the conduct of others, but the complaint, from the verb to complain, is mostly made in matters that personally affect the complainant; the accusation (v. To Accuse) is made of matters in general, but especially those of a moral nature. A complaint is made for the sake of obtaining redress; an accusation is made for the sake of ascertaining the fact or bringing to punishment. A complaint may be frivolous; an accusation false. People in subordinate stations should be careful to give no cause for complaint; 'On this occasion (of an interview with Addison), Pope made his complaint with frankness and spirit, as a man undeservedly neglected and opposed.'—JOHNSON. The most guarded conduct will not protect any person from the unjust accusations of the malevolent; 'With guilt enter distrust and discord, mutual accusation and stubborn self-defence.'—JOHNSON.

TO FIND FAULT WITH, BLAME, OBJECT TO.

All these terms denote not simply feeling, but also expressing dissatisfaction with some person or thing. To find fault with signifies here to point out a fault, either in some person or thing; to blame is said only of the person; object is applied to the thing only: we find fault with a person for his behaviour; we find fault with our seat, our conveyance, and the like; we blame a person for his temerity or his improvidence; we object to a measure that is proposed. We find fault with or blame that which has been done; we object to that which is to be done.

Finding fault is a familiar action applied to matters of personal convenience or taste; blame and object to, particularly the latter, are applied to serious objects. Finding fault is often the fruit of a discontented temper: there are some whom nothing will please, and who are ever ready to find fault with whatever comes in their way; 'Tragi-comedy you have yourself found fault with very justly.'—BUDGELL. Blame is a matter of discretion; we blame frequently in order to correct; 'It is a most certain rule in reason and moral philosophy, that where there is no choice, there can be no blame.'—SOUTH. Objecting to is an affair either of caprice or necessity; some capriciously object to that which is proposed to them merely from a spirit of opposition; others object to a thing from substantial reasons; 'Men in all deliberations find ease to be of the negative side, to object, and foret difficulties.'—BACON.

TO OBJECT, OPPOSE.

To object, from ob and jacio to cast, is to cast in the way; to oppose is to place in the way; there is, therefore, very little original difference, except that casting is a more momentary and sudden proceeding, placing is a more premeditated action; which distinction, at the same time, corresponds with the use of the terms in ordinary life: to object to a thing is to propose or start something against it; but to oppose it is to set one's self up steadily against it: one objects to ordinary matters that require no reflection; one opposes matters that call for deliberation, and afford serious reasons for and against: a parent objects to his child's learning the classics, or to his running about the streets; he opposes his marriage when he thinks the connexion or the circumstances not desirable: we object to a thing from our own particular feelings; we oppose a thing because we judge it improper; capricious or selfish people will object to every thing that comes across their own humour; 'About this time, an Archbishop of York objected to clerks (recommended to benefices by the Pope), because they were ignorant of English.'—TYRWHITT. Those who oppose think it necessary to assign, at least, a reason for their opposition;

'T was of no purpose to oppose,
She'd hear to no excuse in prose.—SWIFT.

OBJECTION, DIFFICULTY, EXCEPTION.

The objection (v. Demur) is here general; it comprehends both the difficulty and the exception, which are but species of the objection; the objection and the difficulty are started; the exception is made; the objection to a thing is in general that which renders it less desirable; but the difficulty is that which renders it less practicable; there is an objection against every scheme which incurs a serious risk; 'I would not desire what you have written to be omitted, unless I had the merit of removing your objection.'—POPE. The want of means to begin, or resources to carry on a scheme, are serious difficulties; 'In the examination of every great and comprehensive plan, such as that of Christianity 'Difficulties may occur.'—BLAIR. In application to moral or intellectual subjects, the objection interferes with one's decision; the difficulty causes perplexity in the mind; 'They mistake difficulties for impossibilities; a pernicious mistake certainly, and the more pernicious, for that men are seldom convinced till their convictions do them no good.'—SOUTH. 'There is ever between all estates a secret war. I know well this speech is the objection, and not the decision; and that it is after refuted.'—BACON.

The objection and exception both respect the nature, the moral tendency, or moral consequences of a thing; but the objection may be frivolous or serious; the exception is something serious: the objection is positive; the exception is relatively considered, that is, the thing excepted from other things, as not good, and consequently objected to. Objections are made sometimes to proposals for the mere sake of getting rid of an engagement: those who do not wish to give themselves trouble find an easy method of disengaging themselves, by making objections to every proposition; 'Whoever makes such objections against an hypothesis, hath a right to be heard, let his temper and genius be what it will.'—BURNET. Lawyers make exceptions to charges which are sometimes not sufficiently substantiated: 'When they deride our ceremonies as vain and frivolous, were it hard to apply their exceptions, even to those civil ceremonies, which at the coronation, in parliament, and all courts of justice, are used.'—CRANMER. In all engagements entered into, it is necessary to make exceptions to the parties, whenever there is any thing exceptionable in their characters: the present promissuous diffusion of knowledge among the poorer orders is very objectionable on many grounds; the course of reading, which they commonly pursue, is without question highly exceptionable.

TO CONTRADICT, OPPOSE, DENY

To contradict, from the Latin contra and dictum, signifies a speech against a speech; to oppose, in French opposer, Latin opponere, perfect of oppono from op or ob and pono, signifies to throw in the way or against a thing; to deny, in French denier, Latin denego, is compounded of de, ne, and ago or dico, signifying to say no.

To contradict, as the origin of the word sufficiently denotes, is to set up assertion against assertion, and is therefore a mode of opposition, whether used in a general or a particular application. Logicians call those propositions contradictory which, in all their terms, are most completely opposed to each other; as 'All men are liars'; 'No men are liars.' A contradiction necessarily supposes a verbal, though not necessarily a personal, opposition; a person may unintentionally contradict himself, as is frequently the case with liars; and two persons may contradict each other without knowing what either has asserted; 'The Jews hold that in case two rabbies should contradict one another, they were yet bound to believe the contradictory assertions of both.'—SOUTH.

But although contradicting must be more or less verbal, yet, in an extended application of the term, the contradiction may be implied in the action rather than in direct words, as when a person by his good conduct contradicts the slanders of his enemies; 'There are many who are fond of contradicting the common reports of fame.'—ADDISON. In this application, contradict and oppose are clearly distinguished from each other. So likewise in personal disputes contradiction implies opposition only as far as relates to the words; opposing, on the other hand, comprehends not only the spirit of the action, but also a great diversity in the mode; we may contradict from necessity, or in self-defence; we oppose from conviction, or a less honourable nature; we contradict by a direct negative; we oppose by means of argument or otherwise. It is a breach of politeness ever to contradict flatly; it is a violation of the moral law to oppose without the most substantial grounds;

That tongue
Inspir'd with contradiction darts oppose
A third part of the gods.—MILTON.

To contradict and to deny may be both considered as modes of verbal opposition, but one contradicts an assertion, and denies a fact; the contradiction implies the setting up one person's authority or opinion against that of another; the denial implies the maintaining a person's veracity in opposition to the charges or insinuations of others. Contradicting is commonly employed in speculative matters; 'If a gentleman is a little sincere in his representations, he is sure to have a dozen contradicters.'—SWIFT. Denying in matters of personal interest; 'One of the company began to rally him (an infidel) upon his devotion on shipboard, which the other denied in so high terms, that it produced the lie on both sides, and ended in a duel.'—ADDISON. Denying may, however, be employed as well as contradicting in the course of argument; but we deny the general truth of the position by contradicting the particular assertions of the individuals; 'In the Socratic way of dispute, you agree to every thing your opponent advances; in the Aristotelic, you are still denying and contradicting some part or other of what he says.'—ADDISON.

When contradict respects other persons, it is frequently a mode of opposition, as we may most effectually oppose a person by contradicting what he asserts but contradiction does not necessarily imply opposition; the former is simply a mode of action, the latter comprehends both the action and the spirit, with which it is dictated: we contradict from necessity or in self-defence; we oppose, from conviction or some personal feeling of a less honourable nature. When we hear a friend unjustly charged of an offence, it is but reasonable to contradict the charge; objectionable measures may call for opposition, but it is sometimes prudent to abstain from opposing what we cannot prevent.

Contradict is likewise used in denying what is laid to one's charge; but we may deny without contradicting, in answer to a question: contradiction respects indifferent matters; denying is always used in matters of immediate interest.

Contradiction is employed for correcting others; denying is used to clear one's self: we may contradict falsely when we have not sufficient ground for contradicting; and we may deny justly when we rebut an unfair charge.

TO DENY, DISOWN, DISCLAIM, DISAVOW.

Deny (v. To deny) approaches nearest to the sense of disown when applied to persons; disown, that is, not to own, on the other hand, bears a strong analogy to deny when applied to things.

In the first case deny is said with regard to one's knowledge of or connexion with a person; disowning on the other hand is a term of larger import, including the renunciation of all relationship or social tie: the former is said of those who are not related; the latter of such only as are related. Peter denied our Saviour, 'We may deny God in all those acts that are morally good or evil; those are the proper scenes in which we act our confessions or denials of him.'—SOUTH. A parent can scarcely be justified in disowning his child let his vices be ever so enormous; a child can never disown its parent in any case without violating the most sacred duty.

In the second case deny is said in regard to things that concern others as well as ourselves; disown only in regard to what is done by one's self or that in which one is personally concerned. A person denies that there is any truth in the assertion of another; 'The Earl of Strafford positively denied the words.'—CLARENDON. He disowns all participation in any affair;

Then they who brother's better claim disown,
Expel their parents, and usurp the throne.

DRYDEN.

We may deny having seen a thing; we may disown that we did it ourselves. Our veracity is often the only thing implicated in a denial; our guilt, innocence or honour are implicated in what we disown. A witness denies what is stated as a fact; the accused party disowns what is laid to his charge.

A denial is employed only for outward actions or events; that which can be related may be denied; disowning extends to whatever we can own or possess we may disown our feelings, our name, our connexions, and the like.

Christians deny the charges which are brought against the gospel by its enemies; 'If, like Zeno, any one shall walk about and yet deny there is any motion in nature, surely that man was constituted for Anti cyra, and were a fit companion for those who, having a conceit they are dead, cannot be convicted unto the society of the living."—BROWN. The apostles would never disown the character which they held as messengers of Christ;

Sometimes lest man should quite his pow'r disown,
He makes that power to trembling nations known.
JENYNS.

Disclaim and disown are both personal acts respecting the individual who is the agent; to disclaim is to throw off a claim, as to disown is not to admit as one's own; as claim, from the Latin clamo, signifies to declare with a loud tone what we want as our own; so to disclaim is with an equally loud or positive tone, to give up a claim; this is a more positive act than to disown, which may be performed by insinuation, or by the mere abstaining to own.

He who feels himself disgraced by the actions that are done by his nation, or his family, will be ready to disclaim the very name which he bears in common with the offending party;

The thing call'd life, with ease I can disclaim,
And think it over-sold to purchase fame.—DRYDEN.

An absurd pride sometimes impels men to disown their relationship to those who are beneath them in external rank and condition;

Here Priam's son, Delphobus, he found:
He scarcely knew him, striving to disown
His blotted form, and blushing to be known.
DRYDEN.

An honest mind will disclaim all right to praise which it feels not to belong to itself; the fear of ridicule sometimes makes a man disown that which would redound to his honour: 'Very few among those who profess themselves Christians, disclaim all concern for their souls, disown the authority, or renounce the expectations of the gospel.'—ROGERS.

To disavow is to avow that a thing is not. The disavowal is a general declaration; the denial is a particular assertion; the former is made voluntarily and unasked for, the latter is always in direct answer to a charge: we disavow in matters of general interest where truth only is concerned; we deny in matters of personal interest where the character or feelings are implicated.

What is disavowed is generally in support of truth; what is denied may often be in direct violation of truth: an honest mind will always disavow whatever has been erroneously attributed to it; 'Dr. Solander disavows some of those narrations (in Hawkesworth's voyages), or at least declares them to be grossly misrepresented.'—BEATTIE. A timid person sometimes denies what he knows to be true from a fear of the consequences; 'The king now denied his knowledge of the conspiracy against Rizzio, by public proclamations.'—ROBERTSON. Many persons have disavowed being the author of the letters which are known under the name of Junius; the real authors who have denied their concern in it (as doubtless they have) availed themselves of the subterfuge, that since it was the affair of several, no one individually could call himself the author.

TO CONTOVERT, DISPUTE.

Controvert, compounded of the Latin contra and verto, signifies to turn against another in discourse, or direct one's self against another.

Dispute, in Latin disputo, from dis and puto, signifies literally to think differently, or to call in question the opinion of another, which is the sense that brings it in closest alliance with controverting.

To controvert has regard to speculative points; to dispute respects matters of fact: there is more of opposition in controversy; more of doubt in disputing: a sophist controverts; a skeptic disputes: the plainest and sublimest truths of the Gospel have been all controverted in their turn by the self-sufficient inquirer; 'The demolishing of Dunkirk was so eagerly insisted on, and so warmly controverted, as had like to have produced a challenge.'—BUDGELL. The authenticity of the Bible itself has been disputed by some few individuals; the existence of a God by still fewer;

Now I am sent, and am not to dispute
My prince's orders, but to execute.—DRYDEN.

Controversy is worse than an unprofitable task; instead of eliciting truth, it does but expose the failings of the parties engaged, 'How cometh it to pass that we are so rent with mutual contentions, and that the church is so much troubled? If men had been willing to learn, all these controversies might have died the very day they were first brought forth.'—HOOKER. Disputing is not so personal, and consequently not so objectionable; we never controvert any point without seriously and decidedly intending to oppose the notions of another; we may sometimes dispute a point for the sake of friendly argument, or the desire of information: theologians and politicians are the greatest controversialists; it is the business of men in general to dispute whatever ought not to be taken for granted; 'The earth is now placed so conveniently that plants thrive and flourish in it, and animals live; this is matter of fact and beyond all dispute.'—BENTLEY. When dispute is taken in the sense of verbally maintaining a point in opposition to another, it ceases to have that alliance to the word controvert, and comes nearest to the sense of argue (v. Argue).

INDUBITABLE, UNQUESTIONABLE, INDISPUTABLE, UNDENIABLE, INCONTOVERTIBLE, IRREFRAGABLE.

Indubitable signifies admitting of no doubt (vide Doubt); unquestionable, admitting of no question (v. Doubt); indisputable, admitting of no dispute (v. To controvert); undeniable, not to be denied (v. To deny, disown); incontrovertible, not to be controverted (v. To controvert); irrefragable, from frango to break, signifies not to be broken, destroyed, or done away. These terms are all opposed to uncertainty; but they do not imply absolute certainty, for they all express the strong persuasion of a person's mind rather than the absolute nature of the thing: when a fact is supported by such evidence as admits of no kind of doubt, it is termed indubitable; 'A full or a thin house will indubitably express the sense of a majority.'—HAWKESWORTH. When the truth of an assertion rests on the authority of a man whose character for integrity stands unimpeached, it is termed unquestionable authority; 'From the unquestionable documents and dictates of the law of nature, I shall evince the obligation lying upon every man to show gratitude.'—SOUTH. When a thing is believed to exist on the evidence of every man's senses, it is termed undeniable; 'So undeniable is the truth of this (viz. the hardness of our duty), that the scene of virtue is laid in our natural averseness to things excellent.'—SOUTH. When a sentiment has always been held as either true or false, without dispute, it is termed indisputable; 'Truth, knowing the indisputable claim she has to all that is called reason, thinks it below her to ask that upon courtesy in which she can plead a property.'—SOUTH. When arguments have never been controverted, they are termed incontrovertible; 'Our distinction must rest upon a steady adherence to the incontrovertible rules of virtue.'—BLAIR. And when they have never been satisfactorily answered, they are termed irrefragable; 'There is none who walks so surely, and upon such irrefragable grounds of providence, as he who is religious.'—SOUTH.

TO ARGUE, DISPUTE, DEBATE.

To argue is to adduce arguments or reasons in support of one's position; to dispute, in Latin disputo compounded of dis and puto, signifies to think differently, in an extended sense, to assert a different opinion; to debate, in French debattre, compounded of the intensive syllable de and battre, to beat or fight, signifies to contend for and against.

To argue is to defend one's self; dispute to oppose another; to debate is to dispute in a formal manner. To argue on a subject is to explain the reasons or proofs in support of an assertion; to argue with a person is to defend a position against him; to dispute a thing is to advance objections against a position; to dispute with a person is to start objections against his positions, to attempt to refute them: a debate is a disputation held by many. To argue does not necessarily suppose a conviction on the part of the arguer, that what he defends is true; nor a real difference of opinion in his opponent; for some men have such a riching propensity for an argument, that they will attempt to prove what nobody denies; and in some cases the term argue may be used in the sense of adducing reasons more for the purpose of producing mutual confirmation and illustration of truth than for the detection of falsehood, or the questioning of opinions;

Of good and evil much they argued then.—MILTON.

To dispute always supposes an opposition to some person, but not a sincere opposition to the thing; for we may dispute that which we do not deny, for the sake of holding a dispute with one who is of different sentiments: to debate presupposes a multitude of clashing or opposing opinions. Men of many words argue for the sake of talking: men of ready tongues dispute for the sake of victory: men in Parliament often debate for the sake of opposing the ruling party, or from any other motive than the love of truth.

Argumentation is a dangerous propensity, and renders a man an unpleasant companion in society; no one should set such a value on his opinions as to intrude the defence of them on those who are uninterested in the question; 'Publick arguing oft serves not only to exasperate the minds, but to whet the wits of heretics.'—DRAKE or PIERCE. Disputation, as a scholastic exercise, is well fitted to exert the reasoning powers and awaken a spirit of inquiry;

Thus Rodmond, train'd by this unhallo'd crew,
The sacred social passions never knew:
Unskill'd to argue, in dispute yet loud,
Bold without caution, without honours proud.

FALCONER.

Debating in Parliament is by some converted into a trade; he who talks the loudest, and makes the most vehement opposition, expects the greatest applause;

The murmur ceas'd: then from his lofty throne
The king invok'd the gods, and thus begun:
I wish, ye Latins, what ye now debate
Had been resolv'd before it was too late.

DRYDEN.

TO CONSULT, DELIBERATE, DEBATE.

To consult, in French consulter, Latin consulto, is a frequentative of consulo, signifying to counsel together; to deliberate, in French deliberer, Latin delibero, compounded of de and libro, or libra a balance, signifies to weigh as in a balance.

Consultations always require two persons at least; deliberations require many, or only a man's self: an individual may consult with one or many; assemblies commonly deliberate: advice and information are given and received in consultations; 'Ulysses (as Homer tells us) made a voyage to the regions of the dead, to consult Tiresias how he should return to his country.'—ADDISON. Doubts, difficulties, and objections, are started and removed in deliberations; 'Moloch declares himself abruptly for war, and appears incensed with his companions for losing so much time as even to deliberate upon it.'—ADDISON. We communicate and hear when we consult; we pause and hesitate when we deliberate: those who have to co-operate must frequently consult together; those who have serious measures to decide upon must coolly deliberate.

To debate (v. To argue) and to consult equally mark the acts of pausing or withholding the decision, whether applicable to one or many. To debate supposes always a contrariety of opinion; to deliberate supposes simply the weighing or estimating the value of the opinion that is offered. Where many persons have the liberty of offering their opinions, it is natural to expect that there will be debating;

To seek sage Nestor now the chief resolves;
With him in wholesome counsels to debate
What yet remains to save the sinking state.

POPE.

When any subject offers that is complicated and questionable, it calls for mature deliberation;

When man's life is in debate,
The judge can ne'er too long deliberate.

DRYDEN.

It is lamentable when passion gets such an ascendancy in the mind of any one, as to make him debate which course of conduct he shall pursue; the want of deliberation, whether in private or publick transactions, is a more fruitful source of mischief than almost any other.

TO OPPOSE, RESIST, WITHSTAND, THWART.

Oppose (v. To object, oppose;) is the general term, signifying simply to put in the way; resist, signifies literally to stand back, away from, or against; withstand has the force of re in resist; thwart, from the German quer cross, signifies to come across.

The action of setting one thing up against another is obviously expressed by all these terms, but they differ in the manner and the circumstances. To oppose simply denotes the relative position of two objects, and when applied to persons it does not necessarily imply any personal characteristic: we may oppose reason or force to force; or things may be opposed to each other which are in an opposite direction, as a house to a church. Resist is always an act of more or less force when applied to persons; it is mostly a culpable action, as when men resist lawful authority; resistance is in fact always bad, unless in case of actual self-defence. Opposition may be made in any form, as when we oppose a person's admittance into a house by our personal efforts; or we oppose his admission into a society by a declaration of our opinions. Resistance is always a direct action, as when we resist an invading army by the sword, or we resist the evidence of our senses by denying our assent; or, in relation to things, when wood or any hard substance resists the violent efforts of steel or iron to make an impression.

Withstand and thwart are modes of resistance applicable only to conscious agents. To withstand is negative; it implies not to yield to any foreign agency: thus, a person withstands the entreaties of another to comply with a request. To thwart is positive; it is actively to cross the will of another: thus, humour some people are perpetually thwarting the wishes of those with whom they are in connexion. Habitual opposition, whether in act or in spirit, is equally senseless; none but conceited or turbulent people are guilty of it;

So hot th' assault, so high the tumult rose,

While ours defend, and while the Greeks oppose.

DRYDEN

Oppositionists to government are dangerous members of society, and are ever preaching up resistance to constituted authorities;

To do all our sole delight

As being the contrary to his high will

Whom we resist.—MILTON.

'Particular instances of second sight have been given with such evidence, as neither Bacon nor Boyle have been able to resist.'—JOHNSON. It is a happy thing when a young man can withstand the allurements of pleasure;

For twice five days the good old seer withstood

Th' intended treason, and was dumb to blood.

DRYDEN.

It is a part of a Christian's duty to bear with patience the untoward events of life that thwart his purposes; 'The understanding and will never disagreed (before the fall); for the proposals of the one never thwarted the inclinations of the other.'—SOUTH.

TO CONFUTE, REFUTE, DISPROVE, OPPUGN.

Confute and refute, in Latin confuto and refuto, are compounded of con against, re privative, and futo, obsolete for arguo, signifying to argue against or to argue the contrary; disprove, compounded of dis privative and prove, signifies to prove the contrary; oppugn, in Latin oppugno, signifies to fight in order to remove or overthrow.

To confute respects what is argumentative; refute what is personal; disprove whatever is represented or related; oppugn whatever is held or maintained.

An argument is confuted by proving its fallacy; a charge is refuted by proving one's innocence: as assertion is disproved by proving that it is false; a doctrine is opposed by a course of reasoning.

Paradoxes may be easily confuted; calumnies may be easily refuted; the marvellous and incredible stories of travellers may be easily disproved; heresies and skeptical notions ought to be opposed.

The pernicious doctrines of skepticks, though often confuted, are as often advanced with the same degree of assurance by the free-thinking, and I might say the unthinking few who imbibe their spirit;

The learned do, by turns, the learn'd confute,
Yet all depart unaltered by dispute.—ORRERY

It is the employment of libellists to deal out their malicious aspersions against the objects of their malignity in a manner so loose and indirect as to preclude the possibility of refutation; 'Philip of Macedon refuted by the force of gold all the wisdom of Athens.'—ADDISON. It would be a fruitless and unthankful task to attempt to disprove all the statements which are circulated in a common newspaper, Man's feeble race what ills await!

Labour and penury, the racks of pain,
Disease, and sorrow's weeping train,
And death, sad refuge from the storm of fate,
The fond complaint, my song! disprove,
And justify the laws of Jove.—COLLINS.

It is the duty of ministers of the Gospel to oppose all doctrines that militate against the established faith of Christians; 'Ramus was one of the first opponents of the old philosophy, who disturbed with innovations the quiet of the schools.'—JOHNSON

TO IMPUGN, ATTACK

To impugn, from the Latin in and pugno, signifying to fight against, is synonymous with attack only in regard to doctrines or opinions; in which case, to impugn signifies to call in question, or bring arguments against; to attack is to oppose with warmth. Skepticks impugn every opinion, however self-evident or well-grounded they may be: infidels make the most indecent attacks upon the Bible, and all that is held sacred by the rest of the world.

He who impugns may sometimes proceed insidiously and circuitously to undermine the faith of others: he who attacks always proceeds with more or less violence. To impugn is not necessarily taken in a bad sense; we may sometimes impugn absurd doctrines by a fair train of reasoning: to attack is always objectionable, either in the mode of the action, or its object, or in both; it is a mode of proceeding oftener employed in the cause of falsehood than truth: when there are no arguments wherewith to impugn a doctrine, it is easy to attack it with ridicule and scurrility.

TO ATTACK, ASSAIL, ASSAULT, ENCOUNTER.

Attack, in French attaquer, changed from attacher, in Latin attactum, participle of attingo, signifies to bring into close contact; assail, assault, in French assailir, Latin assibio, assaltum, compounded of as or ad and salio, signifies to leap upon; encounter, in French rencontre, compounded of en or in and contre, in Latin contra against, signifies to run or come against.

Attack is the generic, the rest are specific terms. To attack is to make an approach in order to do some violence to the person; to assail or assault is to make a sudden and vehement attack; to encounter is to meet the attack of another. One attacks by simply offering violence without necessarily producing an effect; one assails by means of missile weapons; one assaults by direct personal violence; one encounters by opposing violence to violence.

Men and animals attack or encounter; men only, in the literal sense, assail or assault. Animals attack each other with the weapons nature has bestowed upon them; 'King Athelstan attacked another body of the Danes at sea near Sandwich, sunk nine of their ships, and put the rest to flight.'—HUME. Those who provoke a multitude may expect to have their houses or windows assailed with stones, and their persons assaulted;

So when he saw his flatt'ring arts to fail
With greedy force he 'gan the fort t' assail.

SPENSER

And double death did wretched man invade,
By steel assaulted, and by gold betray'd.—DRYDEN

It is ridiculous to attempt to encounter those who are superiour in strength and prowess; 'Putting themselves in order of battle, they encountered their enemies.'—KNOWLES.

They are all used figuratively. Men attack with reproaches or censures; they assail with abuse; they are assaulted by temptations; they encounter opposition and difficulties. A fever attacks; horrid shrieks assail the ear; dangers are encountered. The reputations of men in public life are often wantonly attacked; 'The women might possibly have carried this Gothick building higher, had not a famous monk, Thomas Conecte by name, attacked it with great zeal and resolution.'—ADDISON. Public men are assailed in every direction by the murmurs and complaints of the discontented;

Not truly penitent, but chief to try
Her husband, how far urg'd his patience bears,
His virtue or weakness which way to assail.
MILTON.

They often encounter the obstacles which party spirit throws in the way, without reaping any solid advantage to themselves; 'It is sufficient that you are able to encounter the temptations which now assault you when God sends trials he may send strength.'—TAYLOR.

ATTACK, ASSAULT, ENCOUNTER, ONSET, CHARGE.

An attack and assault (v. To attack) may be made upon an unresisting object: encounter, onset, and charge, require at least two opposing parties. An attack may be slight or indirect; an assault must always be direct and mostly vigorous. An attack upon a town need not be attended with any injury to the walls or inhabitants; but an assault is commonly conducted so as to effect its capture. Attacks are made by robbers upon the person or property of another; assaults upon the person only; 'There is one species of diversion which has not been generally condemned, though it is produced by an attack upon those who have not voluntarily entered the lists; who find themselves buffeted in the dark, and have neither means of defence nor possibility of advantage.'—HAWKES WORTH. 'We do not find the meekness of a lamb in a creature so armed for battle and assault as the lion.'—ADDISON.

An encounter generally respects an informal casual meeting between single individuals; onset and charge a regular attack between contending armies; onset is employed for the commencement of the battle; charge for an attack from a particular quarter. When knight-errantry was in vogue, encounters were perpetually taking place between the knights and their antagonists, who often existed only in the imagination of the combatants: encounters were, however, sometimes fierce and bloody, when neither party would yield to the other while he had the power of resistance;

And such a frown
Each cast at th' other, as when two black clouds,
With heav'n's artillery fraught, come rattling on Hovering a space, till winds the signal blow,
To join their dark encounter in mid air.—MILTON.

The French are said to make impetuous onsets, but not to withstand a continued attack with the same perseverance and steadiness as the English;

Onsets in love seem best like those in war,
Fierce, resolute, and done with all the force.—TATE
A furious and well-directed charge from the cavalry will sometimes decide the fortune of the day;

O my Antonio! I'm all on fire;
My soul is up in arms, ready to charge,
And bear amid the foe with conqu'ring troops.
CONGREVE

AGGRESSOR, ASSAILANT.

Aggressor, from the Latin aggressus, participle of aggredior, compounded of ag or ad, and gredior to step, signifies one stepping up to, falling upon, or attacking; assailant, from assail, in French assailer, compounded of as or ad, and salio to leap upon, signifies one leaping up, or attacking any one vehemently.

The characteristic idea of aggressor is that of one going up to another in a hostile manner, and by a natural extension of the sense commencing an attack: the characteristic idea of assailant is that of one committing an act of violence on the person.

An aggressor offers to do some injury either by word or deed; an assailant actually commits some violence: the former commences a dispute, the latter carries it on with a vehement and direct attack. An aggressor is blameable for giving rise to quarrels; Where one is the aggressor, and in pursuance of his first attack kills the other, the law supposes the action, however sudden, to be malicious.—JOHNSON (Life of Savage). An assailant is culpable for the mischief he does;

What ear so fortified and barr'd
Against the tuneful force of vocal charms,
But would with transport to such sweet assailants
Surrender its attention?—MASON.

Were there no aggressors there would be no disputes; were there no assailants those disputes would not be serious.

An aggressor may be an assailant, or an assailant may be an aggressor, but they are as frequently distinct.

TO DISPLEASE, OFFEND, VEX.

Displease naturally marks the contrary of pleasing; offend, from the Latin offendo, signifies to stumble in the way of; vex, in Latin vexo, is a frequentative of vcho, signifying literally to toss up and down.

These words express the act of causing a painful sentiment in the mind by some impropriety, real or supposed, on our own part. Displease is not always applied to that which personally concerns ourselves; although offend and vex have always more or less of what is personal in them: a superior may be displeased with one who is under his charge for improper behaviour toward persons in general;

Meantime imperial Neptune heard the sound
Of raging billows breaking on the ground;
Displeas'd and fearing for his wat'ry reign,
He rear'd his awful head above the main.

DRYDEN.

He will be offended with him for disrespectful behaviour toward himself, or neglect of his interests; 'The emperor himself came running to the place in his armour, severely reproving them of cowardice who had forsaken the place, and grievously offended with them who had kept such negligent watch.'—KNOLLES. What displeases has less regard to what is personal than what offends; a supposed intention in the most harmless act may cause offence, and on the contrary the most offending action may not give offence where the intention of the agent is supposed to be good; 'Nathan's fable of the poor man and his lamb had so good an effect as to convey instruction to the ear of a king without offending it.'—ADDISON.

Displease respects mostly the inward state of feeling; offend and vex have most regard to the outward cause which provokes the feeling: a humorous person may be displeased without any apparent cause; but a capacious person will at least have some avowed trifle for which he is offended. Vex expresses more than offend; it marks in fact frequent efforts to offend, or the act of offending under aggravated circumstances: we often unintentionally displease or offend; but he who vexes has mostly that object in view in so doing: any instance of neglect displeases; any marked instance of neglect offends; any aggravated instance of neglect vexes: the feeling of displeasure is more perceptible and vivid than that of offence; but it is less durable: the feeling of vexation is as transitory as that of displeasure, but stronger than either. Displeasure and vexation betray themselves by an angry word or look; offence discovers itself in the whole conduct: our displeasure is unjustifiable when it exceeds the measure of another's fault; it is a mark of great weakness to take offence at trifles; persons of the greatest irritability are exposed to the most frequent vexations; 'Do poor Tom some charity, whom the foul fiend vexes.'—SHAKESPEARE. These terms may all be applied to the action of unconscious agents on the mind; 'Foul sights do rather displease, in that they excite the memory of foul things, than in the immediate objects. Therefore, in pictures, those foul sights do not much offend.'—BACON. 'Gross sins are plainly seen, and easily avoided by persons that profess religion. But the indiscreet and dangerous use of innocent and lawful things, as it does not shock and offend our consciences, so it is difficult to make people at all sensible of the danger of it.'—LAW.

These and a thousand mix'd emotions more,
From ever-changing views of good and ill,
Form'd infinitely various, vex the mind
With endless storm.—THOMSON.

As epithets they admit of a similar distinction: it is very displeasing to parents not to meet with the most respectful attentions from children, when they give them counsel; and such conduct on the part of children is highly offensive to God: when we meet with an offensive object, we do most wisely to turn away from it: when we are troubled with vexatious affairs, our best and only remedy is patience.

DISLIKE, DISPLEASE, DISSATISFACTION, DISTASTE, DISGUST.

Dislike signifies the opposite to liking, or being alike to one's self or one's taste; displeasure, the opposite to pleasure; dissatisfaction, the opposite to satisfaction; distaste and disgust, from the Latin gustus a taste, both signify the opposite to an agreeable taste.

Dislike and dissatisfaction denote the feeling or sentiment produced either by persons or things; displeasure, that produced by persons mostly; distaste and disgust, that produced by things only.

In regard to persons, dislike is the sentiment of equals and persons unconnected; displeasure and dissatisfaction, of superiors, or such as stand in some sort of relation to us. Strangers may feel a dislike upon seeing each other: parents or masters may feel displeasure or dissatisfaction; the former sentiment is occasioned by their supposed faults in character; the latter by their supposed defective services. One dislikes a person for his assumption, loquacity, or any thing not agreeable in his manners; 'The jealous man is not indeed angry if you dislike another; but if you find those faults which are found in his own character, you discover not only your dislike of another but of himself.'—ADDISON. One is displeased with a person for his carelessness, or any thing wrong in his conduct; 'The threatenings of conscience suggest to the sinner some deep and dark malignity contained in guilt, which has drawn upon his head such high displeasure from heaven.'—BLAIR. One is dissatisfied with a person on account of the small quantity of work which he has done, or his manner of doing it. Displeasure is awakened by whatever is done amiss: dissatisfaction is caused by what happens amiss or contrary to our expectation. Accordingly the word dissatisfaction is not confined to persons of a particular rank, but to the nature of the connexion which subsists between them. Whoever does not receive what they think themselves entitled to from another are dissatisfied. A servant may be dissatisfied with the treatment he meets with from his master; and may be said therefore to express dissatisfaction, though not displeasure; 'I do not like to see any thing destroyed: any void in society. It was therefore with no disappointment or dissatisfaction that my observation did not present to me any incorrigible vice in the noblesse of France.'—BURKE.

In regard to things, dislike is a casual feeling not arising from any specific cause. A dissatisfaction is connected with our desires and expectations; we dislike the performance of an actor from one or many causes, or from no apparent cause; but we are dissatisfied with his performance if it fall short of what we were led to expect. In order to lessen the number of our dislikes we ought to endeavour not to dislike without a cause; and in order to lessen our dissatisfaction we ought to be moderate in our expectation.

Dislike, distaste, and disgust rise on each other in their signification. The distaste is more than the dislike; and the disgust more than the distaste. The dislike is a partial feeling, quickly produced and quickly subsiding; the distaste is a settled feeling, gradually produced, and permanent in its duration; disgust is either transitory or otherwise; momentarily or gradually produced, but stronger than either of the two others.

Caprice has a great share in our likes and dislikes; 'Dryden's dislike of the priesthood is imputed by Langbaine, and I think by Brown, to a repulse which he suffered when he solicited ordination.'—JOHNSON. Distaste depends upon the changes to which the constitution physically and mentally is exposed; 'Because true history, through frequent satiety and similitude of things, works a distaste and misprision in the minds of men, poesy cheereth and refresheth the soul, chanting things rare and various.'—BACON. Disgust owes its origin to the nature of things and their natural operation on the minds of men; 'Vice, for vice is necessary to be shown, should always excite disgust.'—JOHNSON. A child likes and dislikes his playthings without any apparent cause for the change of sentiment: after a long illness a person will frequently take a distaste to the food or the amusements which before afforded him much pleasure: what is indecent or filthy is a natural object of disgust to every person whose mind is not depraved. It is good to suppress unfounded dislikes; it is difficult to overcome a strong distaste; it is advisable to divert our attention from objects calculated to create disgust.

DISLIKE, DISINCLINATION.

Dislike is opposed to liking; disinclination is the reverse of inclination.

Dislike applies to what one has or does: disinclination only to what one does: we dislike the thing we have, or dislike to do a thing; but we are disinclined only to do a thing.

They express a similar feeling, but differing in degree. Disinclination is but a small degree of dislike; dislike marks something contrary; disinclination does not amount to more than the absence of an inclination. None but a disobliging temper has a dislike to comply with reasonable requests;

Murmurs rise with mix'd applause,
Just as they favour or dislike the cause.—DRYDEN.

The most obliging disposition may have an occasional disinclination to comply with a particular request; 'To be grave to a man's mirth, or inattentive to his discourse, argues a disinclination to be entertained by him.'—STEELE.

DISPLEASURE, ANGER, DISAPPROBATION.

Displeasure signifies the feeling of not being pleased with either persons or things; anger comes from the Latin angor vexation, and ango to vex, which is compounded of an or ad against, and ago to act; disapprobation is the reverse of approbation.

Between displeasure and anger there is a difference both in the degree, the cause, and the consequence of the feeling: displeasure is always a softened and gentle feeling; anger is always a harsh feeling, and sometimes rises to vehemence and madness. Displeasure is always produced by some adequate cause, real or supposed; anger may be provoked by every or any cause, according to the temper of the individual; 'Man is the merriest species of the creation; all above or below him are serious; he sees things in a different light from other beings, and finds his mirth arising from objects that perhaps cause something like pity or displeasure in a higher nature.'—ADDISON. Displeasure is mostly satisfied with a simple verbal expression; but anger, unless kept down with great force, always seeks to return evil for evil; 'From anger in its full import, protracted into malevolence and exerted in revenge, arise many of the evils to which the life of man is exposed.'—JOHNSON. Displeasure and disapprobation are to be compared in as much as they respect the conduct of those who are under the direction of others: displeasure is an act of the will, it is an angry sentiment; 'True repentance may be wrought in the hearts of such as fear God, and yet incur his displeasure, the deserved effect whereof is eternal death.'—HOOKER. Disapprobation is an act of the judgement, it is an opposite opinion; 'The Queen Regent's brothers knew her secret disapprobation of the violent measures they were driving on.'—ROBERTSON. Any mark of self-will in a child is calculated to excite displeasure; a mistaken choice in matrimony may produce disapprobation in the parent.

Displeasure is always produced by that which is already come to pass; disapprobation may be felt upon that which is to take place: a master feels displeasure at the carelessness of his servant; a parent expresses his disapprobation of his son's proposal to leave his situation: it is sometimes prudent to check our displeasure; and mostly prudent to express our disapprobation: the former cannot be expressed without inflicting pain; the latter cannot be withheld when required without the danger of misleading.

ANGER, RESENTMENT, WRATH, IRE, INDIGNATION.

Anger has the same original meaning as in the preceding article; resentment, in French resentiment, from ressentir, is compounded of re and sensir, signifying to feel again, over and over, or for a continuance; wrath and ire are derived from the same source, namely, wrath, in Saxon wrath, and ire, in Latin ira anger, Greek ēpis contention, all which spring from the Hebrew חמה heat or anger; indignation, in French indignation, in Latin indignatio, from indignor, to think or feel unworthy, marks the strong feeling which base conduct awakens in the mind.

An impatient agitation against any one who acts contrary to our inclinations or opinions is the characteristic of all these terms. Resentment is less vivid than anger, and anger than wrath, ire, or indignation. Anger is a sudden sentiment of displeasure; resentment is a continued anger; wrath is a heightened sentiment of anger, which is poetically expressed by the word ire.

Anger may be either a selfish or a disinterested passion; it may be provoked by injuries done to ourselves, or injustice done to others: in this latter sense of strong displeasure God is angry with sinners, and good men may, to a certain degree, be angry with those under their control, who act improperly; 'Moralists have defined anger to be a desire of revenge for some injury offered.'—STEELE. Resentment is a brooding sentiment, altogether arising from a sense of personal injury; it is associated with a dislike of the offender as much as the offence, and is diminished only by the infliction of pain in return; in its rise, progress, and effects, it is alike opposed to the Christian spirit; 'The temperately revengeful have leisure to weigh the merits of the cause, and thereby either to smother their secret resentments, or to seek adequate reparations for the damages they have sustained.'—STEELE. Wrath and ire are the sentiment of a superior towards an inferior, and when provoked by personal injuries discovers itself by haughtiness and a vindictive temper;

Achilles' wrath, to Greece the direful spring
Of woes unnumber'd, heavenly goddess sing.

POPE.

As a sentiment of displeasure, wrath is unjustifiable between man and man; but the wrath of God may be provoked by the persevering impentence of sinners: the ire of a heathen god, according to the gross views of Pagans, was but the wrath of man associated with greater power; it was altogether unconnected with moral displeasure; the same term is however applied also to the heroes and princes of antiquity;

The prophet spoke: when with a gloomy frown
The monarch started from his shining throne;
Black choler fill'd his breast that boil'd with ire,
And from his eye-balls flash'd the living fire.—POPE.

Indignation is a sentiment awakened by the unworthy and atrocious conduct of others; as it is exempt from personality, it is not irreconcilable with the temper of a Christian; 'It is surely not to be observed without indignation, that men may be found of minds mean enough to be satisfied with this treatment; wretches who are proud to obtain the privileges of madmen.'—JOHNSON. A warmth of constitution sometimes gives rise to sallies of anger; but depravity of heart breeds resentment: unbending pride is a great source of wrath; but indignation flows from a high sense of honour and virtue.

ANGER, CHOLER, RAGE, FURY.

Anger signifies the same as in the preceding article; choler, in French colère, Latin cholera, Greek χολέρα, comes from χολή bile, because the overflowing of the bile is both the cause and consequence of choler; rage, in French rage, Latin rabies madness, and rabio to rave like a madman, comes from the Hebrew רָבַח to tremble or shake with a violent madness; fury, in French furie, Latin furor, comes probably from fero to carry away, because one is carried or hurried by the emotions of fury.

These words have a progressive force in their signification. Choler expresses something more sudden and virulent than anger; rage is a vehement ebullition of anger; and fury is an excess of rage. Anger may be so stifled as not to discover itself by any outward symptoms; choler is discoverable by the paleness of the visage; rage breaks forth into extravagant expressions and violent distortions; fury takes away the use of the understanding.

Anger is an infirmity incident to human nature; it ought, however, to be suppressed on all occasions; 'The maxim which Perander of Corinth, one of the seven sages of Greece, left as a memorial of his knowledge and benevolence, was χόλου κράτει, be master of thy anger.'—JOHNSON. Choler is a malady too physical to be always corrected by reflection;

Must I give way to your rash choler?
Shall I be frighted when a madman stares?

SHAKESPEARE.

Rage and fury are distempers of the soul, which nothing but religion and the grace of God can cure;

Oppose not rage, while rage is in its force,
But give it way awhile and let it waste.

SHAKESPEARE.

Of this kind is the fury to which many men give way among their servants and dependants.'—JOHNSON.

RESENTFUL, REVENGEFUL, VINDICTIVE.

Resentful signifies filled with resentment; revengeful, that is, filled with the spirit or desire of revenge; vindictive, from vindico to avenge or revenge, signifies either given to revenge, or after the manner of revenge.

Resentful marks solely the state or temper of the mind, revengeful also extends to the action; a person is resentful who retains resentment in his mind without discovering it in any thing but his behaviour; he is revengeful if he displays his feeling in any act of revenge or injury toward the offender. Resentful people are affected with trifles; 'Pope was as resentful of an imputation of the roundness of his back, as Marshal Luxembourg is reported to have been on the sarcasm of King William.'—TYERS. A revengeful temper is oftentimes not satisfied with a small portion of revenge;

If thy revengeful heart cannot forgive,
Lo! here I lend thee this sharp-pointed sword,
Which hide in this true breast.—SHAKESPEARE.

Revengeful is mostly said of the temper or the person; but vindictive or vindicative, as it is sometimes written, is said either of the person who is prone to revenge or of the thing which serves the purpose of revenge or punishment; 'Publick revenges are for the most part fortunate; but in private revenges it is not so. Vindicative persons live the life of witches, who, as they are mischievous, so end they unfortunate.'—BACON. 'Suits are not reparative, but vindictive, when they are commenced against insolvent persons.'—KETTLEWELL.

TO AVENGE, REVENGE, VINDICATE.

Avenge, revenge, and vindicate, all spring from the same source, namely, the Latin vindico, the Greek ἐνδικάζομαι, compounded of ἐν in and δική justice, signifying to pronounce justice or put justice in force.

The idea common to these terms is that of taking up some one's cause.

To avenge is to punish in behalf of another; to revenge is to punish for one's self; to vindicate is to defend another

The wrongs of a person are avenged or revenged, his rights are vindicated.

The act of avenging, though attended with the infliction of pain, is oftentimes an act of humanity, and always an act of justice; none are the sufferers but such as merit it for their oppression, while those are benefited who are dependent for support: this is the act of God himself, who always avenges the oppressed who look up to him for support; and it ought to be the act of all his creatures, who are invested with the power of punishing offenders and protecting the helpless;

The day shall come, that great avenging day,
When Troy's proud glories in the dust shall lay.

POPE.

Revenge is the basest of all actions, and the spirit of revenge the most diametrically opposed to the Christian principles of forgiving injuries, and returning good for evil; it is gratified only with inflicting pain without any prospect of advantage; 'By a continued series of loose, though apparently trivial gratifications, the heart is often thoroughly corrupted, as by the commission of any one of those enormous crimes which spring from great ambition, or great revenge.'—BLAIR. Vindication is an act of generosity and humanity; it is the production of good without the infliction of pain: the claims of the widow and orphan call for vindication from those who have the time, talent, or ability, to take their cause into their own hands: England can boast of many noble vindicators of the rights of humanity, not excepting those which concern the brute creation; 'Injured or oppressed by the world, the good man looks up to a Judge who will vindicate his cause.'—BLAIR.

ANGRY, PASSIONATE, HASTY, IRASCIBLE.

Angry, signifies either having anger, or prone to anger; passionate, prone to the passion of anger; hasty, prone to excess of haste from intemperate feeling; irascible, able or ready to be made angry, from the Latin ira anger.

Angry denotes a particular state or emotion of the mind; passionate and hasty express habits of the mind. An angry man is in a state of anger; a passionate or hasty man is habitually prone to be passionate or hasty. The angry has less that is vehement and impetuous in it than the passionate; the hasty has something less vehement, but more sudden and abrupt in it than either.

The angry man is not always easily provoked, nor ready to retaliate; but he often retains his anger until the cause is removed; 'It is told by Prior, in a panegyric on the Duke of Dorset, that his servants used to put themselves in his way when he was angry, because he was sure to recompense them for any indignities which he made them suffer.'—JOHNSON. The passionate man is quickly roused, eager to repay the offence, and speedily appeased by the infliction of pain of which he afterward probably repents; 'There is in the world a certain class of mortals known, and contentedly known by the name of passionate men, who imagine themselves entitled, by that distinction, to be provoked on every slight occasion.'—JOHNSON. The hasty man is very soon offended, but not ready to offend in return; his angry sentiment spends itself in angry words;

The king, who saw their squadrons yet unmov'd,
With hasty ardour thus the chiefs reprov'd.—POPE.

These three terms are all employed to denote a temporary or partial feeling; irascible, on the other hand, is solely employed to denote the temper, and is applied to brutes as well as men; 'We are here in the country surrounded with blessings and pleasures, without any occasion of exercising our irascible faculties.'—DIGNY TO POPE.

DISPASSIONATE, COOL.

Dispassionate is taken negatively, it marks merely the absence of passion; cool (v. Cool) is taken positively, it marks an entire freedom from passion.

Those who are prone to be passionate must learn to be dispassionate; those who are of a cool temperament will not suffer their passions to be roused. De passionate solely respects angry or irritable sentiments; cool respects any perturbed feeling: when we meet with an angry disputant it is necessary to be dispassionate in order to avoid quarrels; 'As to violence the lady (Madame D'Acier) has infinitely the better of the gentleman (M. de la Motte). Nothing can be more polite, dispassionate, or sensible, than his manner of managing the dispute.'—Pope. In the moment of danger our safety often depends upon our coolness; 'I conceived this poem, and gave loose to a degree of resentment, which perhaps I ought not to have indulged, but which in a cooler hour I cannot altogether condemn.'—Cowper.

TO DISAPPROVE, DISLIKE.

To disapprove is not to approve, or to think not good; to dislike is not to like, or to find unlike or unsuitable to one's wishes.

Disapprove is an act of the judgement; dislike is an act of the will. To approve or disapprove is peculiarly the part of a superior, or one who determines the conduct of others; to dislike is altogether a personal act, in which the feelings of the individual are consulted. It is a misuse of the judgement to disapprove where we need only dislike; 'The poem (Samson Agonistes) has a beginning and an end, which Aristotle himself could not have disapproved, but it must be allowed to want a middle.'—Johnson. It is a perversion of the judgement to disapprove, because we dislike; 'The man of peace will bear with many whose opinions or practices he dislikes, without an open and violent rupture.'—Blair.

DISGUST, LOATHING, NAUSEA.

Disgust has the same signification as given under the head of Dislike, Displeasure, &c.; loathing signifies the propensity to loathe an object; nausea, in Latin nausea, from the Greek naûs a ship, properly denotes sea sickness.

Disgust is less than loathing, and that than nausea. When applied to sensible objects we are disgusted with dirt; we loathe the smell of food if we have a sickly appetite; we nauseate medicine: and when applied metaphorically, we are disgusted with affectation; 'An enumeration of examples to prove a position which nobody denied, as it was from the beginning superfluous, must quickly grow disgusting.'—Johnson. We loathe the endearments of those who are offensive;

Thus winter falls,
A heavy gloom oppressive o'er the world,
Through nature's shedding influence malign,
The soul of man dies in him, loathing life.

THOMSON.

We nauseate all the enjoyments of life, after having made an intemperate use of them, and discovered their inanity;

Th' irresoluble oil,
So gentle late and blanching, in floods
Of rancid bile o'erflows: what tumults hence,
What horrors rise, were nauseous to relate.

ARMSTRONG.

OFFENCE, TRESPASS, TRANSGRESSION, MISDEMEANOUR, MISDEED, AFFRONT.

Offence is here the general term, signifying merely the act that offends, or runs counter to something else.

Offence is properly indefinite; it merely implies an object without the least signification of the nature of the object; trespass and transgression have a positive reference to an object trespassed upon or transgressed; trespass is contracted from trans and pass that is a passing beyond; and transgress from trans and gressus a going beyond. The offence therefore which constitutes a trespass arises out of the laws of property; a passing over or treading upon the property of another is a trespass: the offence which constitutes a transgression flows out of the laws of society in general which fix the boundaries of right and wrong; whoever therefore goes beyond or breaks through these bounds is guilty of a transgression. The trespass is a species of offence which peculiarly applies to the land or premises of individuals; transgression is a species of moral as well as political evil. Hunters are apt to commit trespasses in the eagerness of their pursuit; the passions of men are perpetually misleading them, and causing them to commit various transgressions; the term trespass is sometimes employed improperly as respects time and other objects; transgression is always used in one uniform sense as respects rule and law; we trespass upon the time or patience of another;

Forgive the barbarous trespass of my tongue.

OTWAY.

We transgress the moral or civil law;

To whom with stern regard thus Gabriel spake:

Why hast thou, Satan, broke the bounds prescrib'd
To thy transgressions?—MILTON.

The offence is either public or private; the misdeemeanour is properly a private offence, although improperly applied for an offence against public law; the misdeemeanour signifies the wrong deemeanour or an offence in one's deemeanour against propriety; 'Smaller faults in violation of a public law are comprised under the name of misdeemeanour.'—BLACKSTONE. The misdeed is always private, it signifies a wrong deed, or a deed which offends against one's duty. Riotous and disorderly behaviour in company are serious misdeemeanours; every act of drunkenness, lying, fraud, or immorality of every kind, are misdeeds;

Fierce famine is your lot, for this misdeed,

Reduc'd to grind the plates on which you feed.

DRYDEN

The offence is that which affects persons or principles, communities or individuals, and is committed either directly or indirectly against the person; 'Slight provocations and frivolous offences are the most frequent causes of disquiet.'—Blair. An affront is altogether personal and directly brought to bear against the front of the particular person; 'God may some time or other think it the concern of his justice and providence too to revenge the affronts put upon the laws of man.'—South. It is an offence against another to speak disrespectfully of him in his absence; it is an affront to push past him with violence and rudeness.

Offences are against either God or man; the trespass is always an offence against man; the transgression is against the will of God or the laws of men; the misdeemeanour is more particularly against the established order of society; the misdeed is an offence against the Divine Law; the affront is an offence against good manners.

OFFENDER, DELINQUENT.

The offender is he who offends in any thing, either by commission or omission; 'When any offender is presented into any of the ecclesiastical courts he is cited to appear there.'—BEVERIDGE. The delinquent, from delinquo to fail, signifies properly he who fails by omission, but the term delinquency is extended to a failure by the violation of a law; 'The killing of a deer or boar, or even a hare, was punished with the loss of the delinquent's eyes.'—HUME. Those who go into a wrong place are offenders; those who stay away when they ought to go are delinquents: there are many offenders against the Sabbath who commit violent and open breaches of decorum; there are still more delinquents who never attend a public place of worship.

OFFENDING, OFFENSIVE.

Offending signifies either actually offending or calculated to offend; offensive signifies calculated to offend at all times; a person may be offending in his manners to a particular individual, or use an offending expression on a particular occasion without any imputation on his character;

And tho' th' offending part felt mortal pain,
Th' immortal part its knowledge did retain.

DENHAM.

If a person's manners are offensive, it reflects both on his temper and education; 'Gentleness corrects whatever is offensive in our manners.'—BLAIR.

UNOFFENDING, INOFFENSIVE, HARMLESS.

Unoffending denotes the act of not offending; inoffensive the property of not being disposed or apt to offend; harmless, the property of being void of harm.

Unoffending expresses therefore only a partial state; inoffensive and harmless mark the disposition and character. A child is unoffending as long as he does nothing to offend others; but he may be offensive if he discover an unamiable temper, or has unpleasant manners; 'The unoffending royal little ones (of France) were not only condemned to languish in solitude and darkness, but their bodies left to perish with disease.'—SEWARD. A creature is inoffensive that has nothing in itself that can offend;

For drink, the grape

She crushes, inoffensive must.—MILTON.

That is harmless which has neither the will nor the power to harm; 'When the disciple is questioned about the studies of his master, he makes report of some minute and frivolous researches which are introduced only for the purpose of raising a harmless laugh.'

CUMBERLAND. Domestic animals are frequently very inoffensive; it is a great recommendation of a quack medicine to say that it is harmless.

INDIGNITY, INSULT.

The indignity, from the Latin dignus worthy, signifying unworthy treatment, respects the feeling and condition of the person offended: the insult (v. Affront) respects the temper of the offending party. We measure the indignity in our own mind; it depends upon the consciousness we have of our own worth: we measure the insult by the disposition which is discovered in another to degrade us. Persons in high stations are peculiarly exposed to indignities: persons in every station may be exposed to insults. The royal family of France suffered every indignity which vulgar rage could devise; 'The two czars made Montezumas' officers prisoners, and treated them with great indignity.'—ROBERTSON. Whenever people harbour animosities towards each other, they are apt to discover them by offering insults when they have the opportunity; 'Narvaez having learned that Cortez was now advanced with a small body of men, considered this as an insult which merited immediate chastisement.'—ROBERTSON. Indignities may however be offered to persons of all ranks; but in this case it always consists of more violence than a simple insult; it would be an indignity to a person of any rank to be compelled to do any office which belongs only to a beast of burden.

It would be an indignity to a female of any station to be compelled to expose her person; on the other hand, an insult does not extend beyond an abusive expression, a triumphant contemptuous look, or any breach of courtesy.

AFFRONT, INSULT, OUTRAGE.

Affront, in French affronte, from the Latin ad and frons, the forehead, signifies flying in the face of a person; insult, in French insulte, comes from the Latin insulto to dance or leap upon. The former of these actions marks defiance, the latter scorn and triumph; outrage is compounded of out or utter and rage or violence, signifying an act of extreme violence.

An affront is a mark of reproach shown in the presence of others; it piques and mortifies: an insult is an attack made with insolence; it irritates and provokes: an outrage combines all that is offensive; it wounds and injures. An intentional breach of politeness, or a want of respect where it is due, is an affront; 'The person thus conducted, who was Hannibal, seemed much disturbed, and could not forbear complaining to the board of the affronts he had met with among the Roman historians.'—ADDISON. An express mark of disrespect, particularly if coupled with any external indication of hostility, is an insult; 'It may very reasonably be expected that the old draw upon themselves the greatest part of those insults which they so much lament, and that age is rarely despised but when it is contemptible.'—JOHNSON. When the insult breaks forth into personal violence it is an outrage; 'This is the round of a passionate man's life; he contracts debts when he is furious, which his virtue, if he has virtue, obliges him to discharge at the return of reason. He spends his time in outrage and reparation.'—JOHNSON.

Captious people construe every innocent freedom into an affront. When people are in a state of animosity, they seek opportunities of offering each other insults. Intoxication or violent passion impel men to the commission of outrages.

TO AGGRAVATE, IRRITATE, PROVOKE, EXASPERATE, TANTALIZE.

Aggravate, in Latin aggravatus, participle of aggravo, compounded of the intensive syllable ag or ad and gravo to make heavy, signifies to make very heavy; irritate, in Latin irritatus, participle of irrito, which is a frequentative from ira, signifies to excite anger; provoke, in French provoquer, Latin provoco, compounded of pro forth, and coco to call, signifies to challenge or defy; exasperate, Latin exasperatus, participle of exaspero, is compounded of the intensive syllable ex and asper rough, signifying to make things exceedingly rough, tantalize, in French tantaliser, Greek ταρταλίζω, comes from Tantalus, a king of Phrygia, who, having offended the gods, was destined by way of punishment to stand up to his chin in water with a tree of fair fruit hanging over his head, both of which, as he attempted to allay his hunger and thirst, fled from his touch; whence to tantalize signifies to vex by exciting false expectations.

All these words, except the first, refer to the feelings of the mind, and in familiar discourse that also bears the same signification; but otherwise respects the outward circumstances.

The crime of robbery is aggravated by any circumstances of cruelty; whatever comes across the feelings irritates; whatever awakens anger provokes; whatever heightens this anger extraordinarily exasperates; whatever raises hopes in order to frustrate them tantalizes.

An appearance of unconcern for the offence and its consequences aggravates the guilt of the offender; 'As if nature had not sown evils enough in life, we are continually adding grief to grief, and aggravating the common calamity by our cruel treatment of one another.'—ADDISON. A grating harsh sound irritates if long continued and often repeated; so also reproaches and unkind treatment irritate the mind; 'He irritated many of his friends in London so much by his letters, that they withdrew their contributions.'—JOHNSON (Life of Savage). Angry words provoke, particularly when spoken with an air of defiance; 'The animadversions of critics are commonly such as may easily provoke the sedatest writer to some quickness of resentment.'—JOHNSON. When provocations become multiplied and varied they exasperate; 'Opposition retards, censure exasperates, or neglect depresses.'—JOHNSON. The weather by its frequent changes tantalizes those who depend upon it for amusement; 'Can we think that religion was designed only for a contradiction to nature; and with the greatest and most irrational tyranny in the world to tantalize?'—SOUTH.

Wicked people aggravate their transgressions by violence: susceptible and nervous people are most easily irritated; proud people are quickly provoked; hot and fiery people are soonest exasperated; those who wish for much, and wish for it eagerly, are oftenest tantalized.

TO TEASE, VEX, TAUNT, TANTALIZE, TORMENT.

Tease is most probably a frequentative of tear; vex has the same signification as given under the head of displease: taunt is probably contracted from tantalize, the original meaning of which is explained in the preceding article: torment, from the Latin tormentum and torqueo to twist, signifies to give pain by twisting, or gripping. The idea of acting upon others so as to produce a painful sentiment is common to all these terms; they differ in the mode of the action, and in the degree of the effect.

All these actions rise in importance; to tease consists in that which is most trifling; to torment in that which is most serious. We are teased by a fly that buzzes in our ears; we are vexed by the carelessness and stupidity of our servants; we are taunted by the sarcasms of others; we are tantalized by the fair prospects which only present themselves to disappear again; we are tormented by the importunities of troublesome beggars. It is the repetition of unpleasant trifles which teases; 'Louisa began to take a little mischievous pleasure in teasing.'—CUMBERLAND. It is the crossness and perversity of things which vex;

Still may the dog the wand'ring troops constrain
Of airy ghosts, and vex the guilty train.—DRYDEN.
In this sense things may be said figuratively to be vexed;

And sharpen'd shares shall vex the fruitful ground,
DRYDEN.

It is contemptuous and provoking behaviour which taunts,

Sharp was his voice, which in the shrillest tone,
Thus with injurious taunts attack the throne.
POPE.

It is the disappointment of awakened expectations which tantalizes; 'When the maid (in Sparta) was once sped, she was not suffered to tantalize the male part of the commonwealth.'—ADDISON. It is the repetition of grievous troubles which torments; 'Truth exerting itself in the searching precepts of self-denial and mortification is tormenting to vicious minds.'—SOUTH. We may be teased and tormented by that which produces bodily or mental pain; we are vexed, taunted, and tantalized only in the mind. Irritable and nervous people are most easily vexed; capitious and fretful people are most easily teased; captious and eager people are most easily tantalized: in all these cases the imagination or the bodily state of the individual serves to increase the pain: but persons are tormented by such things as inflict positive pain.

VEXATION, MORTIFICATION, CHAGRIN.

Vexation, signifies either the act of vexing, or the feeling of being vexed; mortification, the act of mortifying, or the feeling of being mortified; chagrin, in French chagrin, from aigrir, and the Latin acer sharp, signifies a sharp feeling.

Vexation springs from a variety of causes, acting unpleasantly on the inclinations or passions of men; mortification is a strong degree of vexation, which arises from particular circumstances acting on particular passions: the loss of a day's pleasure is a vexation to one who is eager for pleasure; the loss of a prize, or the circumstance of coming into disgrace where we expected honour, is a mortification to an ambitious person. Vexation arises principally from our wishes and views being crossed; mortification, from our pride and self-importance being hurt; chagrin, from a mixture of the two; disappointments are always attended with more or less of vexation, according to the circumstances which give pain and trouble; 'Poverty is an evil complicated with so many circumstances of uneasiness and vexation, that every man is studious to avoid it.'—JOHNSON. An exposure of our poverty may be more or less of a mortification, according to the value which we set on wealth and grandeur; 'I am mortified by those compliments which were designed to encourage me.'—POPE. A refusal of a request will produce more or less of chagrin as it is accompanied with circumstances more or less mortifying to our pride; 'It was your purpose to balance my chagrin at the inconsiderable effect of that essay, by representing that it obtained some notice.'—HILL.

CRIME, MISDEMEANOUR.

Crime (v. Crime) is to misdeemeanour (v. Offence), as the genus to the species: a misdeemeanour is in the technical sense a minor crime. Housebreaking is under all circumstances a crime; but shoplifting or pilfering amounts only to a misdeemeanour.

Corporal punishments are most commonly annexed to crimes; pecuniary punishments frequently to misdeemeanours. In the vulgar use of these terms, mis- deemeanour is moreover distinguished from crime, by not always signifying a violation of public law, but only of private morals; in which sense the term crime implies what is done against the state;

No crime of thine our present sufferings draws,
Not thou, but Heav'n's disposing will the cause
POPE.

The misdeemeanour is that which offends individuals or small communities; 'I mention this for the sake of several rural squires, whose reading does not rise so high as to "the present state of England," and who are often apt to usurp that precedency which by the laws of their country is not due to them. Their want of learning, which has planted them in this station may in some measure excuse their misdeemeanour.'—ADDISON.

CRIME, VICE, SIN.

Crime, in Latin crimen, Greek κρίμα, signifies a judgement, sentence, or punishment; also the cause of the sentence or punishment, in which latter sense it is here taken: vice, in Latin vitium, from vito to avoid, signifies that which ought to be avoided: sin, in Saxon synne, Swedish synd, German sünde, old German sunta, sunto, &c. Latin scotes, Greek αἵμα, from αἶμα to hurt, signifies the thing that hurts: sin being of all things the most hurtful.

A crime is a social offence; a vice is a personal offence: every action which does injury to others, either individually or collectively, is a crime; that which does injury to ourselves is a vice.

A crime consists in the violation of human laws; 'The most ignorant heathen knows and feels that, when he has committed an unjust and cruel action, he has committed a crime and deserves punishment.'—BLAIR. Vice consists in the violation of the moral law; 'If a man makes his vices publick, though they be such as seem principally to affect himself (as drunkenness or the like), they then become, by the bad example they set, of pernicious effects to society.'—BLACKSTONE. Sin consists in the violation of the Divine law; 'Every single gross act of sin is much the same thing to the conscience that a great blow or fall is to the head; it stuns and bereaves it of all use of its senses for a time.'—SOUTH. Sin, therefore, comprehends both crime and vice; but there are many sins which are not crimes nor vices: crimes are tried before a human court, and punished agreeably to the sentence of the judge; vices and sins are brought before the tribunal of the conscience; the former are punished in this world, the latter will be punished in the world to come, by the sentence of the Almighty: treason is one of the most atrocious crimes; drunkenness one of the most dreadful vices; religious hypocrisy one of the most heinous sins.

Crimes cannot be atoned for by repentance; society demands reparation for the injury committed: vices continue to punish the offender as long as they are cherished: sins are pardoned through the atonement and mediation of our blessed Redeemer, on the simple condition of sincere repentance. Crimes and vices disturb the peace and good order of society, they affect men's earthly happiness only; sin destroys the soul, both for this world and the world to come: crimes sometimes go unpunished; but sin carries its own punishment with it: murderers who escape the punishment due to their crimes commonly suffer the torments which attend the commission of such flagrant sins. Crimes are particular acts; vices are habitual acts of commission; sins are acts of commission or omission, habitual or particular: personal security, respect for the laws, and regard for one's moral character, operate to prevent the commission of crimes or vices; the fear of God deters from the commission of sin.

A crime always involves a violation of a law; a vice, whether in conduct or disposition, always diminishes moral excellence and involves guilt; a sin always supposes some perversity of will in an accountable agent. Children may commit crimes, but we may trust that in the divine mercy they will not all be imputed to them as sins. Of vices, however, as they are habitual, we have no right to suppose that any exception will be made in the account of our sins.

Crimes vary with times and countries; vices may be more or less pernicious; but sin is as unchangeable in its nature as the Being whom it offends. Smuggling and forgery are crimes in England, which in other countries are either not known or not regarded: the vice of gluttony is not so dreadful as that of drunkenness; every sin as an offence against an infinitely good and wise Being, must always bear the same stamp of guilt and enormity.

By the affectation of some writers in modern times, the word crime has been used in the singular to denote, in the abstract sense, a course of criminal conduct, but the innovation is not warranted by the necessity of the case, the word being used in the plural number, in that sense, as to be encouraged in the commission of crimes, not of crime.

CRIMINAL, GUILTY.

Criminal, from crime, signifies belonging or relating to a crime; guilty, from guilt, signifies having guilt: guilt comes from the German gelten to pay, and gelt a fine, debt, or from guile and beguile, according to Horne Tooke; Guilt is ge-wigled guilt, guilt'd, guilt; the past participle of ge-wigian and to find guilt in any one, is to find that he has been guiled, or as we now say, beguiled, as wicked means witched or bewitched.—(Diversions of Purley.)

Criminal respects the character of the offence; 'True modesty avoids every thing that is criminal; false modesty avoids every thing that is unfashionable.'—ADDISON. Guilty respects the fact of committing the offence, or more properly the person committing it;

Guilt hears appall'd with deeply troubled thought;
And yet not always on the guilty head
Descends the fated flash.—THOMSON.

The criminality of a person is estimated by all the circumstances of his conduct which present themselves to observation; his guilt requires to be proved by evidence. The criminality is not a matter of question, but of judgement; the guilt is often doubtful, if not positively concealed. The higher the rank of a person, the greater his criminality if he does not observe an upright and irreproachable conduct; 'If this perseverance in wrong often appertains to individuals, it much more frequently belongs to publick bodies; in them the disgrace of error, or even the criminality of conduct, belongs to so many, that no one is ashamed of the part which belongs to himself.'—WATSON. Where a number of individuals are concerned in any unlawful proceeding, the difficulty of attaching the guilt to the real offender is greatly increased; 'When these two are taken away, the possibility of guilt, and the possibility of innocence, what restraint can the belief of the creed lay upon any man?'—HAMMOND.

Criminal attaches to the aider, abettor, or encourager; but guilt, in the strict sense only, to the perpetrator of what is bad. A person may therefore sometimes be criminal without being guilty. He who conceals the offences of another may, under certain circumstances, be more criminal than the guilty person himself. On the other hand, we may be guilty without being criminal: the latter designates something positively bad, but the former is qualified by the object of the guilt. Those only are denominated criminal who offend seriously, either against publick law or private morals; but a person may be said to be guilty, either of the greatest or the smallest offences. He who contradicts another abruptly in conversation is guilty of a breach of politeness, but he is not criminal.

Criminal is moreover applied as an epithet to the things done; guilty is mostly applied to the person doing. We commonly speak of actions, proceedings, intentions, and views, as criminal; but of the person, the mind, or the conscience, as guilty. It is very criminal to sow dissension among men; although there are too many who from a busy temper are guilty of this offence.

CRIMINAL, CULPRIT, MALEFACTOR, FELON, CONVICT.

All these terms are employed for a publick offender; but the first conveys no more than this general idea; while the others comprehend some accessory idea in their signification: criminal (v. Criminal, Guilty) is a general term, and the rest are properly species of criminals: culprit, from the Latin culpa, and prehensus taken in a fault, signifies the criminal who is directly charged with his offence: malefactor, compounded of the Latin terms male and factor, signifies an evil-doer, that is, one who does evil, in distinction from him who does good: felon, from feloeny, in Latin felonía a capital crime, comes from the Greek φελόνεις an imposture because fraud and villany are the prominent features of every capital offence: convict, in Latin, convictus, participle of convincere to convince or prove, signifies one proved or found guilty.

When we wish to speak in general of those who by offences against the laws or regulations of society have exposed themselves to punishment, we denominate them criminals; 'If I attack the vicious, I shall only set upon them in a body, and will not be provoked by the worst usage I can receive from others, to make an example of any particular criminal.'—ADDISON. When we consider persons as already brought before a tribunal, we call them culprits;

The jury then withdrew a moment,
As if on weighty points to comment,
And right or wrong resolved to save her,
They gave a verdict in her favour.
The culprit by escape grown bold,
Pilfers alike from young and old.—MOORE

When we consider men in regard to the moral turpitude of their character, as the promoters of evil rather than of good, we entitle them malefactors;

For this the malefactor goat was laid
On Bacchus' altar, and his forfeit paid.—DRYDEN.

When we consider men as offending by the grosser violations of the law, they are termed felons; 'He (Earl Ferrers) expressed some displeasure at being executed as a common felon, exposed to the eyes of such a multitude.'—SMOLLETT. When we consider men as already under the sentence of the law, we denominate them convicts;

Attendance none shall need, nor train, where none
Are to behold the judgement, but the judged;
Those two: the third best absent is condemn'd
Convict by flight, and rebel to all law,
Conviction to the serpent none belongs.—MILTON

The punishments inflicted on criminals vary according to the nature of their crimes, and the spirit of the laws by which they are judged: a guilty conscience will give a man the air of a culprit in the presence of those who have not authority to be either his accusers or judges: it gratified the malice of the Jews to cause our blessed Saviour to be crucified between two malefactors: it is an important regulation in the internal economy of a prison, to have felons kept distinct from each other, particularly if their crimes are of an atrocious nature: it has not unfrequently happened, that when the sentence of the law has placed convicts in the lowest state of degradation, their characters have undergone so entire a reformation, as to enable them to attain a higher pitch of elevation than they had ever enjoyed before.

CULPABLE, FAULTY.

Culpable, in Latin culpabilis, from culpa a fault or blame, signifies worthy of blame, fit to be blamed; faulty, from fault, having faults.

We are culpable from the commission of one fault; we are faulty from the number of faults: culpable is a relative term; faulty is absolute; we are culpable with regard to a superior whose intentions we have not fulfilled; we are faulty whenever we commit any faults. A master pronounces his servant culpable for not having attended to his commands; 'In the common business of life, we find the memory of one like that of another, and honestly impute omissions not to involuntary forgetfulness, but culpable inattention.'—JOHNSON. An indifferent person pronounces another as faulty whose faults have come under his notice; 'In the consideration of human life the satirist never falls upon persons who are not glaringly faulty.'—STEELE. It is possible therefore to be faulty without being culpable, but not vice versa.

GUILTLESS, INNOCENT, HARMLESS.

Guiltless, without guilt, is more than innocent: innocence, from nocere to hurt, extends no farther than the quality of not hurting by any direct act; guiltless comprehends the quality of not intending to hurt: it is possible, therefore, to be innocent without being guiltless, though not vice versa; he who wishes for the death of another is not guiltless, though he may be innocent of the crime of murder. Guiltless seems to regard a man's general condition; innocent his particular condition: no man is guiltless in the sight of God, for no man is exempt from the guilt of sin; but he may be innocent in the sight of men, or innocent of all such intentiona offences as render him obnoxious to his fellow-creatures. Guiltlessness was that happy state of perfection which men lost at the fall;

Ah! why should all mankind
For one man's fault thus guiltless be condemn'd,
If guiltless? But from me what can proceed
But all corrupt?—MILTON.

Innocence is that relative or comparative state of perfection which is attainable here on earth: the highest state of innocence is an ignorance of evil; 'When Adam sees the several changes of nature about him, he appears in a disorder of mind suitable to one who had forfeited both his innocence and his happiness.'—ADDISON.

Guiltless is in the proper sense applicable only to the condition of man; and when applied to things, it still has a reference to the person;

But from the mountain's grassy side
A guiltless feast I bring;
A scrip with fruits and herbs supplied,
And water from the spring.—GOLDSMITH.

Innocent is equally applicable to persons or things; a person is innocent who has not committed any injury, or has not any direct purpose to commit an injury; or a conversation is innocent which is free from what is hurtful. Innocent and harmless both recommend themselves as qualities negatively good; they designate an exemption either in the person or thing from injury, and differ only in regard to the nature of the injury: innocence respects moral injury, and harmless physical injury: a person is innocent who is free from moral impurity and wicked purposes; he is harmless if he have not the power or disposition to commit any violence; a diversion is innocent which has nothing in it likely to corrupt the morals; 'A man should endeavour to make the sphere of his innocent pleasures as wide as possible, that he may retire into them with safety.'—ADDISON. A game is harmless which is not likely to inflict any wound, or endanger the health;

Full on his breast the Trojan arrow fell,
But harmless bounded from the plated steel.
ADDISON.

IMPERFECTION, DEFECT, FAULT, VICE.

Imperfection denotes either the abstract quality of imperfect, or the thing which constitutes it imperfect; defect signifies that which is deficient or falls short, from the Latin deficio to fall short; fault, from fall, signifies that which fails; vice, signifies the same as explained under the head of Crime.

These terms are applied either to persons or things. An imperfection in a person arises from his want of perfection, and the infirmity of his nature; there is no one without some point of imperfection which is obvious to others, if not to himself: he may strive to diminish it, although he cannot expect to get altogether rid of it: a defect is a deviation from the general constitution of man; it is what may be natural to the man as an individual, but not natural to man as a species; in this manner we may speak of a defect in the speech, or a defect in temper. The fault and vice rise in degree and character above either of the former terms; they both reflect disgrace more or less on the person possessing them; but the fault always characterizes the agent, and is said in relation to an individual; the vice characterizes the action, and may be considered abstractedly: hence we speak of a man's faults as the things we may condemn in him; but we may speak of the vices of drunkenness, lying, and the like, without any immediate reference to any one who practises these vices. When they are both employed for an individual, their distinction is obvious: the fault may lessen the amiability or excellence of the character; the vice is a stain; a single act destroys its purity, an habitual practice is a pollution.

In regard to things the distinction depends upon the preceding explanation in a great measure, for we can scarcely use these words without thinking on man as a moral agent, who was made the most perfect of all creatures, and became the most imperfect; and from our imperfection has arisen, also, a general imperfection throughout all the works of creation. The word imperfection is therefore the most unqualified term of all: there may be imperfection in regard to our Maker; or there may be imperfection in regard to what we conceive of perfection; and in this case the term simply and generally implies whatever falls short in any degree or manner of perfection; 'It is a pleasant story that we, forsooth, who are the only imperfect creatures in the universe, are the only beings that will not allow of imperfection.'—STEELE. Defect is a positive degree of imperfection: it is contrary both to our ideas of perfection or our particular intention; thus, there may be a defect in the materials of which a thing is made; or a defect in the mode of making it: the term defect, however, whether said of persons or things, characterizes rather the object than the agent; 'This low race of men take a particular pleasure in finding an eminent character levelled to their condition by a report of its defects, and keep themselves in countenance, though they are excelled in a thousand virtues, if they believe that they have in common with a great person any one fault.'—ADDISON. Fault, on the other hand, when said of things, always refers to the agent: thus we may say there is a defect in the glass, or a defect in the spring; but there is a fault in the workman ship, or a fault in the putting together, and the like. Vice, with regard to things, is properly a serious or radical defect; the former lies in the constitution of the whole, the latter may lie in the parts; the former lies in essentials, the latter lies in the accidents; there may be a defect in the shape or make of a horse; but the vice is said in regard to his soundness or unsoundness, his docility or indocility; 'I did myself the honour this day to make a visit to a lady of quality, who is one of those who are ever railing at the vices of the age.'—STEELE.

IMPERFECTION, WEAKNESS, FRAILTY, FAILING, FOIBLE.

Imperfection (v. Imperfection) has already been considered as that which in the most extended sense abridges the moral perfection of man; the rest are but modes of imperfection, varying in degree and circumstances; 'You live in a reign of human infirmity, where every one has imperfections.'—BLAIR. Weakness is a positive and strong degree of imperfection, which is opposed to strength; it is what we do not so necessarily look for, and therefore distinguishes the individual who is liable to it; 'The folly of allowing ourselves to delay what we know cannot finally be escaped, is one of the general weaknesses which, to a greater or less degree, prevail in every mind.'—JOHNSON. Frailty is another strong mode of imperfection which characterizes the fragility of man, but not of all men; it differs from weakness in respect to the object. A weakness lies more in the judgement or in the sentiment; frailty lies more in the moral features of an action; 'There are circumstances which every man must know will prove the occasions of calling forth his latent frailties.'—BLAIR. It is a weakness in a man to yield to the persuasions of any one against his better judgement; it is a frailty to yield to intemperance or illicit indulgences. Failings and foibles are the smallest degrees of imperfection to which the human character is liable: we have all our failings in temper, and our foibles in our habits and our prepossession; and he, as Horace observes, is the best who has the fewest; 'Never allow small failings to dwell on your attention so much as to deface the whole of an amiable character.'—BLAIR. 'Witty men have sometimes sense enough to know their own foibles, and therefore they craftily shun the attacks of an argument.'—WATTS. For our imperfections we must seek superiour aid: we must be most on our guard against those weaknesses to which the softness or susceptibility of our minds may most expose us, and against those frailties into which the violence of our evil passions may bring us: toward the failings and foibles of others we may be indulgent, but should be ambitious to correct them in ourselves.

TO FAIL, FALL SHORT, BE DEFICIENT.

Fail, in French faillir, German, &c. fehlen, like the word fall, comes from the Latin fallo to deceive, and the Hebrew פָּלַל to fall or decay.

To fail marks the result of actions or efforts; a person fails in his undertaking; fall short designates either the result of actions, or the state of things; a person falls short in his calculation, or in his account; the issue falls short of the expectation: to be deficient marks only the state or quality of objects; a person is deficient in good manners. People frequently fail in their best endeavours for want of knowing how to apply their abilities; 'I would not willingly laugh but to instruct; or, if I sometimes fail in this point, when my mirth ceases to be instructive, it shall never cease to be innocent.'—ADDISON. When our expectations are immoderate, it is not surprising if our success falls short of our hopes and wishes; 'There is not in my opinion any thing more mysterious in nature than this instinct in animals, which thus rises above reason, and falls infinitely short of it.'—ADDISON. There is nothing in which people discover themselves to be more deficient than in keeping ordinary engagements;

While all creation speaks the pow'r divine,
Is it deficient in the main design?—JENYNS.

To fail and be deficient are both applicable to the characters of men; but the former is mostly employed for the moral conduct, the latter for the outward behaviour; hence a man is said to fail in his duty, in the discharge of his obligations, in the performance of a promise, and the like; but to be deficient in politeness, in attention to his friends, in his address, in his manner of entering a room and the like.

FAILURE, FAILING.

The failure (v. To fail) bespeaks the action, or the result of the action; the failing is the habit, or the habitual failure: the failure is said of one's undertakings, or in any point generally in which one fails; 'Though some violations of the petition of rights may perhaps be imputed to him (Charles I.), these are more to be ascribed to the necessity of his situation, than to any failure in the integrity of his principles.'—HUME. The failing is said of one's moral character; 'There is scarcely any failing of mind or body, which instead of producing shame and discontent, its natural effects, has not one time or other gladdened vanity with the hope of praise.'—JOHNSON. The failure is opposed to the success; the failing to the perfection. The merchant must be prepared for failures in his speculations; the statesman for failures in his projects, the result of which depends upon contingencies that are above human control. With our failings, however, it is somewhat different; we must never rest satisfied that we are without them, nor contented with the mere consciousness that we have them.

FAILURE, MISCARRIAGE, ABORTION

Failure (v. To fail) has always a reference to the agent and his design; miscarriage, that is, the carrying or going wrong, is applicable to all subinary concerns, without reference to any particular agent; abortion, from the Latin aborior, to deviate from the rise, or to pass away before it be come to maturity, is in the proper sense applied to the process of animal nature, and in the figurative sense, to the thoughts and designs which are conceived in the mind.

Failure is more definite in its signification, and limited in its application; we speak of the failures of individuals, but of the miscarriages of nations or things; the failure reflects on the person so as to excite towards him some sentiment, either of compassion, displeasure, or the like; 'He that attempts to show, however modestly, the failures of a celebrated writer, shall surely irritate his admirers.'—JOHNSON. The miscarriage is considered mostly in relation to the course of human events; 'The miscarriages of the great designs of princes are recorded in the histories of the world.'—JOHNSON. The failure of Xerxes' expedition reflected disgrace upon himself; but the miscarriage of military enterprises in general are attributable to the elements, or some such untoward circumstance. The abortion, in its proper sense, is a species of miscarriage, and in application a species of failure, as it applies only to the designs of conscious agents; but it does not carry the mind back to the agent, for we speak of the abortion of a scheme with as little reference to the schemer, as when we speak of the miscarriage of an expedition; 'All abortion is from infirmity and defect.'—SOUTH.

INSOLVENCY, FAILURE, BANKRUPTCY.

All these terms are properly used in the mercantile world, but are not excluded also in a figurative sense from general application. Insolvency, from in privative, and solvere to pay, signifying not to pay, denotes a state, namely, the state of not being able to pay what one owes; failure, from to fail, signifies the act of failing in one's business, or a cessation of business for want of means to carry it on; bankruptcy, from the two words banca rupta, or a broken bank, denotes the effect of a failure, namely, the breaking up of the capital and credit by which a concern is upheld. The word bankruptcy owes its origin to the Italians, by whom it is called bancorotto, because originally the money-changers of Italy had benches at which they conducted their business, and when any one of them failed his bench was broken. These terms are seldom confined to one person, or description of persons. As an incapacity to pay debts is very frequent among others besides men of business, insolvency is said of any such persons; a gentleman may die in a state of insolvency who does not leave effects sufficient to cover all demands;

Even the dear delight

Of sculpture, paint, intaglios, books and coins,
Thy breast, sagacious prudence! shall connect
With filth and beggary, nor disdain to link
With black insolvency.—STENSTONE.

Although failure is here specifically taken for a failure in business, yet there may be a failure in one particular undertaking without any direct insolvency: a failure may likewise imply a temporary failure in payment, or it may imply an entire failure of the concern; 'The greater the whole quantity of trade, the greater of course must be the positive number of failures, while the aggregate success is still in the same proportion.'—BURKE. As a bankruptcy is a legal transaction, which entirely dissolves the firm under which any business is conducted, it necessarily implies a failure in the full extent of the term; yet it does not necessarily imply an insolvency; for some men may, in consequence of a temporary failure, be led to commit an act of bankruptcy, who are afterward enabled to give a full dividend to all their creditors; 'By an act of insolvency all persons who are in too low a way of dealing to be bankrupts, or not in a mercantile state of life, are discharged from all suits and imprisonments, by delivering up all their estates and effects.'—BLACKSTONE. But from the entire state of destitution which a bankruptcy involves in it, the term is generally taken for the most hopeless state of want; 'Perkin gathered together a power neither in number nor in hardness contemptible; but in their fortunes to be feared, being bankrupts, and many of them felons.'—BACON. It is also used figuratively; 'Sir, if you spend word for word with me I shall make you wit bankrupt.'—SHAKESPEARE.

ERROUR, FAULT.

Error, from erro to wander or go astray, respects the act; fault, from fail, respects the agent: the error may lay in the judgement, or in the conduct; but the fault lies in the will or intention: the errors of youth must be treated with indulgence: but their faults must on all accounts be corrected; error is said of that which is individual and partial;

Bold is the task when subjects, grown too wise,
Instruct a monarch where his error lies.—POPE.

Fault is said of that which is habitual; 'Other faults are not under the wife's jurisdiction, and should if possible escape her observation, but jealousy calls upon her particularly for its cure.'—ADDISON. It is an error to use intemperate language at any time; it is a fault in the temper of some persons who cannot restrain their anger.

ERROUR, MISTAKE, BLUNDER.

Errour, as in the preceding article, marks the act of wandering, or the state of being gone astray; a mistake is a taking amiss or wrong; blunder is not improbably changed from blind, and signifies any thing done blindly.

Errour in its universal sense is the general term, since every deviation from what is right in rational agents is termed errour, which is strictly opposed to truth: errour is the lot of humanity; into whatever we attempt to do or think errour will be sure to creep: the term therefore is of unlimited use; the very mention of it reminds us of our condition: we have errours of judgement; errours of calculation; errours of the head; and errours of the heart; 'Idolatry may be looked upon as an errour arising from mistaken devotion.'—ADDISON. The other terms designate modes of errour, which mostly refer to the common concerns of life: mistake is an errour of choice; blunder an errour of action: children and careless people are most apt to make mistakes; 'It happened that the king himself passed through the gallery during this debate, and smiling at the mistake of the dervise, asked him how he could possibly be so dull as not to distinguish a palace from a caravansary.'—ADDISON. Ignorant, conceited and stupid people commonly commit blunders: 'Pope allows that Dennis had detected one of those blunders which are called bulls.'—JOHNSON. A mistake must be rectified; in commercial transactions it may be of serious consequence: a blunder must be set right; but blunders are not always to be set right; and blunders are frequently so ridiculous as only to excite laughter.

TO DEVIATE, WANDER, SWERVE, STRAY.

Deviate, from the Latin devius, and de via, signifies literally to turn out of the way; wander, in German wandern, or wandeln, a frequentative of wenden to turn, signifies to turn frequently; swerve, probably from the German schweifen to ramble, schweben to soar, &c. signifies to take an unsteady, wide, and indirect course; stray is probably a change from erro to wander.

Deviate always supposes a direct path; wander includes no such idea. The act of deviating is commonly faulty, that of wandering is indifferent: they may frequently exchange significations; the former being justifiable by necessity; and the latter arising from an unsteadiness of mind. Deviate is mostly used in the moral acceptation; wander may be used in either sense. A person deviates from any plan or rule laid down; he wanders from the subject in which he is engaged. As no rule can be laid down which will not admit of an exception, it is impossible but the wisest will find it necessary in their moral conduct to deviate occasionally; yet every wanton deviation from an established practice evinces a culpable temper on the part of the deviator; 'While we remain in this life we are subject to innumerable temptations, which, if listened to, will make us deviate from reason and goodness.'—SPECTATOR. Those who wander into the regions of metaphysics are in great danger of losing themselves; it is with them as with most wanderers, that they spend their time at best but idly;

Our aim is happiness; 't is yours, 't is mine;
He said; 't is the pursuit of all that live,
Yet few attain it, if 't was e'er attain'd;
But they the widest wander from the mark,
Who thro' the flow'ry paths of sauntering joy
Seek this coy goddess.—ARMSTRONG.

To swerve is to deviate from that which one holds right; to stray is to wander in the same bad sense: men swerve from their duty to consult their interest;

Nor number, nor example, with him wrought,
To swerve from truth.—MILTON.

The young stray from the path of rectitude to seek that of pleasure;

Why have I stray'd from pleasure and repose,
To seek a good each government bestows?
GOLDSMITH.

TO DIGRESS, DEVIATE.

Both in the original and the accepted sense, these words express going out of the ordinary course; but digress is used only in particular, and deviate in general cases. We digress only in a narrative whether written or spoken; we deviate in actions as well as in words, in our conduct as well as in writings.

Digress is mostly taken in a good or indifferent sense; 'The digressions in the Tale of a Tub, relating to Wotton and Bentley, must be confessed to discover want of knowledge or want of integrity.'—JOHNSON. Deviate in an indifferent or bad sense; 'A resolution was taken (by the authors of the Spectator) of courting general approbation by general topics; to this practice they adhered with few deviations.'—JOHNSON. Although frequent digressions are faulty, yet occasionally it is necessary to digress for the purposes of explanation: every deviation is bad, which is not sanctioned by the necessity of circumstances.

TO WANDER, TO STROLL, RAMBLE, ROVE, ROAM, RANGE.

Wander signifies the same as in the article Deviate; stroll is probably an intensive of to roll, that is, to go in a planless manner, ramble from the Latin re and ambulo, is to walk backward and forward; and rove is probably a contraction of ramble; roam is connected with our word room, space, signifying to go in a wide space, and the Hebrew רום, to be violently moved backward and forward; range, from the noun range, a rank, row, or extended space, signifies to go over a great space, but within certain limits. The idea of going in an irregular and free manner is common to all these terms.

To wander is to go out of the path that has been already marked out;

But far about they wander from the grave
Of him, whom his ungentle fortune urg'd
Against his own sad breast to lift the hand
Of impious violence.—THOMSON.

Sometimes wandering may be an involuntary action a person may wander to a great distance, or for an indefinite length of time; in this manner a person wanders who has lost himself in a wood; or it may be a planless course;

I will go lose myself,
And wander up and down to view the city.

SHAKESPEARE.

To stroll is to go in a fixed path, but strolling is a voluntary action, limited at our discretion; thus, when a person takes a walk, he sometimes strolls from one path into another, as he pleases; 'I found by the voice of my friend who walked by me, that we had insensibly strolled into the grove sacred to the widow.'—ADDISON. To ramble is to wander without any object, and consequently with more than ordinary irregularity: in this manner he who sets out to take a walk, without knowing or thinking where he shall go, rambles as chance directs; 'I thus rambled from pocket to pocket until the beginning of the civil wars.'—ADDISON. To rove is to wander in the same planless manner, but to a wider extent; a fugitive who does not know his road, roves about the country in quest of some retreat;

Where is that knowledge now, that regal thought
With just advice and timely counsel fraught?
Where now, O judge of Israel, does it rove?

PRIOR.

To roam is to wander from the impulse of a disordered mind; in this manner a lunatic who has broken loose may roam about the country; so likewise a person who travels about, because he cannot rest in quiet at home, may also be said to roam in quest of peace;

She looks abroad, and prunes herself for flight,
Like an unwilling inmate longs to roam
From this dull earth, and seek her native home.

JENYNS.

To range is the contrary of to roam; as the latter indicates a disordered state of mind, the former indicates composure and fixedness; we range within certain limits, as the hunter ranges the forest, the shepherd ranges the mountains;

The stag too singled from the herd, where long
He rang'd the branching monarch of the shades
Before the tempest drives.—THOMSON

BLEMISH, DEFECT, FAULT.

Blemish is probably changed from the word blame, signifying that which causes blame; defect and fault have the same signification as given under the head of imperfection.

Blemish respects accidents or incidental properties of an object: defect consists in the want of some specific propriety in an object; fault conveys the idea not only of something wrong, but also of its relation to the author. There is a blemish in fine china; a defect in the springs of a clock; and a fault in the contrivance. An accident may cause a blemish in a fine painting; 'There is another particular which may be reckoned among the blemishes, or rather, the false beauties, of our English tragedy: I mean those particular speeches which are commonly known by the name of rants.'—ADDISON. The course of nature may occasion a defect in a person's speech; 'It has been often remarked, though not without wonder, that a man is more jealous of his natural than of his moral qualities; perhaps it will no longer appear strange, if it be considered that natural defects are of necessity, and moral of choice.'—HAWKESWORTH. The carelessness of the workman is evinced by the faults in the workmanship; 'The resentment which the discovery of a fault or folly produces must bear a certain proportion to our pride.'—JOHNSON. A blemish may be easier remedied than a defect is corrected, or a fault repaired.

BLEMISH, STAIN, SPOT, SPECK, FLAW.

Blemish comes immediately from the French blémir to grow pale, but probably in an indirect manner from blame; stain, in French teindre, old French deseindre, comes from the Latin tingo to die; spot is not improbably connected with the word spit, Latin sputum, and the Hebrew ספח, to adhere as something extraneous; speck, in Saxon spece, probably comes from the same Hebrew root; flaw, in Saxon floh, flice, German fleck, low German flak or plakke, a spot or a fragment, a piece, most probably from the Latin plaga, Greek πληγή a strip of land, or a stripe, a wound in the body.

In the proper sense blemish is the generic term, the rest are specific: a stain, a spot, speck, and flaw, are blemishes, but there are likewise many blemishes which are neither stains, spots, specks, nor flaws.

Whatever takes off from the seamliness of appearance is a blemish. In works of art, the slightest dimness of colour, or want of proportion, is a blemish. A stain and spot sufficiently characterize themselves, as that which is superfluous and out of its place. A speck is a small spot; and a flaw, which is confined to hard substances, mostly consists of a faulty indenture on the outer surface. A blemish tarnishes; a stain spoils; a spot, speck, or flaw, disfigures. A blemish is rectified, a stain wiped out, a spot or speck removed.

These terms are also employed figuratively. Even an imputation of what is improper in our moral conduct is a blemish in our reputation; 'It is impossible for authors to discover beauties in one another's works: they have eyes only for spots and blemishes.'—ADDISON. The failings of a good man are so many spots in the bright hemisphere of his virtue: there are some vices which affix a stain on the character of nations, as well as of the individuals who are guilty of them;

By length of time,

The scurf is worn away of each committed crime;

No speck is left of their habitual stains,

But the pure æther of the soul remains.—DRYDEN.

A blemish or a spot may be removed by a course of good conduct, but a stain is mostly indelible: it is as great a privilege to have an unblemished reputation, or a spotless character, as it is a misfortune to have the stain of bad actions affixed to our name; 'There are many who applaud themselves for the singularity of their judgement, which has searched deeper than others, and found a flaw in what the generality of mankind have admired.'—ADDISON.

DEFECTIVE, DEFICIENT.

Defective expresses the quality or property of having a defect (v Blemish); deficient is employed with regard to the thing itself that is wanting. A book may be defective, in consequence of some leaves being deficient. A deficiency is therefore often what constitutes a defect. Many things, however, may be defective without having any deficiency, and vice versa. What ever is misshapen, and fails, either in beauty or utility, is defective; that which is wanted to make a thing complete is deficient. It is a defect in the eye when it is so constructed that things are not seen at their proper distances; 'Providence, for the most part, sets us upon a level, if it renders us perfect in one accomplishment, it generally leaves us defective in another.'—ADDISON. There is a deficiency in a tradesman's accounts, when one side falls short of the other; 'If there be a deficiency in the speaker, there will not be sufficient attention and regard paid to the thing spoken.'—SWIFT.

Things only are said to be defective; but persons may be termed deficient either in attention, in good breeding, in civility, or whatever else the occasion may require. That which is defective is most likely to be permanent; but a deficiency may be only occasional, and easily rectified.

BAD, WICKED, EVIL.

Bad, in Saxon bad, baed, in German bös, is probably connected with the Latin pejus worse, and the Hebrew יָשׁוּב to be ashamed; wicked is probably changed from witched or bewitched, that is, possessed with an evil spirit; bad respects moral and physical qualities in general; wicked only moral qualities; evil, in German übel, from the Hebrew עָוֶל pain, signifies that which is the prime cause of pain; evil therefore, in its full extent, comprehends both badness and wickedness.

Whatever offends the taste and sentiments of a rational being is bad: food is bad when it disagrees with the constitution; the air is bad which has any thing in it disagreeable to the senses or hurtful to the body; books are bad which only inflame the imagination or the passions; 'Whatever we may pretend, as to our belief, it is the strain of our actions that must show whether our principles have been good or bad.'—BLAIR. Whatever is wicked offends the moral principles of a rational agent: any violation of the law is wicked, as law is the support of human society; an act of injustice or cruelty is wicked, as it opposes the will of God and the feelings of humanity;

For when th' impenitent and wicked die,
Loaded with crimes and infamy;
If any sense at that sad time remains,
They feel amazing terror, mighty pains.

POMFRET.

Evil is either moral or natural, and may be applied to every object that is contrary to good; but the term is employed only for that which is in the highest degree bad or wicked;

And what your bounded view, which only saw

A little part, deem'd evil, is no more;

The storms of wintry time will quickly pass,

And one unbounded spring encircle all.—THOMSON.

When used in relation to persons, both refer to the morals, but bad is more general than wicked; a bad man is one who is generally wanting in the performance of his duty; a wicked man is one who is chargeable with actual violations of the law, human or Divine; such a one has an evil mind. A bad character is the consequence of immoral conduct; but no man has the character of being wicked who has not been guilty of some known and flagrant vices: the inclinations of the best are evil at certain times

BADLY, ILL.

Badly, in the manner of bad (v. Bad); ill, in Swedish ill, Icelandic illur, Danish ill, &c. is supposed by Adelung, and with some degree of justice, not to be a contraction of evil, but to spring from the Greek οὐλός destructive, and ὀλέω to destroy.

These terms are both employed to modify the actions or qualities of things, but badly is always annexed to the action, and ill to the quality: as to do any thing badly, the thing is badly done; an ill-judged scheme, an ill-contrived measure, an ill-disposed person.

DEPRAVITY, DEPRAVATION, CORRUPTION.

Depravity, from the Latin pravitas and prævus, in Greek δαιμός, and the Hebrew רָע to be disordered, or put out of its established order, signifying the quality of not being straight; depravation, in Latin depravatio, signifies the act of making depraved; corruption, in Latin corruptio, corrumpo, from rumpo to break, marks the disunion and decomposition of the parts.

* All these terms are applied to objects which are contrary to the order of Providence, but the term depravity characterizes the thing as it is; the terms depravation and corruption designate the making or causing it to be so: depravity therefore excludes the idea of any cause; depravation always refers us to the cause or external agency: hence we may speak of depravity as natural, but we speak of depravation and corruption as the result of circumstances: there is a depravity in man, which nothing but the grace of God can correct; 'Nothing can show greater depravity of understanding than to delight in the show when the reality is wanting.'—JOHNSON. The introduction of obscenity on the stage tends greatly to the depravation of morals; bad company tends to the corruption of a young man's morals; 'The corruption of our taste is not of equal consequence with the depravation of our virtue.'—WARTON.

Depravity or depravation implies crookedness, or a distortion from the regular course; corruption implies a dissolution as it were in the component parts of bodies.

Cicero says that depravity is applicable only to the mind and heart; but we say a depraved taste, and depraved humours in regard to the body. A depraved taste loathes common food, and longs for that which is unnatural and hurtful. Corruption is the natural process by which material substances are disorganized.

In the figurative application of these terms they preserve the same signification. Depravity is characterized by being directly opposed to order, and an established system of things; corruption marks the vitiation or spoiling of things, and the ferment that leads to destruction. Depravity turns things out of their ordinary course; corruption destroys their essential qualities. Depravity is a vicious state of things, in which all is deranged and perverted; corruption is a vicious state of things, in which all is sullied and polluted. That which is depraved loses its proper manner of acting and existing; 'The depravation of human will was followed by a disorder of the harmony of nature.'—JOHNSON. That which is corrupted loses its virtue and essence; 'We can discover that where there is universal innocence, there will probably be universal happiness; for why should afflictions be permitted to infect beings who are not in danger of corruption from blessings?'—JOHNSON.

The force of irregular propensities and distempered imaginations produces a depravity of manners; the force of example and the dissemination of bad principles produce corruption. A judgement not sound or right is depraved; a judgement debased by that which is vicious is corrupted. What is depraved requires to be reformed: what is corrupted requires to be purified. Depravity has most regard to apparent and excessive disorders; corruption to internal and dissolute vices. 'Manners,' says Cicero, 'are corrupted and depraved by the love of riches.' Port Royal says that God has given up infidels to the wandering of a corrupted and depraved mind. These words are by no means a pleonasm or repetition, because they represent two distinct images; one indicates the state of a thing very much changed in its substance: the other the state of a thing very much opposed to regularity. 'Good God! (says Masillon the preacher), what a dreadful account will the rich and powerful have one day to give; since, besides their own sins, they will have to account before Thee for public disorder, depravity of morals, and the corruption of the age!' Public disorders bring on naturally depravity of morals; and sins of vicious practices naturally give birth to corruption. Depravity is more or less open; it revolts the sober upright understanding; corruption is more or less disguised in its operations, but fatal in its effects: the former sweeps away every thing before it like a torrent; the latter infuses itself into the moral frame like a slow poison.

That is a depraved state of morals in which the gross vices are openly practised in defiance of all decorum; 'The greatest difficulty that occurs in analyzing his (Swift's) character, is to discover by what depravity of intellect he took delight in revolving ideas from which almost every other mind shrinks with disgust.'—JOHNSON. That is a corrupt state of society in which vice has secretly insinuated itself into all the principles and habits of men, and concealed its deformity under the fair semblance of virtue and honour,

Peace is the happy natural state of man;

War his corruption, his disgrace.—THOMSON.

The manners of savages are most likely to be depraved; those of civilized nations to be corrupt, when luxury and refinement are risen to an excessive pitch. Cannibal nations present us with the picture of human depravity; the Roman nation, during the time of the emperors, affords us an example of almost universal corruption.

From the above observations, it is clear that depravity is best applied to those objects to which common usage has annexed the epithets of right, regular, fine, &c.; and corruption to those which may be characterized by the epithets of sound, pure, innocent, or good. Hence we say depravity of mind and corruption of heart; depravity of principle and corruption of sentiment or feeling; a depraved character; a corrupt example; a corrupt influence; 'No depravity of the mind has been more frequently or justly censured than ingratitude.'—JOHNSON. 'I have remarked in a former paper, that credulity is the common failing of inexperienced virtue, and that he who is spontaneously suspicious may be justly charged with radical corruption.'—JOHNSON.

In reference to the arts or belles lettres we say either depravity or corruption of taste, because taste has its rules, is liable to be disordered, is or is not conformable to natural order, is regular or irregular; and on the other hand it may be so intermingled with sentiments and feelings foreign to its own native purity as to give it justly the title of corrupt.

The last thing worthy of notice respecting the two words depravity and corruption, is that the former is used for man in his moral capacity; but the latter for man in a political capacity: hence we speak of human depravity, but the corruption of government; 'The depravity of mankind is so easily discoverable, that nothing but the desert or the cell can exclude it from notice.'—JOHNSON. 'Every government, say the politicians, is perpetually degenerating toward corruption.'—JOHNSON.

WICKED, UNJUST, INIQUITOUS, NEFARIOUS

Wicked (v. Bad) is here the generic term; iniquitous, from iniquus unjust, signifies that species of wickedness which consists in violating the law of right between man and man; nefarious, from the Latin nefas wicked or abominable, is that species of wickedness which consists in violating the most sacred obligations. The term wicked, being indefinite, is commonly applied in a milder sense than iniquitous; and iniquitous than nefarious: it is wicked to deprive another of his property unlawfully, under any circumstances;

In the corrupted currents of this world,
Offence's glided hand may shove by justice;
And oft 't is seen, the wicked prize itself
Buys out the law.—SHAKESPEARE.

It is iniquitous if it be done by fraud and circumvention; and nefarious if it involves any breach of trust, or is in direct violation of any known law: any undue influence over another, in the making of his will, to the detriment of the rightful heir, is iniquitous; 'Lucullus found that the province of Pontus had fallen under great disorders and oppressions from the iniquity of usurers and publicans.'—PRIDEAUX. Any underhand dealing of a servant to defraud his master is nefarious, or any conspiracy to defraud or injure others is called nefarious; 'That unhallowed villainy

* Vide Roubaud: 'Depravation, corruption.'— Russier: 'Depravity, corruption.'

re^{fer}arously attempted upon the person of our agent.'—
MILTON.

TO CONTAMINATE, DEFILE, POLLUTE, TAINT, CORRUPT.

Contaminate, in Latin contaminatus, participle of contamino, comes from the Hebrew טמא to pollute; defile, compounded of de and fil or vile, signifies to make vile; pollute, in Latin pollutus, participle of polluo, compounded of per and lavo or lavo to wash or dye, signifies to infuse thoroughly; taint, in French teint, participle of teindre, in Latin tingo, signifies to dye or stain; corrupt, signifies the same as in the preceding article.

Contaminate is not so strong an expression as defile or pollute; but it is stronger than taint; these terms are used in the sense of injuring purity: corrupt has the idea of destroying it. Whatever is impure contaminates, what is gross and vile in the natural sense defiles and in the moral sense pollutes; what is contagious or infectious corrupts; and what is corrupted may taint other things. Improper conversation or reading contaminates the mind of youth; 'The drop of water after its progress through all the channels of the street is not more contaminated with filth and dirt, than a simple story after it has passed through the mouths of a few modern tale-bearers.'—HAWKSWORTH. Lewdness and obscenity defile the body and pollute the mind;

When from the mountain tops with hideous cry
And clatt'ring wings the hungry harpies fly,
They snatch the meat, defiling all they find,
And parting leave a loathsome stench behind.

DRYDEN.

Her virgin statue with their bloody hands
Polluted, and profan'd her holy bands.—DRYDEN.

Loose company corrupts the morals; 'All men agree that licentious poems do, of all writings, soonest corrupt the heart.'—STEELE. The coming in contact with a corrupted body is sufficient to give a taint;

Your teeming ewes shall no strange meadows try,
Nor fear a rot from tainted company.—DRYDEN.

If young people be admitted to a promiscuous intercourse with society, they must unavoidably witness objects that are calculated to contaminate their thoughts if not their inclinations. They are thrown in the way of seeing the lips of females defiled with the grossest indecencies, and hearing or seeing things which cannot be heard or seen without polluting the soul: it cannot be surprising if after this their principles are found to be corrupted before they have reached the age of maturity.

CONTACT, TOUCH.

Contact, Latin Contactus, participle of contingo, compounded of con and tango to touch together, is distinguished from the simple word touch, not so much in sense as in grammatical construction; the former expressing a state, and referring to two bodies actually in that state; the latter on the other hand implying the abstract act of touching: we speak of things coming or being in contact, but not of the contact instead of the touch of a thing: the poison which comes from the poison-tree is so powerful in its nature, that it is not necessary to come in contact with it in order to feel its baneful influence; 'We are attracted towards each other by general sympathy, but kept back from contact in private interest.'—JOHNSON. Some insects are armed with stings so inconceivably sharp, that the smallest touch possible is sufficient to produce a puncture into the flesh; 'O death! where is now thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory? Where are the terrors with which thou hast so long affrighted the nations? At the touch of the Divine rod, thy visionary horrors are fled.'—BLAIR.

CONTAGION, INFECTION.

Both these terms imply the power of communicating something bad, but contagion, from the Latin verb sontingo to come in contact, proceeds from a simple touch; and infection, from the Latin verb inficio or in and facio to put in, proceeds by receiving something inwardly, or having it infused.

Some things act more properly by contagion, others by infection: the more powerful diseases, as the plague or yellow fever, are communicated by contagion; they are therefore denominated contagious; the less virulent disorders, as fevers, consumptions, and the like, are termed infectious, as they are communicated by the less rapid process of infection: the air is contagious or infectious according to the same rule of distinction: when heavily overcharged with noxious vapours and deadly disease, it is justly entitled contagious, but in ordinary cases infectious. In the figurative sense, vice is for the same obvious reason termed contagious; 'If I send my son abroad, it is scarcely possible to keep him from the reigning contagion of rudeness.'—LOCKR Bad principles are denominated infectious;

But we who only do infuse,
The rage in them like bouté-feus,
'T is our example that instils

In them the infection of our ills.—BUTLER

Some young people, who are fortunate enough to shun the contagion of bad society, are, perhaps, caught by the infection of bad principles, acting as a slow poison on the moral constitution.

CONTAGIOUS, EPIDEMICAL, PESTILENTIAL.

Contagious signifies having contagion (v. Contagion); epidemic, in Latin epidemicus, Greek ἐπιδημικός, that is ἐντὶ and δῆμος among the people, signifies universally spread; pestilential, from the Latin pestis the plague, signifies having the plague, or a similar disorder.

The contagious applies to that which is capable of being caught, and ought not, therefore, to be touched; the epidemic to that which is already caught or circulated, and requires, therefore, to be stopped; the pestilential to that which may breed an evil, and is, therefore, to be removed: diseases are contagious or epidemic; the air or breath is pestilential.

They may all be applied morally or figuratively in the same sense.

We endeavour to shun a contagious disorder, that it may not come near us; we endeavour to purify a pestilential air, that it may not be inhaled to our injury; we endeavour to provide against epidemic disorders, that they may not spread any farther.

Vicious example is contagious;

No foreign food the teeming ewes shall fear,
No touch contagious spread its influence here.

WARTON

Certain follies or vices of fashion are epidemic in almost every age; 'Among all the diseases of the mind, there is not one more epidemic or more pernicious than the love of flattery.'—STEELE. The breath of infidelity is pestilential;

Capricious, wanton, bold, and brutal lust
Is meanly selfish; when resisted, cruel;
And like the blast of pestilential winds,
Taints the sweet bloom of nature's fairest forms.

MILTON

BLAMELESS, IRREPROACHABLE, UNBLEMISHED, UNSPOTTED, OR SPOTLESS.

Blameless signifies literally void of blame (v. To blame); irreproachable, that is, not able to be reproached (v. To blame); unblemished, that is, without blemish (v. Blemish); unspotted, that is, without spot (v. Blemish).

Blameless is less than irreproachable; what is blameless is simply free from blame, but that which is irreproachable cannot be blamed, or have any reproach attached to it. It is good to say of a man that he leads a blameless life, but it is a high encomium to say, that he leads an irreproachable life: the former is but the negative praise of one who is known only for his harmlessness; the latter is but positive commendation of a man who is well known for his integrity in the different relations of society;

The sire of Gods, and all th' ethereal train,
On the warm limits of the farthest main,
Now mix with mortals, nor disdain to grace
The feasts of Æthiopia's blameless race.—POPE

Take particular care that your amusements be of an irreproachable kind.'—BLAIR.

Unblemished and unspotted are applicable to many objects, besides that of personal conduct; and when applied to this, their original meaning sufficiently points out their use in distinction from the two former. We may say of a man that he has an irreproachable or an unblemished reputation, and unspotted or spotless purity of life;

But now those white unblemish'd manners, whence
The fabled poets took their golden age,
Are found no more amid these iron times.

THOMSON.

But the good man, whose soul is pure,
Unspotted, regular, and free
From all the ugly stains of lust and villany,
Of mercy and of pardon sure,
Looks through the darkness of the gloomy night,
And sees the dawning of a glorious day.

POMFREY.

Hail, rev'rend priest! To Phœbus' awful dome
A suppliant I from great Atrides come.
Unransom'd here, receive the spotless fair,
Accept the hecatomb the Greeks prepare.—POPE.

TO PRAISE, COMMEND, APPLAUD, EXTOL.

Praise comes from the German preisen to value, and our own word price, signifying to give a value to a thing; commend, in Latin commendo, compounded of com and mando, signifies to commit to the good opinion of others; applaud (v. Applause); extol, in Latin extollo, signifies to lift up very high.

All these terms denote the act of expressing approbation. The praise is the most general and indefinite; it may rise to a high degree, but it generally implies a lower degree: we praise a person generally; we commend him particularly: we praise him for his diligence, sobriety, and the like; we commend him for his performances, or for any particular instance of prudence or good conduct. To applaud is an ardent mode of praising; we applaud a person for his nobleness of spirit: to extol is a reverential mode of praising; we extol a man for his heroic exploits. Praise is confined to no station, though with most propriety bestowed by superiors or equals: commendation is the part of a superior; a parent commends his child for an act of charity: applause is the act of many as well as of one; theatrical performances are the frequent subjects of public applauses: extol is the act of inferiours, who declare thus decidedly their sense of a person's superiority.

In the scale of signification commend stands the lowest, and extol the highest; we praise in stronger terms than we commend: to applaud is to praise in loud terms; to extol is to praise in strong terms;

The servile rout their careful Cæsar praise,
Him they extol; they worship him alone.

DRYDEN.

He who expects praise will not be contented with simple commendation: praise, when sincere, and bestowed by one whom we esteem, is truly gratifying; but it is a dangerous gift for the receiver; happy that man who has no occasion to repent the acceptance of it;

How happy them we find,
Who know by merit to engage mankind,
Prais'd by each each tongue, by ev'ry heart belov'd,
For virtues practis'd, and for arts improv'd.—JENYNS.

Commendation is always sincere, and may be very beneficial by giving encouragement; 'When school-boys write verse, it may indeed suggest an expectation of something better hereafter, but deserves not to be commended for any real merit of their own.'—COWPER. Applause is noisy; it is the sentiment of the multitude, who are continually changing;

While from both benches, with redoubled sounds,
Th' applause of lords and commoners abounds.

DRYDEN.

APPLAUSE, ACCLAMATION, PLAUDIT.

Applause, from the Latin applaudo, signifies literally to clap the hands or stamp the feet to a thing; accla- mation, from acclamo, signifies a crying out to a thing. These two words answer to the plausus and acclamatio of the Romans, which were distinguished from each other in the same manner; but the plausus was an artful way of moving the hands so as to produce an harmonious sound by way of applause, particularly in the theatre;

Datus in theatro,

Cum tibi plausus.—HORACE.

In medio plausa, plausus tunc arte carebat.—OVID
Stantiaque in plausum tota theatra juvent.

PROPERTIUS.

The word plausus was sometimes used in the sense of applause expressed by words; the acclamatio was an expression by the voice only, but it was either a mark of approbation or disapprobation; favourable acclamations were denominated laudationes et bona vota, the unfavourable were exsecrationes et convicia, all which were expressed by a certain prescribed modulation of the voice. Plaudit, or, as it was originally written, plaudite, is the imperative of the verb plaudo, and was addressed by the actors to the spectators at the close of the performance by way of soliciting their applause;

Si plausoris eges aulæa manantis, et usque
Sessuri, donec cantor, vos plaudite, dicat.

HORACE.

Hence the term plaudit denotes a single act of applause, but is now mostly employed figuratively;

True wisdom must our actions so direct

Not only the last plaudit to expect.—DENHAM.

These terms express a public demonstration; the former by means of a noise with the hands or feet; the latter by means of shouts and cries: the former being employed as a testimony of approbation; the latter as a sanction, or an indication of respect. An actor looks for applause; a speaker looks for acclamation.

What a man does calls forth applause, but the person himself is mostly received with acclamations. At the hustings popular speeches meet with applause, and favourite members are greeted with loud acclamations;

Amid the loud applauses of the shore
Gyas outstripp'd the rest and sprung before.

DRYDEN.

'When this illustrious person (the duke of Marlborough) touched on the shore, he was received by the acclamations of the people.'—STEELE.

ENCOMIUM, EULOGY, PANEGYRICK.

Encomium, in Greek ἐγκώμιον, signified a set form of verses, used for the purposes of praise; eulogy, in Greek εὐλογία, from εὖ and λόγος, signifies well spoken, or a good word for any one; panegyrick, in Greek πανηγυρικὸς, from πᾶς the whole, and ἀγορὴς an assembly, signifies that which is spoken before an assembly, a solemn oration.

The idea of praise is common to all these terms: but the first seems more properly applied to the thing, or the unconscious object; the second to the person in general, or to the characters and actions of men in general; the third to the person of some particular individual: thus we bestow encomiums upon any work of art, or production of genius, without reference to the performer; we bestow eulogies on the exploits of a hero, who is of another age or country; but we write panegyrics either in a direct address, or in direct reference to the person who is panegyricized: the encomium is produced by merit, real or supposed; the eulogy may spring from admiration of the person eulogized; the panegyrick may be mere flattery, resulting from servile dependence: great encomiums have been paid by all persons to the constitution of England; 'Our lawyers are, with justice, copious in their encomiums on the common law.'—BLACKSTONE. Our naval and military heroes have received the eulogies of many besides their own countrymen; 'Sallust would say of Cato, "That he had rather be than appear good;" but indeed this eulogium rose no higher than to an inoffensiveness.'—STEELE. Authors of no mean reputation have condescended to deal out their panegyrics pretty freely in dedications to their patrons;

On me, when dunces are satirick,
I take it for a panegyrick.—SWIFT.

LAUDABLE PRAISEWORTHY COM-MENDABLE.

Laudable, from the Latin laudo to praise, is in sense literally praiseworthy, that is, worthy of praise, or to be praised (v. To praise); commendable signifies entitled to commendation.

Laudable is used in a general application; praiseworthy and commendable are applied to individuals; things are laudable in themselves; they are praiseworthy or commendable in this or that person.

That which is laudable is entitled to encouragement and general approbation; an honest endeavour to be useful to one's family or one's self is at all times laudable, and will ensure the support of all good people. What is praiseworthy obtains the respect of all men: as all have temptations to do that which is wrong, the performance of one's duty is in all cases praiseworthy; but particularly so in those cases where it opposes one's interests and interferes with one's pleasures. What is commendable is not equally important with the two former; it entitles a person only to a temporary or partial expression of good will and approbation: the performance of those minor and particular duties which belong to children and subordinate persons is in the proper sense commendable.

It is a laudable ambition to wish to excel in that which is good; 'Nothing is more laudable than an inquiry after truth.'—ADDISON. It is very praiseworthy in a child to assist its parent as occasion may require; 'Ridicule is generally made use of to laugh men out of virtue and good sense by attacking every thing praiseworthy in human life.'—ADDISON. Silence is commendable in a young person when he is reproved; 'Edmund Waller was born to a very fair estate by the parsimony or frugality of a wise father and mother, and he thought it so commendable an advantage that he resolved to improve it with his utmost care.'—CLARENDON.

TO CONTEND, STRIVE, VIE.

Contend, in Latin contendo, compounded of con or contra and tendo to bend one's steps, signifies to exert one's self against any thing; strive, in Dutch streeven, low German streuen, high German streben, is probably a frequentative of the Latin strepo to make a bustle; vie is probably changed from view, signifying to look at with the desire of excelling.

Contending requires two parties; strive either one or two. There is no contending where there is not an opposition; but a person may strive by himself.

Contend and strive differ in the object as well as mode: we contend for a prize; we strive for the mastery; we contend verbally; but we never strive without an actual effort, and labour more or less severe. We may contend with a person at a distance; but striving requires the opponent, when there is one, to be present. Opponents in matters of opinion contend for what they fancy to be the truth; sometimes they contend for trifles;

Mad as the seas and the winds, when both contend
Which is the master.—SHAKESPEARE.

Combatants strive to overcome their adversaries, either by dint of superior skill or strength. In contention the prominent idea is the mutual efforts of two or more persons for the same object; but in striving the prominent idea is the efforts of one to attain an object; hence the terms may sometimes be employed in one and the same connexion, and yet expressing these collateral ideas;

Mad as the winds
When for the empire of the main they strive.
DENNIS.

Contend is frequently used in a figurative sense, in application to things; strive very seldom. We contend with difficulties; and in the spiritual application, we may be said to strive with the spirit.

Vie has more of striving than contending in it; we strive to excel when we vie, but we do not strive with any one; there is no personal collision or opposition: those we vie with may be as ignorant of our persons as our intentions. The term vie is therefore frequently applied to unconscious objects;

Shall a form
Of elemental dross, of mould'ring clay,
Vie with these charms imperial?

MASON (on Truth)

Vying is an act of no moment, but contending and striving are always serious actions: neighbours often vie with each other in the finery and grandeur of their house, dress, and equipage.

COMPETITION, EMULATION, RIVALRY.

Competition, from the Latin competo, compounded of com or con and peto, signifies to sue or seek together, to seek for the same object; emulation, in Latin emulatio, from emulor, and the Greek ἐμύλλα a contest, signifies the spirit of contending; rivalry, from the Latin rivus the bank of a stream, signifies the undivided or common enjoyment of any stream which is the natural source of discord.

Competition expresses the relation of a competitor, or the act of seeking the same object; emulation expresses a disposition of the mind toward particular objects; rivalry expresses both the relation and the disposition of a rival. Emulation is to competition as the motive to the action; emulation produces competitors, but it may exist without it; 'Of the ancients enough remains to excite our emulation and direct our endeavours.'—JOHNSON.

Competition and emulation have the same marks to distinguish them from rivalry. Competition and emulation have honour for their basis; rivalry is but a desire for selfish gratification. A competitor strives to surpass by honest means; he cannot succeed so well by any other; 'It cannot be doubted but there is as great a desire of glory in a ring of wrestlers or cudgel players as in any other more refined competition for superiority.'—HUGHES. A rival is not bound by any principle; he seeks to supplant by whatever means seem to promise success; 'Those, that have been raised by the interest of some great minister, trample upon the steps by which they rise, to rival him in his greatness, and at length step into his place.'—SOUTH. An unfair competitor and a generous rival are equally unusual and inconsistent. Competition animates to exertion; rivalry provokes hatred. * Competition seeks to merit success; rivalry is contented with obtaining it; 'To be no man's rival in love, or competitor in business, is a character which, if it does not recommend you as it ought to benevolence among those whom you live with, yet has it certainly this effect, that you do not stand so much in need of their approbation as if you aimed at more.'—STEELE. Competitors may sometimes become rivals in spirit, although rivals will never become competitors.

It is further to be remarked, that competition supposes some actual effort for the attainment of a specific object set in view: rivalry may consist of a continued wishing for and aiming at the same general end without necessarily comprehending the idea of close action. Competitors are in the same line with each other, rivals may work toward the same point at a great distance from each other. Literary prizes are the objects of competition among scholars; 'The prize of beauty was disputed till you were seen, but now all pretenders have withdrawn their claims; there is no competition but for the second place.'—DRYDEN. The affections of a female are the object of rivals;

Oh, love! thou sternly dost thy power maintain,

And wilt not bear a rival in thy reign,

Tyrants and thou all fellowship disdain.—DRYDEN

William the Conqueror and Harold were competitors for the crown of England; Aeneas and Turnus were rivals for the hand of Lavinia. In the games which were celebrated by Aeneas in honour of his father Anchises, the naval competitors were the most eager in the contest. Juno, Minerva, and Venus, were rival goddesses in their pretensions to beauty.

TO CONTEND, CONTEST, DISPUTE.

To contend signifies generally to strive one against another; to contest, from the Latin contestor, to call one witness against another; and dispute, from disputo

* Vide Abbe Roubaud: "Emulation, rivalité."

to think differently, or maintain a different opinion, are different modes of contending. We may contend for or dispute a prize, but the latter is a higher form of expression, adapted to the style of poetry;

Permit me not to languish out my days,
But make the best exchange of life for praise.
This arm, this lance, can well dispute the prize
DRYDEN.

We cannot contest or dispute without contending, although we may contend without contesting or disputing. To contend is confined to the idea of setting one's self up against another; to contest and dispute must include some object contested or disputed. Contend is applied to all matters, either of personal interest or speculative opinion; contest always to the former; dispute mostly to the latter. We contend with a person, and contest about a thing;

'Tis madness to contend with strength Divine
DRYDEN.

During the present long and eventful contest between England and France, the English have contended with their enemies as successfully by land as by sea. Trifling matters may give rise to contending; serious points only are contested. Contentions are always conducted personally, and in general verbally; contests are carried on in different manners according to the nature of the object. The parties themselves mostly decide contentions; but contested matters mostly depend upon others to decide.

For want of an accommodating temper, men are frequently contending with each other about little points of convenience, advantage, or privilege, which they ought by mutual consent to share, or voluntarily to resign;

Death and nature do contend about them
Whether they live or die.—SHAKESPEARE.

When seats in parliament or other posts of honour are to be obtained by suffrages, rival candidates contest their claims to public approbation; 'As the same causes had nearly the same effects in the different countries of Europe, the several crowns either lost or acquired authority, according to their different success in the contest.'—HUME.

When we assert the right, and support this assertion with reasons, we contend for it;

'T is thus the spring of youth, the morn of life,
Rears in our minds the rival seeds of strife;
Then passion riots, reason then contends,
And on the conquest every bliss depends.

SHENSTONE.

But we do not contest until we take serious measures to obtain what we contend for;

The poor worm
Shall prove her contest vain. Life's little day Shall pass, and she is gone. While I appear Flush'd with the bloom of youth through heav'n's eternal year.—MASON (on Truth).

Contend is to dispute as a part to the whole: two parties dispute conjointly; they contend individually. Each contends for his own opinion, which constitutes the dispute. Theological disputants often contend with more warmth than discretion for their favourite hypothesis; 'The question which our author would contend for, if he did not forget it, is what persons have a right to be obeyed.'—LOCKE. With regard to claims, it is possible to dispute the claim of another without contending for it for ourselves; 'Until any point is determined to be a law, it remains disputable by any subject.'—SWIFT.

CONTENTION, STRIFE.

Though derived from the preceding verbs (v. To contend, strive), have a distinct meaning in which they are analogous. The common idea to them is that of opposing one's self to another with an angry humour.

Contention is mostly occasioned by the desire of seeking one's own. Strife springs from a quarrelsome temper. Greedy and envious people deal in contention, the former because they are fearful lest they should not get enough; the latter because they are fearful lest others should get too much;

With these four more of lesser fame
And humble rank, attendant came;
Hypocrisy with smiling grace,
And Impudence, with brazen face,
Contention bold, with iron lungs,
And Slander, with her hundred tongues.

MOORE

Where bad tempers that are under no control come in frequent collision, perpetual strife will be the consequence; 'A solid and substantial greatness of soul looks down with a generous neglect on the censures and applauses of the multitude, and places a man beyond the little noise and strife of tongues.'—ADDISON.

TO DIFFER, VARY, DISAGREE, DISSENT.

Differ, in Latin différo or dis and fero, signifies to make into two; vary, in Latin vario to make various, from varus a spot or speckle, because that destroys the uniformity in the appearance of things; to disagree is literally not to agree; and dissent, in Latin dissentio or dis and sentio, is to think or feel apart or differently.

Differ, vary, and disagree, are applicable either to persons or things; dissent to persons only. First as to persons; to differ is the most general and indefinite term, the rest are but modes of difference: we may differ from any cause, or in any degree; we vary only in small matters; thus persons may differ or vary in their statements. There must be two at least to differ; and there may be an indefinite number: one may vary, or an indefinite number may vary; two or a specific number disagree: thus two or more may differ in an account which they give; one person may vary at different times in the account which he gives; and two particular individuals disagree: we may differ in matters of fact or speculation; we vary only in matters of fact; we disagree mostly in matters of speculation. Historians may differ in the representation of an affair, and authors may differ in their views of a particular subject; narrators vary in certain circumstances; two particular philosophers disagree in accounting for a phenomenon.

To disagree is the act of one man with another: to dissent is the act of one or more in relation to a community; thus two writers on the same subject may disagree in their conclusions, because they set out from different premises; men dissent from the established religion of their country according to their education and character.

When applied to the ordinary transactions of life, differences may exist merely in opinion, or with a mixture of more or less acrimony and discordant feeling; variances arise from a collision of interests; disagreements from asperity of humour; dissensions from a clashing of opinions; differences may exist between nations, and may be settled by cool discussions; 'The ministers of the different potentates conferred and conferred; but the peace advanced so slowly, that speedier methods were found necessary, and Bolingbroke was sent to Paris to adjust differences with less formality.'—JOHNSON. When variances arise between neighbours, their passions often interfere to prevent accommodations;

How many bleed
By shameful variance betwixt man and man.
THOMSON.

When members of a family consult interest or humour rather than affections, there will be necessarily disagreements; 'On his arrival at Geneva, Goldsmith was recommended as a travelling tutor to a young gentleman who had been unexpectedly left a sum of money by a near relation. This connexion lasted but a short time: they disagreed in the south of France and parted.'—JOHNSON. When many members of a community have an equal liberty to express their opinions, there will necessarily be dissensions;

When Carthage shall contend the world with Rome
Then is your time for faction and debate,
For partial favour and permitted hate:
Let now your immature dissension cease.

DRYDEN.

In regard to things, differ is said of two things with respect to each other; vary of one thing in respect to itself: thus two tempers differ from each other, and a person's temper varies from time to time. Things differ in their essences, they vary in their accidents: thus the genera and species of things differ from each other, and the individuals of each species vary; 'We do not know in what reason and instinct consist, and therefore cannot tell with exactness in what they differ.'—JOHNSON. 'Trade and commerce might doubtless be still varied a thousand ways, out of which would arise such branches as have not been touched.'—JOHNSON. Differ is said of every thing promiscuously, but disagree is only said of such things as might agree; thus two trees differ from each other by the course of things, but two numbers disagree which are intended to agree; 'The several parts of the same animal differ in their qualities.'—ARBUTHNOT.

That mind and body often sympathize
Is plain; such is this union nature ties;
But then as often too they disagree,
Which proves the soul's superiour progeny.

JENYNS.

DIFFERENCE, DISPUTE, ALTERCATION, QUARREL.

The difference is that on which one differs, or the state of differing (v. To differ); the dispute that on which one disputes, or the act of disputing; altercation, in Latin altercatio and alterco, from alterum and cor another mind, signifies expressing another opinion; quarrel, in French querelle, from the Latin queror to complain, signifies having a complaint against another.

All these terms are here taken in the general sense of a difference on some personal question; the term difference is here as general and indefinite as in the former case (v. To differ, vary): a difference, as distinguished from the others, is generally of a less serious and personal kind; a dispute consists not only of angry words, but much ill blood and unkind offices; an altercation is a wordy dispute, in which difference of opinion is drawn out into a multitude of words on all sides; quarrel is the most serious of all differences, which leads to every species of violence: the difference may sometimes arise from a misunderstanding, which may be easily rectified; differences seldom grow to disputes but by the fault of both parties; altercations arise mostly from pertinacious adherence to, and obstinate defence of, one's opinions; quarrels mostly spring from injuries real or supposed: differences subsist between men in an individual or public capacity: they may be carried on in a direct or indirect manner; 'Ought less differences altogether to divide and estrange those from one another, whom such ancient and sacred bands unite?'—BLAIR. Disputes and altercations are mostly conducted in a direct manner between individuals; 'I have often been pleased to hear disputes on the Exchange adjusted between an inhabitant of Japan and an alderman of London.'—ADDISON. 'In the house of Peers the bill passes through the same forms as in the other house, and if rejected no more notice is taken, but it passes sub silencio to prevent unbecoming altercation.'—BLACKSTONE. Quarrels may arise between nations or individuals, and be carried on by acts of offence directly or indirectly;

Unvex'd with quarrels, undisturb'd with noise,
The country king his peaceful realm enjoys.

DRYDEN.

DISSENSION, CONTENTION, DISCORD, STRIFE.

Dissension, contention, and strife, mark the act or state of dissenting, of contending and striving; discord derives its signification from the harshness produced in music by the clashing of two strings which do not suit with each other; whence, in the moral sense, the chords of the mind, which come into an unsuitable collision, produce a discord.

A collision of opinions produces dissension; a collision of interests produces contention; a collision of humours produces discord (v. Contention). A love of one's own opinion, combined with a disregard for the opinions of others, gives rise to dissension; selfishness is the main cause of contention; and an ungoverned temper that of discord.

Dissension is peculiar to bodies or communities of men; contention and discord to individuals. A Christian temper of conformity to the general will of those with whom one is in connexion would do away dissension; 'At the time the poem we are now treating of was written, the dissensions of the barons, who were then so many petty princes, ran very high.'—ADDISON. A limitation of one's desire to that which is attainable by legitimate means would put a stop to contention; 'Because it is apprehended there may be great contention about precedence, the proposer humbly desires the assistance of the learned.'—SWIFT. A correction of one's impatient and irritable humour would check the progress of discord;

But shall celestial discord never cease?

'T is better ended in a lasting peace.—DRYDEN.

Dissension tends not only to alienate the minds of men from each other, but to dissolve the bonds of society; Now join your hands, and with your hands your hearts,
That no dissension hinder government.

SHAKESPEARE.

Contention is accompanied by anger, ill-will, envy, and many evil passions; 'The ancients made contention the principle that reigned in the chaos at first, and then love: the one to express the divisions, and the other the union of all parties in the middle and common bond.'—BURNET. Discord interrupts the progress of the kind affections, and bars all tender intercourse;

See what a scourge is laid upon your hate
That heav'n finds means to kill your joys with love:
And I, for winking at your discords too,
Have lost a brace of kinsmen.—SHAKESPEARE.

Where there is strife, there must be discord; but there may be discord without strife: discord consists most in the feeling; strife consists most in the outward action. Discord evinces itself in various ways; by looks, words, or actions;

Good Heav'n! what dire effects from civil discord flow.—DRYDEN.

Strife displays itself in words or acts of violence.

Let men their days in senseless strife employ,
We in eternal peace and constant joy.—POPE.

Discord is fatal to the happiness of families; strife is the greatest enemy to peace between neighbours: discord arose between the goddesses on the apple being thrown into the assembly; Homer commences his poem with the strife that took place between Agamemnon and Achilles.

Discord may arise from mere difference of opinion; strife is in general occasioned by some matter of personal interest: discord in the councils of a nation is the almost certain forerunner of its ruin; the common principles of politeness forbid strife among persons of good breeding.

QUARREL, BROIL, FEUD, AFFRAY OR FRAY.

Quarrel (v. Difference) is the general and ordinary term; broil, feud, and affray, are particular terms; broil, from bravol, is a noisy quarrel; feud, from the German fehde, and the English fight, is an active quarrel; affray or fray, from the Latin frico to rub, signifying the collision of the passions, is a tumultuous quarrel.

The idea of a variance between two parties is common to these terms; but the former respects the complaints and charges which are reciprocally made; broil respects the confusion and entanglement which arises from a contention and collision of interests; feud respects the hostilities which arise out of the variance. There are quarrels where there are no broils, and there are both where there are no feuds; but there are no broils and feuds without quarrels: the quarrel is not always openly conducted between the parties; it may sometimes be secret, and sometimes manifest itself only in a coolness of behaviour: the broil is a noisy kind of quarrel, it always breaks out in loud, and mostly reproachful language; feud is a deadly kind of quarrel which is heightened by mutual aggravations and insults. Quarrels are very lamentable when they take place between members of the same family; 'The dirk or broad dagger, I am afraid, was of more use in private quarrels than in battles.'—JOHNSON. Broils are very frequent among profligate and restless people who live together;

Ev'n haughty Juno, who with endless broils,
Earth, seas, and heav'n, and Jove himself turmoils,
At length aton'd, her friendly pow'r shall join
To cherish and advance the Trojan line.—DRYDEN.

Feuds were very general in former times between different families of the nobility; 'The poet describes (in the poem of Chevy-Chase) a battle occasioned by the mutual feuds which reigned in the families of an English and Scotch nobleman.'—ADDISON.

A quarrel is indefinite, both as to the cause and the manner in which it is conducted; an affray is a sudden violent kind of quarrel: a quarrel may subsist between two persons from a private difference; an affray always takes place between many upon some public occasion: a quarrel may be carried on merely by words; an affray is commonly conducted by acts of violence: many angry words pass in a quarrel between two hasty people; 'The quarrel between my friends did not run so high as I find your accounts have made it.'—STEELE. Many are wounded, if not killed in affrays, when opposite parties meet; 'The provost of Edinburgh, his son, and several citizens of distinction, were killed in the fray.'—ROBERTSON.

TO JANGLE, JAR, WRANGLE.

A verbal contention is expressed by all these terms, but with various modifications; jangle seems to be an onomatopoeia, for it conveys by its own discordant sound an idea of the discordance which accompanies this kind of war of words; jar and war are in all probability but variations of each other, as also jangle and wrangle. There is in jangling more of cross questions and perverse replies than direct differences of opinion; 'Where the judicatories of the church were near an equality of the men on both sides, there were perpetual janglings on both sides.'—BURNET. Those jangle who are out of humour with each other; there is more of discordant feeling and opposition of opinion in jarring: those who have no good will to each other will be sure to jar when they come in collision; and those who indulge themselves in jarring will soon convert affection into ill will; 'There is no jar or contest between the different gifts of the spirit.'—SOUTH. Married people may destroy the good humour of the company by jangling, but they destroy their domestick peace and felicity by jarring. To wrangle is technically, what to jangle is morally: those who dispute by a verbal opposition only are said to wrangle; and the disputers who engage in this scholastic exercise are termed wranglers; most disputations amount to little more than wrangles;

Peace, factious monster! born to vex the state,
With wrangling talents form'd for foul debate.
POPE.

TO COMBAT, OPOSE.

Combat, from the French combattre to fight together, is used figuratively in the same sense with regard to matters of opinion; oppose, in French opposer, Latin opponere perfect of oppono, compounded of ob and pono to place one's self in the way, signifies to set one's self up against another.

Combat is properly a species of opposing; one always opposes in combating, though not vice versa. To combat is used in regard to speculative matters; oppose in regard to private and personal concerns as well as matters of opinion. A person's positions are combated, his interests or his measures are opposed. The Christian combats the erroneous doctrines of the infidel with no other weapon than that of argument;

When fierce temptation, seconded within
By traitor appetite, and armed with darts
Tempered in hell, invades the throbbing breast,
To combat may be glorious, and success
Perhaps may crown us, but to fly is safe.—COWPER.

The sophist opposes Christianity with ridicule and misrepresentation;

Though various foes against the truth combine,
Pride above all opposes her design.—COWPER.

The most laudable use to which knowledge can be converted is to combat error wherever it presents itself; but there are too many, particularly in the present day, who employ the little pittance of knowledge which they have collected, to no better purpose than to oppose every thing that is good, and excite the same spirit of opposition in others.

COMBATANT, CHAMPION.

Combatant, from to combat, marks any one that engages in a combat; champion, in French champion, Saxon cempe, German kaempe, signifies originally a soldier or fighter, from the Latin campus a field of battle.

A combatant fights for himself and for victory; a champion fights either for another, or in another's cause. The word combatant has always relation to some actual engagement; champion may be employed for one ready to be engaged, or in the habits of being engaged. The combatants in the Olympic games used to contend for a prize; the Roman gladiators were combatants who fought for their lives: when knight-errantry was in fashion there were champions of all descriptions, champions in behalf of distressed females, champions in behalf of the injured and oppressed, or champions in behalf of aggrieved princes.

The mere act of fighting constitutes a combatant; the act of standing up in another's defence at a personal risk, constitutes the champion. Animals have their combats, and consequently are combatants; but they are seldom champions. In the present day there are fewer combatants than champions among men. We have champions for liberty, who are the least honourable and the most questionable members of the community; they mostly contend for a shadow, and court persecution, in order to serve their own purposes of ambition. Champions in the cause of Christianity are not less ennobled by the object for which they contend, than by the disinterestedness of their motives in contending; they must expect in an infidel age, like the present, to be exposed to the derision and contempt of their self-sufficient opponents; 'Conscious that I do not possess the strength, I shall not assume the importance, of a champion, and as I am not of dignity enough to be angry, I shall keep my temper and my distance too, skirmishing like those insignificant gentry, who play the part of teasers in the Spanish bull-fights while bolder combatants engage him at the point of his horns.'—CUMBERLAND.

ENEMY, FOE, ADVERSARY, OPPONENT, ANTAGONIST.

Enemy, in Latin inimicus, compounded of in private, and amicus a friend, signifies one that is unfriendly; foe, in Saxon fah, most probably from the old Teutonic fian to hate, signifies one that bears a hatred; adversary, in Latin adversarius, from adversus against, signifies one that takes part against another; adversarius in Latin was particularly applied to one who contested a point in law with another; opponent, in Latin opponens, participle of oppono or obpono to place in the way, signifies one pitted against another; antagonist, in Greek ἀνταγωνιστος, compounded of ἀντί against, and ἀγωνίζομαι to contend, signifies one struggling against another.

An enemy is not so formidable as a foe; the former may be reconciled, but the latter always retains a deadly hatred. An enemy may be so in spirit, in action, or in relation; a foe is always so in spirit, if not in action likewise: a man may be an enemy to himself, though not a foe. Those who are national or political enemies are often private friends, but a foe is never any thing but a foe. A single act may create an enemy, but continued warfare creates a foe.

Enemies are either public or private, collective or personal; in the latter sense the word enemy is most analogous in signification to that of adversary, opponent, antagonist. * Enemies seek to injure each other commonly from a sentiment of hatred; the heart is always more or less implicated; 'Plutarch says very finely, that a man should not allow himself to hate even his enemies.'—ADDISON. Adversaries set up their claims, and frequently urge their pretensions with angry strife; but interest or contrariety of opinion more than sentiment stimulates to action; 'Those disputants (the persecutors) convince their adversaries with a sorites commonly called a pile of fagots.'—ADDISON. Opponents set up different parties, and ~~are~~ teach other sometimes with acrimony; but their differences do not necessarily include any thing personal; 'The name of Boyle is indeed revered, but his works are neglected; we are contented to know that he conquered his opponents, without inquiring what cavils were produced against him.'—JOHNSON. Antagonists are a species of opponents who are in actual engagement: emulation and direct exertion, but not anger, is concerned in making the antagonist; 'Sir Francis Bacon observes that a well written book, compared with its rivals and antagonists, is like Moses's serpent that immediately swallowed up those of the Egyptians.'—ADDISON. Enemies make war, aim at destruction, and commit acts of personal violence: adversaries are contented with appropriating to themselves some object of desire, or depriving their rival of it; cupidity being the moving principle, and gain the object: opponents oppose each other systematically and perpetually; each aims at being thought right in their disputes: tastes and opinions are commonly the subjects of debate, self-love oftener than a love of truth is the moving principle: antagonists engage in a trial of strength; victory is the end; the love of distinction or superiority the moving principle; the contest may lie either in mental or physical exertion; may aim at superiority in a verbal dispute or in a manual combat. There are nations whose subjects are born enemies to those of a neighbouring nation: nothing evinces the radical corruption of any country more than when the poor man dares not show himself as an adversary to his rich neighbour without fearing to lose more than he might gain: the ambition of some men does not rise higher than that of being the opponent of ministers: Scaliger and Petavius among the French were great antagonists in their day, as were Boyle and Bentley among the English; the Horatii and Curiatii were equally famous antagonists in their way.

Enemy and foe are likewise employed in a figurative sense for moral objects: our passions are our enemies, when indulged; envy is a foe to happiness.

ENMITY, ANIMOSITY, HOSTILITY.

Enmity lies in the heart; it is deep and malignant: animosity, from animus, a spirit, lies in the passions; it is fierce and vindictive: hostility, from hostis a political enemy, lies in the action; it is mischievous and destructive.

Enmity is something permanent; animosity is partial and transitory: in the feudal ages, when the darkness and ignorance of the times prevented the mild influence of Christianity, enmities between particular families were handed down as an inheritance from father to son; in free states, party spirit engenders greater animosities than private disputes.

Enmity is altogether personal: hostility mostly respects public measures, animosity respects either one or many individuals. Enmity often lies concealed in the heart; animosity mostly betrays itself by some open act of hostility. He who cherishes enmity towards another is his own greatest enemy; 'In some instances, indeed, the enmity of others cannot be avoided without a participation in their guilt; but then it is the enmity of those with whom neither wisdom nor virtue can desire to associate.'—JOHNSON. He who is guided by a spirit of animosity is unfit to have any command over others; 'I will never let my heart reproach me with having done any thing towards increasing those animosities that extinguish religion, deface government, and make a nation miserable.'—ADDISON. He who proceeds to wanton hostility often provokes an enemy where he might have a friend; 'Erasmus himself had, it seems, the misfortune to fall into the hands of a party of Trojans who laid on him with so many blows and buffets, that he never forgot their hostilities to his dying day.'—ADDISON.

ADVERSE, CONTRARY, OPPOSITE.

Adverse, in French adverse, Latin adversus, participle of adverso, compounded of ad and verso, signifies turning towards or against; contrary, in French contraire, Latin contraarius, comes from contra against; opposite, in Latin oppositus, participle of oppono, is compounded of ob and pono, signifying placed in the way.

Adverse respects the feelings and interests of persons; contrary regards their plans and purposes; opposite relates to the situation of persons and nature of things;

And as Ægeon, when with heav'n he strove,
Stood opposite in arms to mighty Jove.—DRYDEN.

Fortune is adverse; an event turns out contrary to what was expected; sentiments are opposite to each other. An adverse wind comes across our wishes and pursuits; 'The periodical winds which were then set in were distinctly adverse to the course which Pizarro proposed to steer.'—ROBERTSON. A contrary wind lies in an opposite direction; contrary winds are mostly adverse to some one who is crossing the ocean; adverse winds need not always be directly contrary.

Circumstances are sometimes so adverse as to baffle the best concerted plans. Facts often prove directly contrary to the representations given of them; 'As I should be loth to offer none but instances of the abuse of prosperity, I am happy in recollecting one very singular example of the contrary sort.'—CUMBERLAND. People with opposite characters cannot be expected to act together with pleasure to either party. Adverse events interrupt the peace of mind; contrary accounts invalidate the testimony of a narration; opposite principles interrupt the harmony of society.

COMPARISON, CONTRAST.

Comparison, from compare, and the Latin comparo or com and par equal, signifies the putting together of things that are equal; contrast, in French contraster, Latin contrasto or contra and sto to stand, or sisto to place against, signifies the placing of one thing opposite to another.

Likeness in the quality and difference in the degree are requisite for a comparison; likeness in the degree and opposition in the quality are requisite for a contrast: things of the same colour are compared; those of an opposite colour are contrasted: a comparison is made between two shades of red: a contrast between black and white.

Comparison is of a practical utility, it serves to ascertain the true relation of objects; contrast is of utility among poets, it serves to heighten the effect of opposite qualities: things are large or small by comparison; things are magnified or diminished by contrast: the value of a coin is best learned by comparing it with another of the same metal; 'They who are apt to remind us of their ancestors only put us upon making comparisons to their own disadvantage.'—SPECTATOR.

The generosity of one person is most strongly felt when contrasted with the meanness of another;

In lovely contrast to this glorious view,
Calmly magnificent then will we turn
To where the silver Thames first rural grows.

THOMSON

ADVERSE, INIMICAL, HOSTILE, REPUGNANT

Adverse signifies the same as in the preceding article; inimical, from the Latin inimicus an enemy, signifies belonging to an enemy; which is also the meaning of hostile, from hostis an enemy; repugnant, in Latin repugnans, from repugno, or re and pugno to fight against, signifies warring with.

Adverse may be applied to either persons or things; inimical and hostile to persons or things personal; repugnant to things only: a person is adverse or a thing is adverse to an object; a person, or what is personal, is either inimical or hostile to an object; one thing is repugnant to another. We are adverse to a proposition; or circumstances are adverse to our advancement. Partizans are inimical to the proceedings of government, and hostile to the possessors of power. 'Sla very is repugnant to the mild temper of Christianity

Adverse expresses simple dissent or opposition; inimical either an acrimonious spirit or a tendency to injure; hostile a determined resistance; repugnant a direct relation of variance. Those who are adverse to any undertaking will not be likely to use the endeavours which are essential to ensure its success; 'Only two soldiers were killed on the side of Cortes, and two officers with fifteen privates of the adverse faction.'

ROBERTSON. Those who dissent from the establishment, are inimical to its forms, its discipline, or its doctrine; 'God hath shown himself to be favourable to virtue, and inimical to vice and guilt.'—BLAIR. Many are so hostile to the religious establishment of their country as to aim at its subversion;

Then with a purple veil involve your eyes,
Lest hostile faces blast the sacrifice.—DRYDEN.

The restraints which it imposes on the wandering and licentious imagination is repugnant to the temper of their minds; 'The exorbitant jurisdiction of the (Scottish) ecclesiastical courts were founded on maxims repugnant to justice.'—ROBERTSON.

Sickness is adverse to the improvement of youth. The dissensions in the Christian world are inimical to the interests of religion, and tend to produce many hostile measures. Democracy is inimical to good order, the fomentor of hostile parties, and repugnant to every sound principle of civil society.

ADVERSE, AVERSE.

Adverse (v. Adverse), signifying turned against or over against, denotes simply opposition of situation; averse, from a and versus, signifying turned from or away from, denotes an active removal or separation from. Averse is therefore as applicable to inanimate as to animate objects, averse only to animate objects. When applied to conscious agents adverse refers to matters of opinion and sentiment, averse to those affecting our feelings. We are adverse to that which we think wrong; 'Before you were a tyrant I was your friend, and am now no otherwise your enemy than every Athenian must be who is adverse to your usurpation.'—CUMBERLAND. We are averse to that which opposes our inclinations, our habits, or our interests; 'Men relinquish ancient habits slowly, and with reluctance. They are averse to new experiments, and venture upon them with timidity.'—ROBERTSON. Sectarians profess to be adverse to the doctrines and discipline of the establishment, but the greater part of them are still more averse to the wholesome restraints which it imposes on the imagination.

AVERSE, UNWILLING, BACKWARD, LOATH, RELUCTANT.

Averse signifies the same as in the preceding article; unwilling literally signifies not willing; backward, having the will in a backward direction; loath or loth, from to loath, denotes the quality of loathing; reluctant, from the Latin re and lucto to struggle, signifies struggling with the will against a thing.

Averse is positive; it marks an actual sentiment of dislike; unwilling is negative, it marks the absence of the will; backward is a sentiment between the two, it marks the leaning of a will against a thing; loath and reluctant mark strong feelings of aversion. Aversion is an habitual sentiment; unwillingness and backwardness are mostly occasional; loath and reluctant always occasional.

Aversion must be conquered; unwillingness must be removed; backwardness must be counteracted, or urged forward; loathing and reluctance must be overpowered. One who is averse to study will never have recourse to books; but a child may be unwilling or backward to attend to his lessons from partial motives, which the authority of the parent or master may correct; he who is loath to receive instruction will always remain ignorant; he who is reluctant in doing his duty will always do it as a task.

A miser is averse to nothing so much as to parting with his money;

Of all the race of animals, alone,
The bees have common cities of their own;
But (what's more strange) their modest appetites,
Averse from Venus, fly the nuptial rites.—DRYDEN.

The miser is even unwilling to provide himself with necessities, but he is not backward in disposing of his money when he has the prospect of getting more;

I part with thee,
As wretches that are doubtful of hereafter
Part with their lives, unwilling, loath, and fearful,
And trembling at futurity.—ROWE.

'All men, even the most depraved, are subject more or less to compunctions of conscience; but backward at the same time to resign the gains of dishonesty, or the pleasures of vice.'—BLAIR. Friends are loath to part who have had many years' enjoyment in each other's society;

E'en thus two friends condemn'd
Embrace, and kiss, and take ten thousand leaves,
*Loath*er a hundred times to part than die.

SHAKESPEARE.

One is reluctant in giving unpleasant advice;

From better habitations spurn'd,
Reluctant dost thou rove,
Or grieve for friendship unreturn'd,
Or unregarded love!—GOLDSMITH.

Lazy people are averse to labour: those who are not paid are unwilling to work; and those who are paid less than others are backward in giving their services: every one is loath to give up a favourite pursuit, and when compelled to it by circumstances they do it with reluctance.

AVERSION, ANTIPATHY, DISLIKE, HATRED, REPUGNANCE.

Aversion denotes the quality of being averse (vide Averse); antipathy, in French antipathie, Latin antipathia, Greek ἀντίπαθία, compounded of ἀντί against, and πάθος feeling, signifies a feeling against; dislike compounded of the privative dis and like, signifies not to like or be attached to; hatred, in German hass, is supposed by Adelung to be connected with heiss hot, signifying heat of temper; repugnance, in French repugnance, Latin repugnancia and repugno, compounded of re and pugno, signifies the resistance of the feelings to an object.

Aversion is in its most general sense the generic term to these and many other similar expressions, in which case it is opposed to attachment: the former denoting an alienation of the mind from an object; the latter a knitting or binding of the mind to objects: it has, however, more commonly a partial acceptation, in which it is justly comparable with the above words. Aversion and antipathy apply more properly to things: dislike and hatred to persons; repugnance to actions, that is, such actions as one is called upon to perform.

Aversion and antipathy seem to be less dependent on the will, and to have their origin in the temperament or natural taste, particularly the latter, which springs from causes that are not always visible; and lies in the physical organization. Antipathy is in fact a natural aversion opposed to sympathy: dislike and hatred are on the contrary voluntary, and seem to have their root in the angry passions of the heart; the former is less deep-rooted than the latter, and is commonly awakened by slighter causes; repugnance is not an habitual and lasting sentiment, like the rest; it is a transitory but strong dislike to what one is obliged to do.

An unfitness in the temper to harmonize with an object produces aversion: a contrariety in the nature of particular persons and things occasions antipathies, although some pretend that there are no such mysterious incongruities in nature, and that all antipathies are but aversions early engendered by the influence of fear and the workings of imagination; but under this supposition we are still at a loss to account for those singular effects of fear and imagination in some persons which do not discover themselves in others: a difference in the character, habits, and manners, produces dislike; injuries, quarrels, or more commonly the influence of malignant passions, occasion hatred: a contrariety to one's moral sense, or one's humours, awakens repugnance.

People of a quiet temper have an aversion to disputing or argumentation; those of a gloomy temper have an aversion to society; 'I cannot forbear mentioning a tribe of egotists, for whom I have always had a mortal aversion; I mean the authors of memoirs who are never mentioned in any works but their own.'—ADDISON. Antipathies mostly discover themselves in early life, and as soon as the object comes within the view of the person affected; 'There is one species of terror which those who are unwilling to suffer the reproach of cowardice have wisely dignified with the name of antipathy. A man has indeed no dread of harm from an insect or a worm, but his antipathy turns him pale whenever they approach him.'—JOHNSON. Men of different sentiments in religion or politics, if not of amiable temper, are apt to contract dislikes to each other by frequent irritation in discourse; 'Every man whom business or curiosity has thrown at large into the world, will recollect many instances of fondness and dislike, which have forced themselves upon him without the intervention of his judgement.'—JOHNSON. When men of malignant tempers come in collision, nothing but a deadly hatred can ensue from their repeated and complicated aggressions towards each other; 'One punishment that attends the lying and deceitful person is the hatred of all those whom he either has, or would have deceived. I do not say that a Christian can lawfully hate any one, and yet I affirm that some may very worthily deserve to be hated.'—SOUTH. Any one who is under the influence of a misplaced pride is apt to feel a repugnance to acknowledge himself in an error; 'In this dilemma Aristophanes conquered his repugnance, and determined upon presenting himself on the stage for the first time in his life.'—CUMBERLAND.

Aversions produce an anxious desire for the removal of the object disliked: antipathies produce the most violent physical revulsion of the frame, and vehement recoiling from the object; persons have not unfrequently been known to faint away at the sight of insects for whom this antipathy has been conceived: dislikes too often betray themselves by distant and uncourteous behaviour: hatred assumes every form which is black and horrid: repugnance does not make its appearance until called forth by the necessity of the occasion.

Aversions will never be so strong in a well-regulated mind, that they cannot be overcome when their cause is removed, or they are found to be ill-grounded; sometimes they lie in a vicious temperament formed by nature or habit, in which case they will not easily be destroyed: a slothful man will find a difficulty in overcoming his aversion to labour, or an idle man his aversion to steady application. Antipathies may be indulged or resisted: people of irritable temperaments, particularly females, are liable to them in a most violent degree; but those who are fully persuaded of their fallacy, may do much by the force of conviction to diminish their violence. Dislikes are often groundless, or have their origin in trifles, owing to the influence of caprice or humour: people of sense will be ashamed of them, and the true Christian will stifle them in their birth, lest they grow into the formidable passion of hatred, which strikes at the root of all peace; being a mental poison that infuses its venom into all the sinuosities of the heart, and pollutes the sources of human affection. Repugnance ought always to be resisted whenever it prevents us from doing what either reason, honour, or duty require.

Aversions are applicable to animals as well as men: dogs have a particular aversion to beggars, most probably from their suspicious appearance; in certain cases likewise we may speak of their antipathies, as in the instance of the dog and the cat: according to the schoolmen there existed also antipathies between certain plants and vegetables; but these are not borne out by facts sufficiently strong to warrant a belief of their existence. Dislike and hatred are sometimes applied to things, but in a sense less exceptionable than in the former case: dislike does not express so much as aversion, and aversion not so much as hatred: we ought to have a hatred for vice and sin, an aversion to gossiping and idle talking, and a dislike to the frivolities of fashionable life.

TO HATE, DETEST.

Hate has the same signification as in the preceding article; detest, from detestor or de and testor, signifies to call to witness against. The difference between these two words consists more in sense than application. To hate is a personal feeling directed toward the object independently of its qualities; to detest is a feeling independent of the person, and altogether dependent upon the nature of the thing. What one hates, one detests commonly on one's own account; what one detests, one detests on account of the object: hence it is that one hates, but not detests, the person who has done an injury to one's self; and that one detests, rather than hates, the person who has done injuries to others. Joseph's brethren hated him because he was more beloved than they;

Spleen to mankind his envious heart possess,
And much he hated all, but most the best.—POPE

We detest a traitor to his country because of the enormity of his offence;

Who dares think one thing, and another tell,
My heart detests him as the gates of hell.—POPE.

In this connexion, to hate is always a bad passion; to detest always laudable: but when both are applied to inanimate objects, to hate is bad or good according to circumstances; to detest always retains its good meaning. When men hate things because they interfere with their indulgences, as the wicked hate the light, it is a bad personal feeling, as in the former case, but when good men are said to hate that which is bad, it is a laudable feeling justified by the nature of the object. As this feeling is, however, so closely allied to detestation, it is necessary farther to observe that hate, whether rightly or wrongly applied, seeks the injury or destruction of the object; but detest is confined simply to the shunning of the object, or thinking of it with very great pain. God hates sin, and on that account punishes sinners; conscientious men detest all fraud, and therefore cautiously avoid being concerned in it

HATEFUL, ODISIOUS.

Hateful, signifies literally full of that which is apt to excite hatred; odious, from the Latin odi to hate, has the same sense originally.

These epithets are employed in regard to such objects as produce strong aversion in the mind; but when employed as they commonly are upon familiar subjects, they indicate an unbecoming vehemence in the speaker. The hateful is that which we ourselves hate; but the odious is that which makes us hateful to others. Hateful is properly applied to whatever violates general principles of morality: lying and swearing are hateful vices; odious applied to such things as affect the interests of others, and bring odium upon the individual; a tax that bears particularly hard and unequally is termed odious; or a measure of government that is thought oppressive is denominated odious. There is something particularly hateful in the meanness of cringing sycophants;

Let me be deemed the hateful cause of all,
And suffer, rather than my people fall.—POPE.

Nothing brought more odium on King James than his attempts to introduce popery; 'Projectors and inventors of new taxes being hateful to the people, seldom fail of bringing odium on their master.'—DAVENANT.

HATRED, ENMITY, ILL WILL, RANCOUR.

These terms agree in this particular, that those who are under the influence of such feelings derive a pleasure from the misfortune of others; but hatred, (v. Aversion) expresses more than enmity, (v. Enemy), and this is more than ill will, which signifies merely willing ill or evil to another. Hatred is not contented with merely wishing ill to others, but derives its whole happiness from their misery or destruction; enmity on the contrary is limited in its operations to particular circumstances: hatred, on the other hand, is frequently confined to the feeling of the individual; but enmity consists as much in the action as the feeling. He who is possessed with hatred is happy when the object of his passion is miserable, and is miserable when he is happy; but the hater is not always instrumental in causing his misery or destroying his happiness: he who is inflamed with enmity, is more active in disturbing the peace of his enemy; but oftener displays his temper in trifling than in important matters. Ill will, as the word denotes, lies only in the mind, and is so indefinite in its signification, that it admits of every conceivable degree. When the will is evilly directed towards another, in ever so small a degree, it constitutes ill will. Rancour, in Latin rancor, from rancore to grow stale, signifying staleness, mustiness, is a species of bitter, deep-rooted enmity, that has lain so long in the mind as to become thoroughly corrupt.

Hatred is opposed to love; the object in both cases occupies the thoughts: the former torments the possessor, the latter delights him;

Phœnician Dido rules the growing state,
Who fled from Tyre to shun her brother's hate.
DRYDEN.

Enmity is opposed to friendship; the object in both cases interests the passions: the former the bad, and the latter the good passions or the affections: the possessor is in both cases busy either in injuring or forwarding the cause of him who is his enemy or friend;

That space the evil one abstracted stood
From his own evil, and for the time remain'd
Stupidly good, of enmity disarm'd.—MILTON.

Ill will is opposed to good will; it is either a general or a particular feeling; it embraces many or few, a single individual or the whole human race: he is least unhappy who bears least ill will to others; he is most happy who bears true good will to all; he is neither happy or unhappy who is not possessed of the one or the other; 'For your servants neither use them so familiarly as to lose your reverence at their hands, nor so disdainfully as to purchase yourself their ill will.'—WENTWORTH.

There is a farther distinction between these terms; that hatred and ill will are often the fruit of a depraved mind, than the consequence of any external provocation; enmity and rancour, on the contrary, are mostly produced by particular circumstances of offence or commission; the best of men are sometimes the objects of hatred on account of their very virtues, which have been unwittingly to themselves the causes of producing this evil passion; good advice, however kindly given, may probably occasion ill will in the mind of him who is not disposed to receive it kindly; an angry word or a party contest is frequently the cause of enmity between irritable people, and of rancour between resentful and imperious people;

Oh lasting rancour! oh insatiate hate,
To Phrygia's monarch, and the Phrygian state.
POPE.

TO ABHOR, DETEST, ABOMINATE, LOATH.

These terms equally denote a sentiment of aversion; abhor, in Latin abhorreo, compounded of ab from and horreo to stiffen with horror, signifies to start from, with a strong emotion of horror; detest (v. To hate, detest); abominate, in Latin abominatus, participle of abominor, compounded of ab from or against, and omino to wish ill to, signifies to hold in religious abhorrence, to detest in the highest possible degree; loath, in Saxon lathen, may possibly be a variation of load, in the sense of overload, because it expresses the nausea which commonly attends an overloaded stomach. In the moral acceptance, it is a strong figure of speech to mark the abhorrence and disgust which the sight of offensive objects produces.

What we abhor is repugnant to our moral feelings; what we detest contradicts our moral principle; what we abominate does equal violence to our religious and moral sentiments; what we loath acts upon us physically and mentally.

Inhumanity and cruelty are objects of abhorrence; crimes and injustice of detestation; impiety and profaneness of abomination; enormous offenders of loathing.

The tender mind will abhor what is base and atrocious;

The lie that flatters I abhor the most.—COWPER.

The rigid moralist will detest every violent infringement on the rights of his fellow creatures;

This thirst of kindred blood my sons detest.

DRYDEN.

The conscientious man will abominate every breach of the Divine law; 'The passion that is excited in the fable of the Sick Kite is terror; the object of which is the despair of him who perceives himself to be dying, and has reason to fear that his very prayer is an abomination.'—HAWKSWORTH. The agonized mind loaths the sight of every object which recalls to its recollection the subject of its distress;

No costly lords the sumptuous banquet deal,
To make him loath his vegetable meal.

GOLDSMITH

Revolving in his mind the stern command,
He longs to fly, and loaths the charming land.
DRYDEN.

The chaste Lucretia abhorred the pollution to which she had been exposed, and would have loathed the sight of the atrocious perpetrator: Brutus detested the oppression and the oppressor.

ABOMINABLE, * DETESTABLE, EXECRABLE

The primitive idea of these terms, agreeable to their derivation, is that of badness in the highest degree; conveying by themselves the strongest signification and excluding the necessity for every other modifying epithet.

The abominable thing excites aversion; the detestable thing, hatred and revulsion; the execrable thing indignation and horror.

These sentiments are expressed against what is abominable by strong ejaculations, against what is detestable by animadversion and reprobation, and against what is execrable by imprecations and anathemas.

In the ordinary acceptance of these terms, they serve to mark a degree of excess in a very bad thing; abominable expressing less than detestable, and that less than execrable. This gradation is sufficiently illustrated in the following example. Dionysius, the tyrant, having been informed that a very aged woman prayed to the gods every day for his preservation, and wondering that any of his subjects should be so interested for his safety, inquired of this woman respecting the motives of her conduct, to which she replied, "In my infancy I lived under an abominable prince, whose death I desired; but when he perished, he was succeeded by a detestable tyrant worse than himself. I offered up my vows for his death also, which were in like manner answered; but we have since had a worse tyrant than he. This execrable monster is yourself, whose life I have prayed for, lest, if it be possible, you should be succeeded by one even more wicked."

The exaggeration conveyed by these expressions has given rise to their abuse in vulgar discourse, where they are often employed indifferently to serve the humour of the speaker; 'This abominable endeavour to suppress or lessen every thing that is praiseworthy is as frequent among the men as among the women.'—STEELE. 'Nothing can atone for the want of modesty, without which beauty is ungraceful, and wit detestable.'—STEELE.

All vote to leave that execrable shore,
Polluted with the blood of Polydore.—DRYDEN.

TO BRAVE, DEFY, DARE, CHALLENGE.

Brave, from the epithet brave (v. Brave), signifies to act the brave; defy, in French defier, is probably changed from defaire to undo, signifying to make nothing or set at naught; dare, in Saxon dearran, dyrran, Franconian, &c. odurren, thorren, Greek θάρρειν, signifies to be bold, or have the confidence to do a thing; challenge is probably changed from the Greek καλέω to call.

We brave things; we dare and challenge persons; we defy persons or their actions: the sailor braves the tempestuous ocean, and very often braves death itself in its most terrific form; he dares the enemy whom he meets to the engagement; he defies all his boasts and vain threats.

Brave is sometimes used in a bad sense; defy and dare commonly so. There is much idle contempt and affected indifference in braving; much insolent resistance to authority in defying; much provocation and affront in daring: a bad man braves the scorn and reproach of all the world; he defies the threats of his superiors to punish him; he dares them to exert their power over him.

Brave and defy are dispositions of mind which display themselves in the conduct; dare and challenge are modes of action; we brave a storm by meeting its violence, and bearing it down with superiour force: we defy the malice of our enemies by pursuing that line of conduct which is most calculated to increase its bitter ness. To brave, conveys the idea of a direct and personal application of force to force; defying is carried on by a more indirect and circuitous mode of procedure: men brave the dangers which threaten them with evil, and in a figurative application things are said to brave resistance; 'Joining in proper union the amiable and the estimable qualities, in one part of our character we shall resemble the flower that smiles in spring; in another the firmly-rooted tree, that braves the winter storm.'—BLAIR. Men defy the angry will which opposes them;

* Vide Abbe Roubaud's Synonymes: "Abominable detestable, execrable."

The soul, secur'd in her existence, smiles
At the drawn dagger, and defies its point.—ADDISON.

To dare and challenge are both direct and personal; but the former consists either of actions, words, or looks; the latter of words only. We dare a number of persons indefinitely; we challenge an individual, and very frequently by name.

Daring arises from our contempt of others; challenging arises from a high opinion of ourselves: the former is mostly accompanied with unbecoming expressions of disrespect as well as aggravation; the latter is mostly divested of all angry personality. Metius the Tuscan dared Titus Manlius Torquatus, the son of the Roman consul, to engage with him in contradiction to his father's commands. Paris was persuaded to challenge Menelaus in order to terminate the Grecian war.

We dare only to acts of violence; we challenge to any kind of contest in which the skill or power of the parties are to be tried. It is folly to dare one of superior strength if we are not prepared to meet with the just reward of our impertinence;

Troy sunk in flames I saw (nor could prevent),
And lium from its old foundations rent—
Rent like a mountain ash, which dar'd the winds,
And stood the sturdy strokes of lab'ring winds.
DRYDEN.

Whoever has a confidence in the justice of his cause, needs not fear to challenge his opponent to a trial of their respective merits; 'The Platos and Ciceros among the ancients; the Bacons, Boyles, and Lockes, among our own countrymen, are all instances of what I have been saying, namely, that the greatest persons in all ages have conformed to the established religion of their country; not to mention any of the divines, however celebrated, since our adversaries challenge all those as men who have too much interest in this case to be impartial evidences.'—BURGELL.

BRAVERY, COURAGE, VALOUR, GALLANTRY.

Bravery denotes the abstract quality of brave, which through the medium of the northern languages comes from the Greek βραβειον the reward of victory; courage, in French courage, from cœur, in Latin cor the heart, which is the seat of courage; valour, in French valeur, Latin valor, from valere to be strong, signifies by distinction strength of mind; gallantry, from the Greek γαλλω to adorn or make distinguished for splendid qualities.

Bravery lies in the blood; courage lies in the mind: the latter depends on the reason; the former on the physical temperament: the first is a species of instinct: the second is a virtue: a man is brave in proportion as he is without thought; he has courage in proportion as he reasons or reflects.

Bravery seems to be something involuntary, a mechanical movement that does not depend on one's self; courage requires conviction, and gathers strength by delay; it is a noble and lofty sentiment: the force of example, the charms of music, the fury and tumult of battle, the desperation of the conflict, will make courage brave; the courageous man wants no other incentives than what his own mind suggests.

Bravery is of utility only in the hour of attack or contest; courage is of service at all times and under all circumstances: bravery is of avail in overcoming the obstacle of the moment; courage seeks to avert the distant evil that may possibly arrive. Bravery is a thing of the moment that is or is not, as circumstances may favour; it varies with the time and season: courage exists at all times and on all occasions. The brave man who fearlessly rushes to the mouth of a cannon may tremble at his own shadow as he passes through a churchyard or turn pale at the sight of blood: the courageous man smiles at imaginary dangers, and prepares to meet those that are real.

It is as possible for a man to have courage without bravery, as to have bravery without courage: Cicero betrayed his want of bravery when he sought to shelter himself against the attacks of Cataline; he displayed his courage when he laid open the treasonable purposes of this conspirator to the whole senate, and charged him to his face with the crimes of which he knew him to be guilty.

Valour is a higher quality than either bravery or courage, and seems to partake of the grand characteristics of both; it combines the fire of bravery with the determination and firmness of courage: bravery is most fitted for the soldier and all who receive orders; courage is most adapted for the general and all who give commands; valour for the leader and framer of enterprises, and all who carry great projects into execution: bravery requires to be guided; courage is equally fitted to command or obey; valour directs and executes. Bravery has most relation to danger; courage and valour include in them a particular reference to action: the brave man exposes himself; the courageous man advances to the scene of action which is before him; the valiant man seeks for occasions to act.

Courage may be exercised in ordinary cases; valour displays itself most effectually in the achievement of heroic exploits. A consciousness of duty, a love of one's country, a zeal for the cause in which one is engaged, an over-ruling sense of religion, the dictates of a pure conscience, always inspire courage: an ardent thirst for glory, and an insatiable ambition, render men valiant.

The brave man, when he is wounded, is proud of being so, and boasts of his wounds; the courageous man collects the strength which his wounds have left him, to pursue the object which he has in view; the valiant man thinks less of the life he is about to lose, than of the glory which has escaped him. The brave man, in the hour of victory, exults and triumphs: he discovers his joy in boisterous war shouts. The courageous man forgets his success in order to profit by its advantages. The valiant man is stimulated by success to seek after new trophies. Bravery sinks after a defeat; courage may be damped for a moment, but is never destroyed; it is ever ready to seize the first opportunity which offers to regain the lost advantage: valour, when defeated on any occasion, seeks another in which more glory is to be acquired.

The three hundred Spartans who defended the Straits of Thermopylae were brave;

This brave man, with long resistance,
Held the combat doubtful.—ROWE.

Socrates drinking the hemlock, Regulus returning to Carthage, Titus tearing himself from the arms of the weeping Berenice, Alfred the Great going into the camp of the Danes, were courageous;

"Oh! When I see him arming for his honour,
His country, and his gods, that martial fire
That mounts his courage, kindles even me.
DRYDEN.

Hercules destroying monsters, Perseus delivering Andromeda, Achilles running to the ramparts of Troy, and the knights of more modern date who have gone in quest of extraordinary adventures, are all entitled to the peculiar appellation of valiant;

True valour, friends, on virtue founded strong,
Meets all events alike.—MALLETT.

Gallantry is extraordinary bravery, or bravery on extraordinary occasions. The brave man goes willingly where he is commanded; the gallant man leads on with vigour to the attack. Bravery is common to vast numbers and whole nations; gallantry is peculiar to individuals or particular bodies: the brave man bravely defends the post assigned him; the gallant man volunteers his services in cases of peculiar danger; a man may feel ashamed in not being considered brave; he feels a pride in being looked upon as gallant. To call a hero brave adds little or nothing to his cha racter; 'The brave unfortunate are our best acquaintance.'—FRANCIS. But to entitle him gallant adds a lustre to the glory he has acquired;

Death is the worst; a fate which all must try,
And for our country 't is a bliss to die.
The gallant man, though slain in fight he be,
Yet leaves his nation safe, his children free.

POPE.

We cannot speak of a British tar without thinking of bravery; of his exploits without thinking of gallantry.

COURAGE, FORTITUDE, RESOLUTION.

Courage signifies the same as in the preceding article; fortitude, in French fortitude, Latin fortitudo, is the abstract noun from fortis strong; resolution, from the verb resolve, marks the habit of resolving.

Courage respects action, fortitude respects passion: a man has courage to meet danger, and fortitude to endure pain.

Courage is that power of the mind which bears up against the evil that is in prospect; fortitude is that power which endures the pain that is felt: the man of courage goes with the same coolness to the mouth of the cannon, as the man of fortitude undergoes the amputation of a limb.

Horatius Coclès displayed his courage in defending a bridge against the whole army of the Etruscans: Caius Mucius displayed no less fortitude when he thrust his hand into the fire in the presence of King Porsenna, and awed him as much by his language as his action.

Courage seems to be more of a manly virtue; fortitude is more distinguishable as a feminine virtue: the former is at least most adapted to the male sex, who are called upon to act, and the latter to females, who are obliged to endure; a man without courage would be as ill prepared to discharge his duty in his intercourse with the world, as a woman without fortitude would be to support herself under the complicated trials of body and mind with which she is liable to be assailed.

We can make no pretensions to courage unless we set aside every personal consideration in the conduct we should pursue; 'What can be more honourable than to have courage enough to execute the commands of reason and conscience?'—COLLIER. We cannot boast of fortitude where the sense of pain provokes a murmur or any token of impatience: since life is a chequered scene, in which the prospect of one evil is most commonly succeeded by the actual existence of another, it is a happy endowment to be able to ascend the scaffold with fortitude, or to mount the breach with courage as occasion may require;

With wouted fortitude she bore the smart,

And not a groan confess'd her burning heart.—GAY.

Resolution is a minor species of courage; it is courage in the minor concerns of life: courage comprehends under it a spirit to advance; resolution simply marks the will not to recede: we require courage to bear down all the obstacles which oppose themselves to us; we require resolution not to yield to the first difficulties that offer: courage is an elevated feature in the human character which adorns the possessor; resolution is that common quality of the mind which is in perpetual request; the want of which degrades a man in the eyes of his fellow-creatures. Courage comprehends the absence of all fear, the disregard of all personal convenience, the spirit to begin and the determination to pursue what has been begun; resolution consists of no more than the last quality of courage, which respects the persistence in a conduct; 'The unusual extension of my muscles on this occasion made my face ache to such a degree, that nothing but an invincible resolution and perseverance could have prevented me from falling back to my monosyllables.'—ADDISON. Courage is displayed on the most trying occasions; resolution is never put to any severe test; courage always supposes some danger to be encountered; resolution may be exerted in merely encountering opposition and difficulty: we have need of courage in opposing a formidable enemy; we have need of resolution in the management of a stubborn will.

AUDACITY, EFFRONTERY, HARDHOOD OR HARDINESS, BOLDNESS.

Audacity, from audacious, in French audaceux Latin audax and audeo to dare, signifies literally the quality of daring; effrontery, compounded of ef, en, or in, and frons a face, signifies the standing face to face hardihood or hardiness, from hardy or hard, signifies a capacity to endure or stand the brunt of difficulties opposition, or shame; boldness, from bold, in Saxon bold, is in all probability changed from bald, that is uncovered, open-fronted, without disguise, which are the characteristic of boldness.

The idea of disregarding what others regard is common to all these terms. Audacity expresses more than effrontery: the first has something of vehemence or defiance in it; the latter that of cool unconcern: hardihood expresses less than boldness; the first has more of determination, and the second more of spirit and enterprise. Audacity and effrontery are always taken in a bad sense: hardihood in an indifferent, if not a bad sense; boldness in a good, bad, or indifferent sense.

* Audacity marks haughtiness and temerity; 'As knowledge without justice ought to be called cunning rather than wisdom, so a mind prepared to meet danger, if excited by its own eagerness and not the public good, deserves the name of audacity rather than of fortitude.'—STEELE. Effrontery is the want of all modesty, a total shamelessness; 'I could never forbear to wish that while vice is every day multiplying seducements, and stalking forth with more hardened effrontery, virtue would not withdraw the influence of her presence.'—JOHNSON. Hardihood indicates a firm resolution to meet consequences; 'I do not find any one so hardy at present as to deny that there are very great advantages in the enjoyment of a plentiful fortune.'—BUDGELL. Boldness denotes a spirit to commence action, or in a less favourable sense to be heedless and free in one's speech; 'A bold tongue and a feeble arm are the qualifications of Drances in Virgil.'—ADDISON. An audacious man speaks with a lofty tone, without respect and without reflection; his haughty demeanour makes him forget what is due to his superiors. Effrontery discovers itself by an insolent air; a total unconcern for the opinions of those present, and a disregard of all the forms of civil society. A hardy man speaks with a resolute tone, which seems to brave the utmost evil that can result from what he says. A bold man speaks without reserve, undaunted by the quality, rank, or haughtiness of those whom he addresses;

Bold in the council board,

But cautious in the field, he shunn'd the sword.

DRYDEN.

It requires audacity to assert false claims, or vindicate a lawless conduct in the presence of accusers and judges; it requires effrontery to ask a favour of the man whom one has basely injured, or to assume a placid unconcerned air in the presence of those by whom one has been convicted of flagrant atrocities; it requires hardihood to assert as a positive fact what is dubious or suspected to be false; it requires boldness to maintain the truth in spite of every danger with which one is threatened, or to assert one's claims in the presence of one's superiors.

Audacity makes a man to be hated; but it is not always such a base metal in the estimation of the world as it ought to be; it frequently passes current for boldness when it is practised with success. Effrontery makes a man despised; it is of too mean and vulgar a stamp to meet with general sanction: it is odious to all but those by whom it is practised, as it seems to run counter to every principle and feeling of common honesty. Hardihood is a die on which a man stakes his character for veracity; it serves the purpose of disputants, and frequently brings a man through difficulties which, with more deliberation and caution, might have proved his ruin. Boldness makes a man universally respected though not always beloved: a bold man is a particular favourite with the fair sex, with whom timidity passes for folly, and boldness of course for great talent or a fine spirit.

Audacity is the characteristic of rebels; effrontery

* Vide Girard: "Hardiesse, rudace, effronterie."

that of villains; hardihood is serviceable to gentlemen of the bar; boldness is indispensable in every great undertaking.

DARING, BOLD.

Daring signifies having the spirit to dare; bold has the same signification as given under the head of audacity.

These terms may be both taken in a bad sense; but daring much oftener than bold. In either case daring expresses much more than bold; he who is daring provokes resistance, and courts danger; but the bold man is contented to overcome the resistance that is offered to him. A man may be bold in the use of words only; he must be daring in actions: a man is bold in the defence of truth: Boldness is the power to speak or to do what we intend without fear or disorder.—LOCKE. A man is daring in military enterprise;

Too daring prince! ah! whither dost thou run,
Ah! too forgetful of thy wife and son.—POPE.

STRENUOUS, BOLD.

Strenuous, in Latin strenuus, from the Greek σπρηνς undaunted, untamed, from σπρηναι to be without all rein or control; bold, v. Audacity.

Strenuous expresses much more than bold; boldness is a prominent idea, but it is only one idea which enters into the signification of strenuousness; it combines likewise fearlessness, activity, and ardour. An advocate in a cause may be strenuous, or merely bold: in the former case he cmits nothing that can be either said or done in favour of the cause, he is always on the alert, he heeds no difficulties or danger; but in the latter case he only displays his spirit in the undisguised declaration of his sentiments. Strenuous supporters of any opinion are always strongly convinced of the truth of that which they support, and warmly impressed with a sense of its importance; 'While the good weather continued, I strolled about the country, and made many strenuous attempts to run away from this odious giddiness.'—BEATTIE. But the bold supporter of an opinion may be impelled rather with the desire of showing his boldness than maintaining his point;

Fortune befriends the bold.—DRYDEN.

ARMS, WEAPONS.

Arms, from the Latin arma, is now properly used for instruments of offence, and never otherwise except by a poetick license of arms for armour; but weapons, from the German waffen, may be used either for an instrument of offence or defence. We say fire arms, but not fire weapons; and weapons offensive or defensive, not arms offensive or defensive. Arms likewise, agreeably to its origin, is employed for whatever is intentionally made as an instrument of offence; weapon, according to its extended and indefinite application, is employed for whatever may be accidentally used for this purpose: guns and swords are always arms;

Louder, and yet more loud, I hear th' alarms
Of human cries distinct and clashing arms.

DRYDEN.

Stones, and brickbats, and pitchforks, may be occasionally weapons;

The cry of Talbot serves me for a sword;
For I have loaded me with many spoils,
Using no other weapon than his name.

SHAKESPEARE.

ARMY, HOST.

An army is an organized body of armed men; a host, from hostis an enemy, is properly a body of hostile men.

An army is a limited body; a host may be unlimited, and is therefore generally considered a very large body.

The word army applies only to that which has been formed by the rules of art for purposes of war;

No more applause would on ambition wait
And laying waste the world be counted great
But one goodnatured act more praises gain,
Than armies overthrown and thousands slain

JENYNS.

Host has been extended in its application not only to bodies, whether of men or angels, that were assembled for purposes of offence, but also in the figurative sense to whatever rises up to assail;

He it was whose guile,
Stirr'd up with envy and revenge, deceiv'd
The mother of mankind, what time his pride
Had cast him out of heav'n with all his host
Of rebel angels.—MILTON.

Yet true it is, survey we life around,
Whole hosts of ills on every side are found.

BATTLE, COMBAT, ENGAGEMENT.

Battle, in French bataille, comes from the Latin batus, Hebrew בטע to twist, signifying a beating; combat, from the French combattre, i. e. com or cum together, and battre to beat or fight, signifies literally a battle one with the other; engagement signifies the act of being engaged or occupied in a contest.

* Battle is a general action requiring some preparation: combat is only particular, and sometimes unexpected. Thus the action which took place between the Carthaginians and the Romans, or Cæsar and Pompey, were battles; but the action in which the Horatii and the Curiatii, decided the fate of Rome, as also many of the actions in which Hercules was engaged, were combats. The battle of Alinanza was a decisive action between Philip of France and Charles of Austria, in their contest for the throne of Spain in the combat between Menelaus and Paris, Homer very artfully describes the seasonable interference of Venus to save her favourite from destruction; 'The most curious reason of all (for the wager of battle) is given in the Mirror, that it is allowable upon warrant of the combat between David for the people of Israel of the one party, and Goliath for the Philistines of the other party.'—BLACKSTONE.

The word combat has more relation to the act of fighting than that of battle, which is used with more propriety simply to denominate the action. In the battle between the Romans and Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, the combat was obstinate and bloody; the Romans seven times repulsed the enemy, and were as often repulsed in their turn. In this latter sense engagement and combat are analogous, but the former has a specific relation to the agents and parties engaged, which is not implied in the latter term. We speak of a person being present in an engagement; wounded in an engagement; or having fought desperately in an engagement; on the other hand; to engage in a combat; to challenge to single combat; combats are sometimes begun by the accidental meeting of avowed opponents; in such engagements nothing is thought of but the gratification of revenge.

Battles are fought between armies only; they are gained or lost: combats are entered into between individuals, whether of the brute or human species, in which they seek to destroy or excel: engagements are confined to no particular member, only to such as are engaged: a general engagement is said of an army when the whole body is engaged; partial engagements respect only such as are fought by small parties or companies of an army. History is mostly occupied with the details of battles;

A battle bloody fought,
Where darkness and surprise made conquest cheap.

DRYDEN.

In the history of the Greeks and Romans, we have likewise an account of the combats between men and wild beasts, which formed their principal amusement.

This brave man with long resistance,
Held the combat doubtful.—ROWE.

It is reported of the German women, that whenever their husbands went to battle they used to go into the thickest of the combat to carry them provisions or dress their wounds; and that sometimes they would take part in the engagement; 'The Emperor of Morocco commanded his principal officers, that if he died during the engagement, they should conceal his death from the army.'—ADDISON. The word combat is likewise sometimes taken in a moral application; 'The relation of events becomes a moral lecture, when the combat of honour is rewarded with virtue.'—HAWKESWORTH.

* Girard "Bataille, combat."

CONFLICT, COMBAT, CONTEST.

Conflict, in Latin conflictus, participle of confingo compounded of con and figo, in Greek φλίσω Æolic for φλίσω to flip or strike, signifies to strike against each other. This term is allied to combat and conflict in the sense of striving for the superiority; but they differ both in the manner and spirit of the action.

A conflict has more of violence in it than a combat, and a combat than a contest.

A conflict and combat, in the proper sense, are always attended with a personal attack; contest consists mostly of a striving for some common object.

A conflict is mostly sanguinary and desperate, it arises from the undisciplined operations of the bad passions, animosity, and brutal rage; it seldom ends in any thing but destruction: a combat is often a matter of art and a trial of skill; it may be obstinate and lasting, though not arising from any personal resentment, and mostly terminates with the triumph of one party and the defeat of the other: a contest is interested and personal; it may often give rise to angry and even malignant sentiments, but is not necessarily associated with any bad passion; it ends in the advancement of one to the injury of the other.

The lion, the tiger, and other beasts of the forest, have dreadful conflicts whenever they meet; which seldom terminate but in the death of one if not both of the antagonists: it would be well if the use of the word were confined to the irrational part of the creation; but there have been wars and party-broils among men, which have occasioned conflicts the most horrible and destructive that can be conceived;

It is my father's face,
Whom in this conflict, I unawares have kill'd.
SHAKESPEARE.

That combats have been mere trials of skill is evinced by the combats in the ancient games of the Greeks and Romans, as also in the justs and tournaments of later date; but in all applications of the term, it implies a set engagement between two or more particular individuals;

Elsewhere he saw, where Troilus defied
Achilles, an unequal combat tried.—DRYDEN.

Contests are as various as the pursuits and wishes of men: whatever is an object of desire for two parties becomes the ground of a contest; ambition, interest, and party-zeal are always busy in furnishing men with objects for a contest; on the same ground, the attainment of victory in a battle, or of any subordinate point during an engagement, become the object of contest; 'When the ships grappled together, and the contest became more steady and furious, the example of the King and so many gallant nobles, who accompanied him, animated to such a degree the seamen and soldiers, that they maintained every where a superiority'—HUME.

In a figurative sense these terms are applied to the movements of the mind, the elements or whatever seems to oppose itself to another thing, in which sense they preserve the same analogy: violent passions have their conflicts; ordinary desires their combats; motives their contests: it is the poet's part to describe the conflicts between pride and passion, rage and despair, in the breast of the disappointed lover; 'Happy is the man who in the conflict of desire between God and the world, can oppose not only argument to argument but pleasure to pleasure.'—BLAIR. Reason will seldom come off victorious in its combat with ambition, avarice, a love of pleasure, or any predominant desire, unless aided by religion; 'The noble combat that, 'twixt joy and sorrow, was fought in Paulina! She had one eye declined for the loss of her husband, another elevated that the oracle was fulfilled.'—SHAKESPEARE. Where there is a contest between the desire of following one's will and a sense of propriety, the voice of a prudent friend may be heard and heeded; 'Soon afterward the death of the king furnished a general subject for poetical contest.'—JOHNSON.

TO CONFRONT, FACE.

Confront, from the Latin frons a forehead, implies to set face to face; and face, from the noun face, signifies to set the face towards any object. The former of these terms is always employed for two or more persons with regard to each other; the latter for a single individual with regard to objects in general.

Witnesses are confronted; a person faces danger, or faces an enemy. When people give contrary evidence it is sometimes necessary, in extra-judicial matters, to confront them, in order to arrive at the truth;

Whereto serves mercy,
But to confront the visage of offence?

SHAKESPEARE.

The best test which a man can give of his courage, is to evince his readiness for facing his enemy whenever the occasion requires;

The rev'rend charioteer directs the course,
And strains his aged arm to lash the horse;
Hector they face; unknowing how to fear,
Fierce he drove on.—POPE.

TO BEAT, STRIKE, HIT.

Beat, in French battre, Latin battere, comes from the Hebrew hubat to beat; Strike, in Saxon strican, Danish striker, &c. from the Latin striculum, participle of stringo to brush or sweep along, signifies literally to pass one thing along the surface of another; hit, in Latin ictus, participle of ico, comes from the Hebrew necat to strike.

To beat is to redouble blows; to strike is to give one single blow; but the bare touching in consequence of an effort constitutes hitting. We never beat but with design, nor hit without an aim, but we may strike by accident. It is the part of the strong to beat; of the most vehement to strike; of the most sure sighted to hit.

Notwithstanding the declamations of philosophers as they are pleased to style themselves, the practice of beating cannot altogether be discarded from the military or scholastic discipline. The master who strikes his pupil hastily is oftener impelled by the force of passion than of conviction. Hitting is the object and delight of the marksman; it is the utmost exertion of his skill to hit the exact point at which he aims. In an extended application of these terms, beating is, for the most part, an act of passion, either from anger or sorrow;

Young Sylvia beats her breast, and cries aloud
For succour from the clownish neighbourhood.
DRYDEN.

Striking is an act of decision, as to strike a blow;

Send thy arrows forth
Strike, strike these tyrants and avenge my tears.
CUMBERLAND.

Hitting is an act of design, as to hit a mark; 'No man is thought to become vicious by sacrificing the life of an animal to the pleasure of hitting a mark. It is however certain that by this act more happiness is destroyed than produced.'—HAWKESWORTH.

Blow probably derives the meaning in which it is here taken from the action of the wind, which it resembles when it is violent; stroke, from the word strike, denotes the act of striking.

Blow is used abstractedly to denote the effect of violence; stroke is employed relatively to the person producing that effect. 'A blow may be received by the carelessness of the receiver, or by a pure accident; 'The advance of the human mind towards any object of laudable pursuit may be compared to the progress of a body driven by a blow.'—JOHNSON. Strokes are dealt out according to the design of the giver; 'Penetrated to the heart with the recollection of his behaviour, and the unmerited pardon he had met with, Thrasippus was proceeding to execute vengeance on himself, by rushing on his sword, when Pistratus again interposed, and seizing his hand, stopped the stroke.'—CUMBERLAND. Children are always in the way of getting blows in the course of their play; and of receiving strokes by way of chastisement.

A blow may be given with the hand, or with any flat substance; a stroke is rather a long drawn blow given with a long instrument, like a stick. Blows may be given with the flat part of a sword, and strokes with a stick.

Blow is seldom used but in the proper sense; stroke sometimes figuratively, as a stroke of death, or a stroke of fortune: 'This declaration was a stroke which Evander had neither skill to elude, nor force to resist.'—HAWKSWORTH.

TO BEAT, DEFEAT, OVERPOWER, ROUT, OVERTHROW.

Beat is here figuratively employed in the sense of the former section; defeat, from the French défaire, implies to undo; overpower, to have the power over any one; route, from the French mettre en déroute is to turn from one's route, and overthrow to throw over or upside down.

Beat respects personal contests between individuals or parties; defeat, route, overpower, and overthrow, are employed mostly for contests between numbers. A general is beaten in important engagements: he is defeated and may be routed in partial attacks; he is overpowered by numbers, and overthrown in set engagements. The English pride themselves on beating their enemies by land as well as by sea, whenever they come to fair engagements, but the English are sometimes defeated when they make too desperate attempts, and sometimes they are in danger of being overpowered: they have scarcely ever been routed or overthrown.

To beat is an indefinite term expressive of no particular degree: the being beaten may be attended with greater or less damage. To be defeated is a specific disadvantage, it is a failure in a particular object of more or less importance. To be overpowered is a positive loss; it is a loss of the power of acting which may be of longer or shorter duration: to be routed is a temporary disadvantage; a route alters the route or course of proceeding, but does not disable: to be overthrown is the greatest of all mischiefs, and is applicable only to great armies and great concerns, an overthrow commonly decides the contest;

Beat is a term which reflects more or less dishonour on the general or the army or on both;

Turnus, I know you think me not your friend,
Nor will I much with your belief contend;
I beg your greatness not to give the law
In other realms, but beaten to withdraw.

DRYDEN.

Defeat is an indifferent term; the best generals may sometimes be defeated by circumstances which are above human control; 'Satan frequently confesses the omnipotence of the Supreme Being, that being the perfection he was forced to allow him, and the only consideration which could support his pride under the shame of his defeat.'—ADDISON. Overpowering is coupled with no particular honour to the winner, nor disgrace to the loser; superior power is oftener the result of good fortune than of skill. The bravest and finest troops may be overpowered in cases which exceed human power; 'The veterans who defended the walls, were soon overpowered by numbers.'—ROBERTSON. A route is always disgraceful, particularly to the army; it always arises from want of firmness; 'The route (at the battle of Pavia) now became universal, and resistance ceased in almost every part but where the king was in person.'—ROBERTSON. An overthrow is fatal rather than dishonourable; it excites pity rather than contempt; 'Milton's subject is rebellion against the Supreme Being; raised by the highest order of created beings; the overthrow of their host is the punishment of their crime.'—JOHNSON.

TO DEFEAT, FOIL, DISAPPOINT, FRUSTRATE.

To defeat has the same meaning as given under the article To beat; foil may probably come from fail, and the Latin fallo to deceive, signifying to make to fail; frustrate, in Latin frustratus, from frustra in vain, signifies to make vain; disappoint, from the privative dis and the verb appoint, signifies literally to do away what has been appointed.

Defeat and foil are both applied to matters of enterprise; but that may be defeated which is only planned and that is foiled which is in the act of being executed. What is rejected is defeated: what is aimed at or purposed is frustrated: what is calculated on is disappointed. The best concerted schemes may sometimes be easily defeated: where art is employed against simplicity the latter may be easily foiled: when we aim at what is above our reach, we must be frustrated in our endeavours: when our expectations are extravagant, it seems to follow of course, that they will be disappointed.

Design or accident may tend to defeat, design only to foil, accident only to frustrate or disappoint. The superior force of the enemy, or a combination of untoward events which are above the control of the commander, will serve to defeat the best concerted plans of the best generals; 'The very purposes of wantonness are defeated by a carriage which has so much boldness.'—STEELE. Men of upright minds can seldom foil the deep laid schemes of knaves; 'The devil haunts those most where he hath greatest hopes of success; and 'a too eager and intent upon mischief to employ his time and temptations where he hath been so often foiled.'—TILLOTSON. When we see that the perversity of men is liable to frustrate the kind intentions of others in their behalf, it is wiser to leave them to their folly;

Let all the Tuscans, all th' Arcadians join,
Nor these nor those shall frustrate my design.

DRYDEN.

The cross accidents of human life are a fruitful source of disappointments to those who suffer themselves to be affected by them; 'It seems rational to hope that minds qualified for great attainments should first endeavour their own benefit. But this expectation, however plausible, has been very frequently disappointed.'—JOHNSON.

TO BAFFLE, DEFEAT, DISCONCERT, CONFOUND.

Baffle, in French baffler, from buffle an ox, signifies to lead by the nose as an ox, that is, to amuse or disappoint; defeat, in French défait, participle of défaire, is compounded of the privative de and faire to do, signifying to undo; disconcert is compounded of the privative dis and concert, signifying to throw out of concert or harmony, to put into disorder; confound, in French confondre, is compounded of con and fondre to melt or mix together in general disorder.

When applied to the derangement of the mind or rational faculties, baffle and defeat respect the powers of argument, disconcert and confound the thoughts and feelings: baffle expresses less than defeat; disconcert less than confound; a person is baffled in argument who is for the time discomposed and silenced by the superior address of his opponent: he is defeated in argument if his opponent has altogether the advantage of him in strength of reasoning and justness of sentiment: a person is disconcerted who loses his presence of mind for a moment, or has his feelings any way discomposed; he is confounded when the powers of thought and consciousness become torpid or vanish.

A superior command of language or a particular degree of effrontery will frequently enable one person to baffle another who is advocating the cause of truth: 'When the mind has brought itself to close thinking, it may go on roundly. Every abstruse problem, every intricate question will not baffle, discourage, or break it.'—LOCKE. Ignorance of the subject, or a want of ability, may occasion a man to be defeated by his adversary, even when he is supporting a good cause; 'He that could withstand conscience is frightened at infamy, and shame prevails when reason is defeated.'—JOHNSON. Assurance is requisite to prevent any one from being disconcerted who is suddenly detected in any disgraceful proceeding; 'She looked in the glass while she was speaking to me, and without any confusion adjusted her tucker: she seemed rather pleased than disconcerted at being regarded with earnestness.'—HAWKSWORTH. Hardened effrontery sometimes keeps the daring villain from being confounded by any events, however awful; 'I could not help inquiring of the clerks if they knew this lady, and was greatly founded when they told me with an air of secrecy that she was my cousin's mistress."—HAWKESWORTH.

When applied to the derangement of plans, baffle expresses less than defeat; defeat less than confound; and disconcert less than all. Obstinacy, perseverance, skill, or art, baffles; force or violence defeats; awkward circumstances disconcert; the visitation of God confounds. When wicked men strive to obtain their ends, it is a happy thing when their adversaries have sufficient skill and address to baffle all their arts, and sufficient power to defeat all their projects;

Now shepherds! To your helpless charge be kind,
Baffle the raging year, and fill their pens
With food at will.—THOMSON.

'He finds himself naturally to dread a superiour Being, that can defeat all his designs and disappoint all his hopes.'—TILLOTSON. Sometimes when our best endeavours fail in our own behalf, the devices of men are confounded by the interposition of heaven;

So spake the Son of God; and Satan stood
A while as mute, confounded what to say.
MILTON.

It frequently happens even in the common transactions of life that the best schemes are disconcerted by the trivial casualties of wind and weather; 'The King (William) informed of these dangerous discontents hastened over to England; and by his presence, and the vigorous measures which he pursued, disconcerted all the schemes of the conspirators.'—HUME. The obstinacy of a disorder may baffle the skill of the physician; the imprudence of the patient may defeat the object of his prescriptions: the unexpected arrival of a superiour may disconcert the unauthorized plan of those who are subordinate: the miraculous destruction of his army confounded the project of the King of Assyria.

TO CONQUER, VANQUISH, SUBDUE, OVERCOME, SURMOUNT.

Conquer, in French conquerir, Latin conquiro, compounded of con and quero, signifies to seek or try to gain an object; vanquish, in French vaincre, Latin vinco, Greek (per metathesin) νικάω, comes from the Hebrew נצח to destroy; subdue, from the Latin subdo, signifies to give or put under; overcome, compounded of over and come, signifies to come over or get the mastery over one: surmount, in French surmonter, compounded of sur over and monter to mount, signifies to rise above any one.

Persons or things are conquered or subdued: persons only are vanquished. An enemy or a country is conquered; a foe is vanquished; people are subdued.

We conquer an enemy or a country by whatever means we gain the mastery over him or it. The idea of something gained is most predominant: 'He (Ethelwolf) began his reign with making a partition of his dominions, and delivering over to his eldest son Athelstan, the new conquered provinces of Essex, Kent, and Sussex.'—HUME. We vanquish him, when by force we make him yield; 'A few troops of the vanquished, had still the courage to turn upon their pursuers.'—HUME. We subdue him by whatever means we check in him the spirit of resistance; 'The Danes, surprised to see an army of English, whom they considered as totally subdued, and still more astonished to hear that Alfred was at their head, made but a faint resistance.'—HUME. A Christian tries to conquer his enemies by kindness and generosity; a warrior tries to vanquish them in the field; a prudent monarch tries to subdue his rebellious subjects by a due mixture of clemency and rigour.

One may be vanquished in a single battle; one is subdued only by the most violent and persevering measures. William the First conquered England by vanquishing his rival Harold; after which he completely subdued the English.

Alexander having vanquished all the enemies that opposed him, and subdued all the nations with whom he warred, fancied that he had conquered the whole world, and is said to have wept at the idea that there were no more worlds to conquer.

In an extended and moral application these terms are nearly allied to overcome and surmount. That is conquered and subdued which is in the mind; that is overcome and surmounted which is either internal or external. We conquer and overcome what makes no great resistance; we subdue and surmount what is violent and strong in its opposition; dislikes, attachments, and feelings in general, either for or against, are conquered; unruly and tumultuous passions are to be subdued; a man conquers himself;

Real glory
Springs from the silent conquest of ourselves.

THOMSON.

He subdues his spirit or his passions; 'Socrates and Marcus Aurelius are instances of men, who, by the strength of philosophy having subdued their passions, are celebrated for good husbands.'—SPECTATOR.

One conquers by ordinary means and efforts; one subdues by extraordinary means. Antipathies when cherished in early life are not easily conquered in riper years: nothing but a prevailing sense of religion, and a perpetual fear of God, can ever subdue the rebellious wills and propensities.

It requires for the most part determination and force to overcome; patience and perseverance to surmount. Prejudices and prepossessions are overcome; obstacles and difficulties are surmounted; 'Actuated by some high passion, a man conceives great designs, and surmounts all difficulties in the execution.'—BLAIR. It too frequently happens that those who are eager to overcome their prejudices, in order to dispose themselves for the reception of new opinions, fall into greater errors than those they have abandoned. Nothing truly great has ever been effected where great difficulties have not been encountered: it is the characteristic of genius to surmount every difficulty: Alexander conceived that he could overcome nature herself, and Hannibal succeeded in this very point: there were scarcely any obstacles which she opposed to him that he did not surmount by prowess and perseverance.

Whoever aims at Christian perfection must strive with God's assistance to conquer avarice, pride, and every inordinate propensity; to subdue wrath, anger, lust, and every carnal appetite; to overcome temptations, and to surmount trials and impediments which obstruct his course.

To conquer and overcome may sometimes be indifferently applied to the same objects; but the former has always a reference to the thing gained, the latter to the resistance which is opposed, hence we talk of conquering a prejudice as far as we bring it under the power of the understanding; we overcome it as far as we successfully oppose its influence: this illustration will serve to show the propriety of using these words distinctly in other cases where they cannot be used indifferently;

Equal success hath set these champions high,
And both resolv'd to conquer or to die.—WALLER.

The patient mind by yielding overcomes.—PHILIPS.

To vanquish in the moral application bears the same meaning as in the proper application, signifying to overcome in a struggle or combat; thus a person may be said to be vanquished by any ruling passion which gets the better of his conscience; 'There are two parts in our nature. The inferior part is generally much stronger, and has always the start of reason; which, if it were not aided by religion, would almost universally be vanquished.'—BERKELEY.

TO OVERBEAR, BEAR DOWN, OVERPOWER, OVERWHELM, SUBDUE.

To overbear is to bear one's self over another, that is, to make another bear one's weight;

Crowding on the last the first impel;
Till overborne with weight the Cyprians fell.

DRYDEN.

To bear down is literally to bring down by bearing upon; 'The residue were so disordered as they could not conveniently fight or fly, and not only justled and bore down one another, but in their confused tumbling back, brake a part of the avant-guard.'—HAYWARD. To overpower is to get the power over an object; 'After the death of Crassus, Pompey found himself outwitted by Cæsar; he broke with him, overpowered him in the senate, and caused many unjust decrees to pass against him.'—DRYDEN. To overwhelm, from whelm or wheel, signifies to turn one quite round as well as over.

What age is this, where honest men,
Plac'd at the helm,
A sea of some foul mouth or pen
Shall overwhelm.—JONSON.

To subdue (v. To conquer) is literally to bring or put underneath;

Nothing could have subdued nature
To such a lowness, but his unkind daughters.
SHAKESPEARE.

A man overbears by carrying himself higher than others, and putting to silence those who might claim an equality with him; an overbearing demeanour is most conspicuous in narrow circles where an individual, from certain casual advantages, affects a superiority over the members of the same community. To bear down is an act of greater violence: one bears down opposition; it is properly the opposing force to force, until one side yields: there may be occasions in which bearing down is fully justifiable and laudable. Mr. Pitt was often compelled to bear down a factious party which threatened to overturn the government. Overpower, as the term implies, belongs to the exercise of power which may be either physical or moral: one may be overpowered by another, who in a struggle gets him into his power; or one may be overpowered in an argument, when the argument of one's antagonist is such as to bring one to silence. One is overborne or borne down by the exertion of individuals; one is overpowered by the active efforts of individuals, or by the force of circumstances; one is overwhelmed by circumstances or things only: one is overborne by another of superior influence; one is wrne down by the force of his attack; one is overpowered by numbers, by entreaties, by looks, and the like: one is overwhelmed by the torrent of words, or the impetuosity of the attack. In the moral or extended application overbear and bear down both imply force or violence, but the latter even more than the former. One passion may be said to overbear another, or to overbear reason; 'The duty of fear, like that of other passions, is not to overbear reason, but to assist it.'—JOHNSON. Whatever bears down carries all before it;

Contention like a horse
Full of high feeding, madly hath broken loose,
And bears down all before him.—SHAKESPEARE.

Overpower and overwhelm denote a partial superiority; subdue denotes that which is permanent and positive: we may overpower or overwhelm for a time, or to a certain degree; but to subdue is to get an entire and lasting superiority. Overpower and overwhelm are said of what passes between persons nearly on a level; but subdue is said of those who are, or may be, reduced to a low state of inferiority: individuals or armies are overpowered or overwhelmed; individuals or nations are subdued: we may be overpowered in one engagement, and overpower our opponent in another; we may be overwhelmed by the suddenness and impetuosity of the attack, yet we may recover ourselves so as to renew the attack; but when we are subdued all power of resistance is gone.

To overpower, overwhelm, and subdue, are applied either to the moral feelings or to the external relations of things; but the two former are the effects of external circumstances; the latter follows from the exercise of the reasoning powers: the tender feelings are overpowered, or the senses may be overpowered; 'All colours that are more luminous (than green) overpower and dissipate the animal spirits which are employed in sight.'—ADDISON. The mind is overwhelmed with shame, horror, and other painful feelings; 'How trifling an apprehension is the shame of being laughed at by fools, when compared with that everlasting shame and astonishment which shall overwhelm the sinner when he shall appear before the tribunal of Christ.'—ROGERS.

Such implements of mischief as shall dash
To pieces, and overwhelm whatever stands
Adverse.—MILTON.

The unruly passions are subdued by the force of religious contemplation, or the fortitude is subdued by pain;

For what avails
Valour or strength, though matchless, quell'd with pain,
Which all subdues?—MILTON.

A person may be so overpowered, on seeing a dying friend, as to be unable to speak; he may be so overwhelmed with grief, upon the death of a near and dear relative, as to be unable to attend to his ordinary avocations; the angry passions have been so completely subdued by the influence of religion on the heart, that instances have been known of the most irascible tempers being converted into the most mild and forbearing.

TO SUBJECT, SUBJUGATE, SUBDUE

Subdue, v. To conquer.

To subject, signifying to make subject, is here the generic term: to subjugate, from jugum a yoke, signifying to bring under a yoke: and subdue, signifying as in the preceding article to bring under, are specific terms. We may subject either individuals or nations; but we subjugate only nations. We subject ourselves to reproof, to inconvenience, or to the influence of our passions;

Think not, young warriors, your diminish'd name
Shall lose of lustre, by subjecting rage
To the cool dictates of experienced age.—DRYDEN

Where there is no awe, there will be no subjection.
SOUTH.

One nation subjugates another: subjugate and subdue are both employed with regard to nations that are compelled to submit to the conqueror; but subjugate expresses even more than subdue, for it implies to bring into a state of permanent submission; whereas to subdue may be only a nominal and temporary subjection. Cæsar subjugated the Gauls, for he made them subjects to the Roman empire;

O fav'rite virgin, that hast warm'd the breast
Whose sov'reign dictates subjugate the east.

PRIOR.

Alexander subdued the Indian nations, who revolted after his departure;

Thy son (nor is th' appointed season far),
In Italy shall wage successful war,
Till, after every foe subdu'd, the sun
Thrice through the signs his annual race shall run
DRYDEN

INVINCIBLE, UNCONQUERABLE, INSUPERABLE, INSURMOUNTABLE.

Invincible signifies not to be vanquished (v. To conquer): unconquerable, not to be conquered: insuperable, not to be overcome: insurmountable, not to be surmounted. Persons or things are in the strict sense invincible which can withstand all force, but as in this sense nothing created can be termed invincible, the term is employed to express strongly whatever can withstand human force in general: on this ground the Spaniards termed their Armada invincible; 'The Americans believed at first, that while cherished by the parental beams of the sun, the Spaniards were invincible.'—ROBERTSON. The qualities of the mind are termed unconquerable when they are not to be gained over or brought under the control of one's own reason, or the judgement of another: hence obstinacy is with propriety denominated unconquerable which will yield to no foreign influence: 'The mind of an ungrateful person is unconquerable by that which conquers all things else, even by love itself.'—SOUTH. The particular disposition of the mind or turn of thinking is termed insuperable, inasmuch as it baffles our resolution or wishes to have it altered: an aversion is insuperable which no reasoning or endeavour on our own part can overcome; 'To this literary word (metaphysics) I have an insuperable aversion.'—BEATTIE. Things are denominated insurmountable, inasmuch as they baffle one's skill or efforts to get over them, or put them out of one's way: an obstacle is insurmountable which in the nature of things is irremovable; 'It is a melancholy reflection, that while one is plagued with acquaintance at the corner of every street, real friends should be separated from each other by insurmountable bars.'—GIBSON. Some people have an insuperable antipathy to certain animals; some persons are of so modest and timid a character, that the necessity of addressing strangers is with them an insuperable objection to using any endeavours for their own advance ment; the difficulties which Columbus had to encounter in his discovery of the New World, would have appeared insurmountable to any mind less determined and persevering.

SUBJECT, SUBORDINATE, INFERIOUR, SUBSERVIENT.

Subject, in Latin subjectus, participle of subjicio or sub and jacio to throw under, signifies thrown and cast under; subordinate, compounded of sub and order, signifies to be in an order that is under others; inferiour, in Latin inferior, comparative of inferus low, which probably comes from infero to cast into, because we are cast into places that are low; subservient, compounded of sub and servio, signifies serving under something else.

These terms may either express the relation of persons to persons, or of things to persons and things. Subject in the first case respects the exercise of power; subordinate is said of the station and office; inferiour, either of a man's outward circumstances or of his merits and qualifications; subservient, of one's relative services to another, but mostly in a bad sense. According to the law of nature, a child should be subject to his parents; according to the law of God and man he must be subject to his prince; 'Esau was never subject to Jacob, but founded a distinct people, and government, and was himself prince over them.'—LOCKE. The good order of society cannot be rightly maintained unless there be some to act in a subordinate capacity; 'Whether dark presages of the night proceed from any latent power of the soul, during her abstraction, or from any operation of subordinate spirits, has been a dispute.'—ADDISON. Men of inferiour talent have a part to act which, in the aggregate, is of no less importance than that which is sustained by men of the highest endowments; 'A great person gets more by obliging his inferiour than by disdaining him.'—SOUTH. Men of no principle or character will be most subservient to the base purposes of those who pay them best; 'Wicked spirits may, by their cunning, carry farther in a seeming confederacy or subserviency to the designs of a good angel.'—DRYDEN. It is the part of the prince to protect the subject, and of the subject to love and honour the prince; it is the part of the exalted to treat the subordinate with indulgence; and of the latter to show respect to those under whom they are placed; it is the part of the superior to instruct, assist, and encourage the inferiour; it is the part of the latter to be willing to learn, ready to obey, and prompt to execute. It is not necessary for any one to act the degrading part of being subservient to another.

In the second instance subject preserves the same sense as before, particularly when it expresses the relation of things to persons; subordinate designates the degree of relative importance between things; inferiour designates every circumstance which can render things comparatively higher or lower; subservient designates the relative utility of things under certain circumstances, but seldom in the bad sense. All creatures are subject to man; 'Contemplate the world as subject to the Divine dominion.'—BLAIR. Matters of subordinate consideration ought to be entirely set out of the question, when any grand object is to be obtained; 'The idea of pain in its highest degree is much stronger than the highest degree of pleasure, and preserves the same superiority through all the subordinate gradations.'—BURKE. Things of inferiour value must necessarily sell for an inferiour price; 'I can myself remember the time when in respect of music our reigning taste was in many degrees inferiour to the French.'—SHATTESBURY. There is nothing so insignificant but it may be made subservient to some purpose; 'Though a writer may be wrong himself, he may chance to make his errors subservient to the cause of truth.'—BURKE. The word subject when expressing the relation of things to things has the meaning of liable, as in the following article.

SUBJECT, LIABLE, EXPOSED, OBNOXIOUS.

Subject is here considered as expressing the relation of things to things, in distinction from its signification in the preceding article; liable, compounded of lie and able, signifies ready to lie near or lie under; exposed, in Latin expositus, participle of expono, compounded of ex and pono, signifies set out, set within the view or reach; obnoxious, in Latin obnoxius, compounded of ob and noxia mischief, signifies in the way of mischief.

All these terms are applied to those circumstances in human life by which we are affected independently of our own choice. Direct necessity is included in the term subject; whatever we are obliged to suffer, that we are subject to; we may apply remedies to remove the evil, but often in vain; 'The devout man aspires after some principles of more perfect felicity, which shall not be subject to change or decay.'—BLAIR. Liable conveys more the idea of casualties; we may suffer that which we are liable to, but we may also escape the evil if we are careful; 'The sinner is not only liable to that disappointment of success which so often frustrates all the designs of men, but liable to a disappointment still more cruel, of being successful and miserable at once.'—BLAIR. Exposed conveys the idea of a passive state into which we may be brought, either through our own means or through the instrumentality of others; we are exposed to that which we are not in a condition to keep off from ourselves; it is frequently not in our power to guard against the evil;

On the bare earth expos'd he lies,

With not a friend to close his eyes.—DRYDEN.

Obnoxious conveys the idea of a state into which we have altogether brought ourselves; we may avoid bringing ourselves into the state, but we cannot avoid the consequences which will ensue from being thus involved;

And much he blames the softness of his mind,

Obnoxious to the charms of womankind.—DRYDEN.

We are subject to disease, or subject to death; this is the irrevocable law of our nature: tender people are liable to catch cold; all persons are liable to make mistakes: a person is exposed to insults who provokes the anger of a low-bred man: a minister sometimes renders himself obnoxious to the people, that is, puts himself in the way of their animosity.

To subject and expose, as verbs, are taken in the same sense: a person subjects himself to impertinent freedoms by descending to indecent familiarities with his inferiours; 'If the vessels yield, it subjects the person to all the inconveniences of an erroneous circulation.'—ARBUTHNOT. He exposes himself to the decision of his equals by an affectation of superiority;

Who here

Will envy whom the highest place exposes

Foremost to stand against the Thunderer's aim.

MILTON

OBNOXIOUS, OFFENSIVE.

Obnoxious, from the intensive syllable ob and noxious, signifies exceedingly noxious and causing offence, or else liable to offence from others by reason of its noxiousness; offensive signifies simply liable to give offence. Obnoxious is, therefore, a much more comprehensive term than offensive; for an obnoxious man both suffers from others and causes sufferings to others: an obnoxious man is one whom others seek to exclude; an offensive man may possibly be endured; gross vices, or particularly odious qualities, make a man obnoxious; 'I must have leave to be grateful to any one who serves me, let him be ever so obnoxious to any party.'—POPE. Rude manners and perverse tempers make men offensive; 'The understanding is often drawn by the will and the affections from fixing its contemplation on an offensive truth.'—SOUTH. A man is obnoxious to many, and offensive to individuals: a man of loose Jacobinical principles will be obnoxious to a society of loyalists; a child may make himself offensive to his friends.

TO HUMBLE, HUMILIATE, DEGRADE.

Humble and humiliate signify to make humble or bring low; degrade has the same signification as given under Abase.

Humble is commonly used as the act either of persons or things; a person may humble himself or he may be humbled; humiliate is employed to characterize things; a thing is humiliating or an humiliation. No man humbles himself by the acknowledgement of a fault;

Deep horror seizes ev'ry human breast,
Their pride is humbled, and their fear confess'd.
DRYDEN.

It is a great humiliation for a person to be dependent on another for a living when he has it in his power to obtain it for himself; 'A long habit of humiliation does not seem a very good preparative to manly and vigorous sentiments.'—BURKE. 'To humble is to bring down to the ground; it supposes a certain eminence, either created by the mind, or really existing in the outward circumstances: to degrade is to let down lower; it supposes steps for ascending or descending. He who is most elevated in his own esteem may be most humbled; misfortunes may humble the proudest conqueror;

The mistress of the world, the seat of empire,
The nurse of heroes, the delight of gods,
That humbled the proud tyrants of the earth.

ADDISON.

He who is most elevated in the esteem of others, may be the most degraded; envy is ever on the alert to degrade; 'Who but a tyrant (a name expressive of every thing which can vitiate and degrade human nature), could think of seizing on the property of men unaccused and unheard?'—BURKE. A lesson in the school of adversity is humbling to one who has known nothing but prosperity: terms of peace are humiliating: low vices are peculiarly degrading to a man of rank.

HUMBLE, LOWLY, LOW.

Humble (v. Humble, modest) is here compared with the other terms as it respects both persons and things. A person is said to be humble on account of the state of his mind; he is said to be lowly and low either on account of his mind or his outward circumstances. An humble person is so in his principles and in his conduct; a lowly person is so in the tone of his feelings, or in his station and walk of life; a low person is so either in his sentiments, in his actions, or in his rank and condition.

Humility should form a part of the character, as it is opposed to arrogance and assumption; it is most consistent with the fallibility of our nature;

Sleep is a god too proud to wait in palaces,
And yet so humble too as not to scorn
The meanest country cottages.—COWLEY.

Lowliness should form a part of our temper, as it is opposed to an aspiring and lofty mind; it is most consistent with the temper of our Saviour, who was meek and lowly of mind;

Where purple violets lurk,
With all the lowly children of the shade.

THOMSON.

The humble and lowly are always taken in a good sense; but the low either in a bad or an indifferent sense. A lowly man, whether as it respects his mind or his condition, is so without any moral debasement; but a man who is low in his condition is likewise conceived to be low in his habits and his sentiments, which is being near akin to the vicious. The same distinction is preserved in applying these terms to inanimate or spiritual objects. An humble roof, an humble office, an humble station, are associated with the highest moral worth;

The example of the heavenly lark,
Thy fellow poet, Cowley, mark!
Above the skies let thy proud music sound,
Thy humble nest build upon the ground.

COWLEY.

A low office, a low situation, a low birth seem to exclude the idea of worth;

To be worst,
The lowest, most dejected thing of fortune
Stands still in esperance.—SHAKESPEARE.

HUMBLE, MODEST, SUBMISSIVE.

Humble, in Latin humilis low, comes from humus the ground, which is the lowest position; modest, in Latin modestus, from modus a measure, signifies keeping a measure; submissive, in Latin submissus, partiple of submitto, signifies put under.

These terms designate a temper of mind, the reverse of self-conceit or pride. The humble is so with regard to ourselves or others: modesty is that which respects ourselves only: submissiveness that which respects others. A man is humble from a sense of his comparative inferiority to others in point of station and outward circumstances; or he is humble from a sense of his imperfections, and a consciousness of not being what he ought to be; 'In God's holy house, I prostrate myself in the humblest and decentest way of genuflection I can imagine.'—HOWE. A man is modest in as much as he sets but little value on his qualifications, acquisitions, and endowments;

Of boasting more than of a tomb afraid
A soldier should be modest as a maid.—YOUNG.

Humility is a painful sentiment; for when it respects others it is coupled with fear, when it respects our own unworthiness it is coupled with sorrow: modesty is a peaceful sentiment; it serves to keep the whole mind in due bounds.

When humility and modesty show themselves in the outward conduct, the former bows itself down, the latter shrinks: an humble man gives freely to others from a sense of their desert: a modest man demands nothing for himself, from an unconsciousness of desert in himself; 'Sedition itself is modest in the dawn, and only toleration may be petitioned, where nothing less than empire is designed.'—SOUTH.

Between humble and submissive there is this prominent feature of distinction, that the former marks a temper of mind, the latter a mode of action: the former is therefore often the cause of the latter, but not so always: we may be submissive because we are humble; but we may likewise be submissive from fear, from interested motives, from necessity, from duty, and the like:

And potent Rajahs, who themselves preside
O'er realms of wide extent! But here submissive
Their homage pay; alternate kings and slaves!
SOMERVILLE.

And on the other hand, we may be humble without being submissive, when we are not brought into connexion with others. A man is humble in his closet when he takes a review of his sinfulness: he is submissive to a master whose displeasure he dreads.

As humility may display itself in the outward conduct, it approaches still nearer to submissive in application: hence we say an humble air, and a submissive air; the former to denote a man's sense of his own comparative littleness, the latter to indicate his readiness to submit to the will of another: a man therefore carries his humble air about with him to all his superiors, nay, indeed, to the world at large; but he puts on his submissive air only to the individual who has the power of controlling him. Upon the same principle, if I humbly ask a person's pardon, or humbly solicit any favour, I mean to express a sense of my own unworthiness, compared with the individual addressed: but when a counsellor submissively or with submission addresses a judge on the bench, it implies his willingness to submit to the decision of the bench: or if a person submissively yields to the wishes of another, it is done with an air that bespeaks his readiness to conform his actions to a prescribed rule;

She should be humble, who would please;
And she must suffer, who can love.—PRIOR.

LOW, MEAN ABJECT.

Low (v. Humble) is a much stronger term than mean; for what is low stands more directly opposed to what is high, but what is mean is intermediate: mean, in German gemein, &c. comes from the Latin communis common. The low is applied only to a certain number or description; but mean, like common, is applicable to the great bulk of mankind. A man of low extraction falls below the ordinary level; he is opposed to a nobleman;

Had I been born a servant, my low life
Had steady stood from all these miseries.

RANDOLPH.

A man of mean birth does not rise above the ordinary level; he is upon a level with the majority;

For t is the mind that makes the body rich ;
And as the sun breaks through the darkest clouds,
So honour 'peareth in the meanest habit.

SHAKESPEARE.

When employed to designate character, they preserve the same distinction ; the low is that which is positively sunk in itself ;

Yet sometimes nations will decline so low
From virtue.—MILTON.

But the mean is that which is comparatively low in regard to the outward circumstances and relative condition of the individual. Swearing and drunkenness are low vices ; boxing, cudgelling, and wrestling, are low games ; a misplaced economy in people of property is mean ; a condescension to those who are beneath us, for our own petty advantages, is meanness ; ' We fast not to please men, nor to promote any mean, worldly interest.'—SMALDRIDGE. A man is commonly low by birth, education, or habits ; but meanness is a defect of nature which sinks a person in spite of every external advantage.

The low and mean are qualities whether of the condition or the character : but abject is a peculiar state into which a man is thrown ; a man is in the course of things low ; he is voluntarily mean and involuntarily abject ; the word abject, from the Latin abjicio to cast down, signifying literally brought very low. Lowness discovers itself in one's actions and sentiments ; the mean and abject in one's spirit ; the latter being much more powerful and oppressive than the former : the mean man stoops in order to get : the abject man crawls in order to submit : the lowest man will sometimes have a consciousness of what is due to himself ; he will even rise above his condition ; the mean man sacrifices his dignity to his convenience ; he is always below himself ; the abject man altogether forgets that he has any dignity ; he is kept down by the pressure of adverse circumstances. The condition of a servant is low ; his manners, his words, and his habits, will be low ; but by good conduct he may elevate himself in his sphere of life : a nobleman is in station the reverse of low : but if he will stoop to the artifices practised by the vulgar in order to carry a point, we denominate it mean, if it be but trifling ; otherwise it deserves a stronger epithet. The slave is, in every sense of the word abject ; as he is bereft of that quality which sets man above the brute, so, in his actions, he evinces no higher impulse than what guides brutes : whether a man be a slave to another's will or to any passion, such as fear or superstition, he is equally said to be abject ; ' There needs no more be said to extol the excellence and power of his (Waller's) wit, than that it was of magnitude enough to cover a world of very great faults, that is, a narrowness in his nature to the lowest degree, an abjectness and want of courage, an insinuating and servile flattery,' &c.—CLARENDON.

TO REDUCE, LOWER.

Reduce is to bring down, and lower to make low or lower, which proves the close connexion of these words in their original meaning ; it is, however, only in their improper application that they have any further connexion. Reduce is used in the sense of lessen, when applied to number, quantity, price, &c. : lower is used in the same sense when applied to price, demands, terms, &c. : the former, however, occurs in cases where circumstances as well as persons are concerned ; the latter only in cases where persons act : the price of corn is reduced by means of importation ; a person lowers his price or his demand, when he finds them too high. As a moral quality, the former is much stronger than the latter : a man is said to be reduced to an abject condition ; but to be lowered in the estimation of others, to be reduced to a state of slavery, to be lowered in his own eyes ; ' The regular metres then in use may be reduced, I think, to four.'—TYRWHITT. ' It would be a matter of astonishment to me, that any critic should be found proof against the beauties of Agamemnon so as to lower its author to a comparison with Sophocles or Euripides.'—CUMBERLAND.

BASE, VILE, MEAN.

Base, in French bas low, from the Latin basis the foundation or lowest part, is the most directly opposed to the elevated ; vile, in French vil, Latin vilis, Greek φάλος, worthless, of no account, is literally opposed to the worthy ; mean and middle, from the Latin medius, signify moderate, not elevated, of little value.

Base is a stronger term than vile, and vile than mean. Base marks a high degree of moral turpitude ; vile and mean denote in different degrees the want of all value or esteem. What is base excites our abhorrence, what is vile provokes disgust, what is mean awakens contempt. Base is opposed to magnanimous ; vile to noble ; mean to generous. Ingratitude is base, it does violence to the best affections of our nature ; flattery is vile ; it violates truth in the grossest manner for the lowest purposes of gain ; compliances are mean which are derogatory to the rank or dignity of the individual.

The base character violates the strongest moral obligations ; the vile character blends low and despicable arts with his vices ; the mean character acts inconsistently with his honour or respectability. Depravity of mind dictates base conduct ; lowness of sentiment or disposition leads to vileness ; a selfish temper engenders meanness. The schoolmaster of Faleri was guilty of the basest treachery in surrendering his helpless charge to the enemy ; the Roman general, therefore, with true nobleness of mind treated him as a vile malefactor : sycophants are in the habits of practising every mean artifice to obtain favour.

The more elevated a person's rank, the greater is his baseness who abuses his influence to the injury of those who repose confidence in him ;

Scorns the base earth and crowd below,
And with a soaring wing still mounts on high
CREECH.

The lower the rank of the individual, and the more atrocious his conduct, the viler is his character :

That all the petty kings him envy'd,
And worshipp'd be like him and deify'd,
Or courtly sycophants and caittifs vile.
GILBERT WESLEY

The more respectable the station of the person, and the more extended his wealth, the greater is his meanness when he descends to practices fitted only for his inferiours ; ' There is hardly a spirit upon earth so mean and contracted as to centre all regards on its own interest exclusive of the rest of mankind.'—BERKELEY.

MODEST, BASHFUL, DIFFIDENT.

Modest, in Latin modestus, from modus a measure, signifies setting a measure, and in this case setting a measure to one's estimate of one's self ; bashful signifies ready to be abashed ; diffident, from the Latin diffido to disprive, and fido to trust, signifies literally not trusting, and in this case not trusting to one's self.

Modesty is a habit or principle of the mind ; bashfulness is a state of feeling : modesty is at all times becoming ; bashfulness is only becoming in females, or very young persons, in the presence of their superiours : modesty discovers itself in the absence of every thing assuming, whether in look, word, or action ;

Her face, as in a nymph display'd
A fair fierce boy, or in a boy betray'd
The blushing beauties of a modest maid.
DRYDEN.

Bashfulness betrays itself by a downcast look, and a timid air : a modest deportment is always commendable ; a bashful temper is not desirable ; ' Mere bashfulness, without merit, is awkwardness.'—ADDISON. Modesty does not necessarily discover itself by any external mark ; but bashfulness always shows itself in the manner ; ' A man truly modest is as much so when he is alone as in company.'—BUDGELL.

Modesty is a proper distrust of ourselves ; diffidence is a culpable distrust. Modesty, though opposed to assurance, is not incompatible with a confidence in ourselves ; diffidence altogether unmans a person, and disqualifies him for his duty : a person is generally modest in the display of his talents to others ; but a diffident man cannot turn his talents to their proper use : ' Diffidence and presumption both arise from the want of knowing, or rather endeavouring to know, ourselves.—STEELE.

PASSIVE, SUBMISSIVE.

Passive, in Latin passivus from pator, and the Greek πάσχω to suffer, signifying disposed to suffer, is mostly taken in the bad sense of suffering indignity from another; submissive (v. Humble) is mostly taken in a good sense for submitting to another, or suffering one's self to be directed by another; to be passive therefore is to be submissive to an improper degree.

When men attempt unjustly to enforce obedience from a mere love of rule, it betrays a want of proper spirit to be passive, or to submit quietly to the imposition; 'I know that we are supposed (by the French revolutionists) a dull, sluggish race, rendered passive by finding our situation tolerable.'—BURKE. When men lawfully enforce obedience, it is none but the unruly and self-willed who will not be submissive;

He in delight
Both of her beauty and submissive charms,
Smil'd with superiour love.—MILTON.

PATIENCE, RESIGNATION, ENDURANCE.

Patience applies to any troubles or pains whatever, small or great; resignation is employed only for those of great moment, in which our dearest interests are concerned: patience when compared with resignation is somewhat negative; it consists in the abstaining from all complaint or indication of what one suffers: but resignation consists in a positive sentiment of conformity to the existing circumstances, be they what they may. There are perpetual occurrences which are apt to harass the temper, unless one regards them with patience; 'Though the duty of patience and subjection, where men suffer wrongfully, might possibly be of some force in those times of darkness; yet modern Christianity teaches that then only men are bound to suffer when they are not able to resist.'—SOMER. The misfortunes of some men are of so calamitous a nature, that if they have not acquired the resignation of Christians, they must inevitably sink under them; 'My mother is in that spiritised state of resignation which is the effect of a long life, and the loss of what is dear to us.'—POPE.

Patience applies only to the evils that actually hang over us; but there is a resignation connected with a firm trust in Providence which extends its views to futurity, and prepares us for the worst that may happen.

As patience lies in the manner and temper of suffering, and endurance in the act: we may have endurance and not patience: for we may have much to endure and consequently endurance: but if we do not endure it with an easy mind and without the disturbance of our looks and words, we have not patience: on the other hand we may have patience but not endurance: for our patience may be exercised by momentary trifles, which are not sufficiently great or lasting to constitute endurance;

There was never yet philosopher
That could endure the tooth-ache patiently.
SHAKESPEARE.

PATIENT, PASSIVE.

Patient comes from patiens, the active participle of pator to suffer; passive comes from the passive participle of the same verb; hence the difference between the words: patient signifies suffering from an active principle, a determination to suffer; passive signifies suffered or acted upon for want of power to prevent. The former, therefore, is always taken in an indifferent or good sense; the latter in an indifferent or bad sense. When physically applied patient denotes the act of receiving impressions from external agents; 'Wheat, which is the best sort of grain, of which the purest bread is made, is patient of heat and cold.'—RAY. Passive implies the state of being acted upon by external agents;

High above the ground
Their march was, and the passive air upbore
Their nimble tread.—MILTON.

In the moral application the distinction is the same; but patience is always a virtue, as it signifies the suffering quietly that which cannot be remedied; as there are many such evils incident to our condition, it has been made one of the first Christian duties: passiveness is considered as a weakness, if not a vice; it is the enduring that from others which we ought not to endure

TO SUFFER, BEAR, ENDURE, SUPPORT.

Suffer, in Latin suffero, compounded of sub and fero, signifies bearing up or firm underneath; bear in Saxon baran, old German beran, Latin portare, and He brew בָּרַר to create; endure, in Latin induro, signifies to harden or be hardened; support, from the Latin sub and porto, signifies to carry up or to carry from underneath ourselves, or to receive the weight.

To suffer is a passive and involuntary act; it denotes simply the being a receiver of evil; it is therefore the condition of our being: to bear is positive and voluntary; it denotes the manner in which we receive the evil. 'Man,' says the Psalmist, 'is born to suffering as the sparks fly upwards;' hence the necessity for us to learn to bear all the numerous and diversified evils to which we are obnoxious; 'Let a man be brought into some such severe and trying situation as fixes the attention of the publick on his behaviour. The first question which we put concerning him is not, what does he suffer? but how does he bear it? If we judge him to be composed and firm, resigned to providence, and supported by conscious integrity, his character rises, and his miseries lessen in our view.'—BLAIR.

To bear is a single act of the resolution, and relates only to common ills; we bear disappointments and crosses: to endure is a continued and powerful act of the mind; we endure severe and lasting pains both of body and mind; we endure hunger and cold; we endure provocations and aggravations; it is a making of ourselves, by our own act, insensible to external evils; 'How miserable his state who is condemned to endure at once the pangs of guilt and the vexations of calamity.'—BLAIR. The first object of education should be to accustom children to bear contradictions and crosses, that they may afterward be enabled to endure every trial and misery.

To bear and endure signify to receive becomingly the weight of what befalls ourselves: to support signifies to bear either our own or another's evils; for we may either support ourselves, or be supported by others; but in this latter case we bear from the capacity which is within ourselves: but we support ourselves by foreign aid, that is, by the consolations of religion, the participation and condolence of friends, and the like. 'As the body may be early and gradually trained to bear cold, hunger, and pain, until it is enabled to endure even excruciating agonies: so may the mind be brought, from bearing the roughnesses of others' tempers with equanimity, or the unpleasantnesses which daily occur with patience, to endure the utmost scorn and provocation which human malice can invent: but whatever a person may bear or endure of personal inconvenience, there are sufferings arising from the wounded affections of the heart which by no efforts of our own we shall be enabled to support: in such moments we feel the unspeakable value of religion, which puts us in possession of the means of supporting every sublunary pain;

With inward consolations recompens'd
And oft supported.—MILTON.

The words suffer and endure are said only of persons and personal matters; to bear and support are said also of things, signifying to receive a weight: in this case they differ principally in the degree of weight received. To bear is said of any weight, large or small, and either of the whole or any part of the weight; support is said of a great weight and the whole weight. The beams or the foundation bear the weight of a house; but the pillars upon which it is raised, or against which it leans, support the weight.

OBEDIENT, SUBMISSIVE, OBSEQUIOUS.

Obedient signifies ready to obey, and submissive the disposition to submit; obsequious, in Latin obsequius, from obsequor, or the intensive ob and sequor to follow, signifies following diligently, or with intensity of mind.

One is obedient to the command, submissive to the power or the will, obsequious to the person. Obedience is always taken in a good sense: one ought always to be obedient where obedience is due: submission is relatively good; it may, however, be indifferent or bad; one may be submissive from interested motives, or meanness of spirit, which is a base kind of submission; but to be submissive for conscience sake is the bounden duty of a Christian: obsequiousness is never good; it is an excessive concern about the will of another, which has always interest for its end.

Obedience is a course of conduct conformable either to some specific rule, or the express will of another; submission is often a personal act, immediately directed to the individual. We show our obedience to the law by avoiding the breach of it; we show our obedience to the will of God, or of our parent, by making that will the rule of our life; 'The obedience of men is to imitate the obedience of angels, and rational beings on earth are to live unto God as rational beings in heaven live unto him.'—LAW. On the other hand we show submission to the person of the magistrate; we adopt a submissive deportment by a downcast look and a bent body;

Her at his feet, submissive in distress,
He thus with peaceful words uprais'd.—MILTON.

Obedience is founded upon principle, and cannot be feigned;

In vain thou bidst me to forbear,
Obedience were rebellion here.—COWLEY.

Submission is a partial bending to another, which is easily affected in our outward behaviour;

In all submission and humility,
York doth present himself unto your highness.
SHAKESPEARE.

The understanding and the heart produce the obedience; but force, or the necessity of circumstances, give rise to the submission.

Obedience and submission suppose a restraint on one's own will, in order to bring it into accordance with that of another; but obsequiousness is the consulting the will or pleasure of another: we are obedient from a sense of right;

What gen'rous Greek, obedient to thy word,
Shall form an ambush, or shall lift the sword.
POPE.

We are submissive from a sense of necessity; 'The natives (of Britain) disarmed, dispirited, and submissive, had lost all desire, and even idea, of their former liberty.'—HUME. We are obsequious from a desire of gaining favour; 'Adore not so the rising son, that you forget the father, who raised you to this height; nor be you so obsequious to the father, that you give just cause to the son to suspect that you neglect him.'—BACON. A love of God is followed by obedience to his will; they are coincident sentiments that reciprocally act on each other, so as to serve the cause of virtue: a submissive conduct is at the worst an involuntary sacrifice of our independence to our fears or necessities, the evil of which is confined principally to the individual who makes the sacrifice; but obsequiousness is a voluntary sacrifice of all that is noble in man to base gain, the evil of which extends far and wide; the submissive man, however mean he may be in himself, does not contribute to the vices of others: but the obsequious man has no scope for his paltry talent, but among the weak and wicked, whose weakness he profits by, and whose wickedness he encourages.

DUTIFUL, OBEDIENT, RESPECTFUL.

Dutiful signifies full of a sense of duty, or full of what belongs to duty; obedient, ready to obey; respectful, full of respect.

The obedient and respectful are but modes of the dutiful: we may be dutiful without being either obedient or respectful; but we are so far dutiful as we are either obedient or respectful. Duty denotes what is due from one being to another; it is independent of all circumstances: obedience and respect are relative duties depending upon the character and station of individuals: as we owe to no one on earth so much as to our parents, we are said to be dutiful to no earthly being besides; and in order to deserve the name of dutiful, a child during the period of his childhood, ought to make a parent's will to be his law, and at no future period ought that will ever to be an object of indifference; 'For one cruel parent we meet with a thousand undutiful children.'—ADDISON. We may be obedient and respectful to others besides our parents, although to them obedience and respect are in the highest degree and in the first case due; yet servants are enjoined to be obedient to their masters, wives to their husbands, and subjects to their king; 'The obedience of children to their parents is the basis of all government, and set forth as the measure of that obedience which we owe to those whom Providence has placed over us.'—ADDISON.

Respectful is a term of still greater latitude than either, for as the characters of men as much as their stations demand respect, there is a respectful deportment due towards every superior; 'Let your behaviour towards your superiours in dignity, age, learning, or any distinguished excellence, be full of respect and deference.'—CHATHAM.

DUTY, OBLIGATION.

Duty, as we see in the preceding section, consists altogether of what is right or due from one being to another; obligation, from the Latin obligo to bind, signifies the bond or necessity which lies in the thing.

All duty depends upon moral obligation which subsists between man and man, or between man and his Maker; in this abstract sense, therefore, there can be no duty without a previous obligation, and where there is an obligation it involves a duty; but in the vulgar acceptance, duty is applicable to the conduct of men in their various relations; obligation only to particular circumstances or modes of action: we have duties to perform as parents and children, as husbands and wives, as rulers and subjects, as neighbours and citizens;

The ways of Heav'n, judg'd by a private breast,
Is often what's our private interest,
And therefore those who would that will obey
Without their interest must their duty weigh.

DAVIDEN

The debtor is under an obligation to discharge debt; and he who has promised is under an obligation to fulfil his promise: a conscientious man, therefore, never loses sight of the obligations which he has at different times to discharge; 'No man can be under an obligation to believe any thing, who hath not sufficient means whereby he may be assured that such a thing is true.'—TILLOTSON.

The duty is not so peremptory as the obligation; the obligation is not so lasting as the duty: our affections impel us to the discharge of duty; interest or necessity impels us to the discharge of an obligation: it may therefore sometimes happen that the man whom a sense of duty cannot actuate to do that which is right, will not be able to withstand the obligation under which he has laid himself.

TO COMPLY, CONFORM, YIELD, SUBMIT.

The original meaning of comply and yield will be explained under the head of Accede; conform, compounded of con and form, signifies to put into the same form; submit, in Latin submitto, compounded of sub and mitto, signifies to put under, that is to say, to put one's self under another person.

Compliance and conformity are voluntary; yielding and submission are involuntary.

Compliance is an act of the inclination; conformity an act of the judgement: compliance is altogether optional; we comply with a thing or not at pleasure: conformity is binding on the conscience; it relates to matters in which there is a right and a wrong. Compliance with the fashions and customs of those we live with is a natural propensity of the human mind that may be mostly indulged without impropriety; 'I would not be thought in any part of this relation to reflect upon Signor Niccolini, who in acting this part only complies with the wretched taste of his audience.'—ADDISON. Conformity in religious matters, though not to be enforced by human authority, is not on that account less binding on the consciences of every member in the community; the neglect of this duty on trivial grounds involves in it the violation of more than one branch of the moral law; 'Being of a lay profession, I humbly conform to the constitutions of the church and my spiritual superiours, and I hold this obedience to be an acceptable sacrifice to God.'—HOWEL. Compliances are sometimes culpable, but conformity at least in the exterior, is always a duty; 'The actions to which the world solicits our compliance are sins which forfeit eternal expectations.'

Compliance and conformity are produced by no external action on the mind: they flow spontaneously from the will and understanding; yielding is altogether the result of foreign agency. We comply with a wish as soon as it is known; it accords with our feelings so to do. We yield to the entreaties of others; it is the effect of persuasion, a constraint upon the inclination. We conform to the regulations of a community, it is a matter of discretion; we yield to the superiour judgement or power of another, we have no choice or alternative. We comply cheerfully; we conform willingly; we yield reluctantly.

To yield is to give way to another, either with one's will, one's judgement, or one's outward conduct: submission is the giving up of one's self altogether; it is the substitution of another's will for one's own. Yielding is partial; we may yield in one case or in one action, though not in another: submission is general; it includes a system of conduct.

We yield when we do not resist; this may sometimes be the act of a superiour: we submit only by adopting the measures and conduct proposed to us; this is always the act of an inferior. Yielding may be produced by means more or less gentle, by enticing or insinuating arts, or by the force of argument; submission is made only to power or positive force: one yields after a struggle; one submits without resistance: we yield to ourselves or others; we submit to others only: it is a weakness to yield either to the suggestions of others or our own inclinations to do that which our judgements condemn; it is a folly to submit to the caprice of any one where there is not a moral obligation: it is obstinacy not to yield when one's adversary has the advantage; it is sinful not to submit to constituted authorities; 'There has been a long dispute for precedence between the tragic and the heroic poets. Aristotle would have the latter yield the past to the former, but Mr. Dryden and many others would never submit to this decision.'

—ADDISON.

A cheerful compliance with the request of a friend is the sincerest proof of friendship;

Let the king meet compliance in your looks,
A free and ready yielding to his wishes.—ROWE.

The wisest and most learned of men have ever been the readiest to conform to the general sense of the community in which they live;

Among mankind so few there are
Who will conform to philosophick fãre.—DRYDEN.

The harmony of social life is frequently disturbed by the reluctance which men have to yield to each other; 'That yieldingness, whatever foundations it might lay to the disadvantage of posterity, was a specifick to preserve us in peace for his own time.'—LORD HALIFAX. The order of civil society is frequently destroyed by the want of proper submission to superiours; 'Christian people submit themselves to conformable observances of the lawful and religious constitutions of their spiritual rulers.'—WHITE.

COMPLAINT, YIELDING, SUBMISSIVE.

As epithets from the preceding verbs, serve to designate a propensity to the respective actions mostly in an excessive or improper degree.

A compliant temper complies with every wish of another good or bad,

Be silent and complying; you'll soon find
Sir John without a medicine will be kind.

HARRISON.

A yielding temper leans to every opinion right or wrong; 'A peaceable temper supposes yielding and condescending manners.'—BLAIR. A submissive temper submits to every demand, just or unjust; 'When force and violence and hard necessity have brought the yoke of servitude upon a people's neck, religion will supply them with a patient and submissive spirit.'—FLEETWOOD.

A compliant person wants command of feeling; a yielding person wants fixedness of principle; a submissive person wants resolution: a compliant disposition will be imposed upon by the selfish and unreasonable; a yielding disposition is most unfit for commanding; a submissive disposition exposes a person to the exactions of tyranny.

TO ACCEDE, CONSENT, COMPLY, ACQUIESCE, AGREE.

Accede, in Latin accedo, compounded of ac or ad and cedo to go or come, signifies to come or fall into a thing; consent, in French consentir, Latin consentio, compounded of con together and sentio to feel, signifies to feel in unison with another; comply comes probably from the French complaire, Latin complaceo, signifying to be pleased in unison with another; acquiesce, in French acquiescer, Latin acquiesco, compounded of ac or ad and quiesco, signifies to be easy about or contented with a thing; agree, in French agr  er, is most probably derived from the Latin gruo, in the word congruo, signifying to accord or suit.

We accede to what others propose to us by falling in with their ideas: we *consent to what others wish by authorizing it: we comply with what is asked of us by allowing it, or not hindering it: we acquiesce in what is insisted by accepting it, and conforming to it. we agree to what is proposed by admitting and embracing it.

We object to those things to which we do not accede: we refuse those things to which we do not consent, or with which we will not comply: we oppose those things in which we will not acquiesce: we dispute that to which we will not agree.

To accede is the unconstrained action of an equal; it is a matter of discretion: consent and comply suppose a degree of superiority, at least the power of preventing; they are acts of good nature or civility; acquiesce implies a degree of submission, it is a matter of prudence or necessity: agree indicates an aversion to disputes; it respects the harmony of social intercourse.

Members of any community ought to be willing to accede to what is the general will of their associates, 'At last persuasion, menaces, and the impending pressure of necessity, conquered her virtue, and she acceded to the fraud.'—CUMBERLAND. Parents should never be induced to consent to any thing which may prove injurious to their children;

My poverty, but not my will consents.—SHAKESPEARE

People ought not to comply indiscriminately with what is requested of them; 'Inclination will at length come over to reason, though we can never force reason to comply with inclination.'—ADDISON. In all matters of difference it is a happy circumstance when the parties will acquiesce in the judgement of an umpire; 'This we ought to acquiesce in, that the Sovereign Being, the great Author of Nature, has in him all possible perfection.'—ADDISON. Differences will soon be terminated when there is a willingness to agree; 'We agreed to adopt the infant as the orphan son of a distant relation of our own name.'—CUMBERLAND.

TO AGREE, COINCIDE, CONCUR.

In the former section agree is compared with terms that are employed only for things; in the present case it is compared with words as they are applied to persons only.

Agree implies a general sameness; coincide, from co together and the Latin incido to fall, implies a meeting in a certain point; concur, from con together, and curro to run, implies a running in the same course, an acting together on the same principles.

Agree denotes a state of rest; coincide and concur a state of motion, either towards or with another.

Agreement is either the voluntary or involuntary act of persons in general; coincidence is the voluntary but casual act of individuals, the act of one falling into the opinion of another; concurrence is the intentional positive act of individuals; it is the act of one authorizing the opinions and measures of another.

Men of like education and temperament agree upon most subjects;

Since all agree, who both with judgement read,
'T is the same sun, and does himself succeed.

TATE

People cannot expect others to coincide with them

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Consentir, acquiescer ad herer, tomber d'accord"

when they advance extravagant positions; 'There is not perhaps any couple whose dispositions and relish of life are so perfectly similar as that their wills constantly coincide.'—HAWKSWORTH. The wiser part of mankind are backward in concurring in any schemes which are not warranted by experience; 'The plan being thus concerted, and my cousin's concurrence obtained, it was immediately put in execution.'—HAWKSWORTH.

When coincide and concur are considered in their application to things, the former implies simply meeting at a point, the latter running towards a point; the former seems to exclude the idea of design, the latter that of chance: two sides of different triangles coincide when they are applied to each other so as to fall on the same points; two powers concur when they both act so as to produce the same result.

A coincidence of circumstances is sometimes so striking and singular that it can hardly be attributed to pure accident; 'A coincidence of sentiment may easily happen without any communication, since there are many occasions in which all reasonable men will nearly think alike.'—JOHNSON. A concurrence of circumstances, which seemed all to be formed to combine, is sometimes notwithstanding purely casual; 'Eminence of station, greatness of effect, and all the favours of fortune, must concur to place excellence in public view.'—JOHNSON.

AGREEMENT, CONTRACT, COVENANT, COMPACT, BARGAIN.

Agreement signifies what is agreed to (v. To agree); contract, in French contracte, from the Latin contractus, participle of contraho to bring close together or bind, signifies the thing thus contracted or bound; covenant, in French covenant, Latin conventus, participle of convenio to meet together at a point, signifies the point at which several meet, that is, the thing agreed upon by many; compact, in Latin compactus, participle of compro to bind close, signifies the thing to which people bind themselves close; bargain, from the Welsh bargan to contract or deal for, signifies the act of dealing, or the thing dealt for.

An agreement is general, and applies to transactions of every description, but particularly such as are made between single individuals; in cases where the other terms are not so applicable; a contract is a binding agreement between individuals; a simple agreement may be verbal, but a contract must be written and legally executed: covenant and compact are agreements among communities; the covenant is commonly a national and public transaction; the compact respects individuals as members of a community, or communities with each other: the bargain, in its proper sense, is an agreement solely in matters of trade; but applies figuratively in the same sense to other objects.

The simple consent of parties constitutes an agreement; a seal and signature are requisite for a contract; a solemn engagement on the one hand, and faith in that engagement on the other hand, enter into the nature of a covenant; a tacit sense of mutual obligation in all the parties gives virtue to a compact; an assent to stipulated terms of sale may form a bargain.

Friends make an agreement to meet at a certain time; 'Frog had given his word that he would meet the above-mentioned company at the Salutation, to talk of this agreement.'—ARBUTHNOT (History of John Bull). Two tradesmen enter into a contract to carry on a joint trade; 'It is impossible to see the long scrolls in which every contract is included, with all their appendages of seals and attestations, without wondering at the depravity of those beings, who must be restrained from violation of promise, by such formal and public evidences.'—JOHNSON. The people of England made a covenant with King Charles I. entitled the solemn covenant;

These flashes of blue lightning gave the sign
Of covenants broke; three peals of thunder join.
DRYDEN.

In the society of Freemasons, every individual is bound to secrecy by a solemn compact; 'In the beginnings and first establishment of speech, there was an implicit compact among men, founded upon common use and consent, that such and such words or voices, actions or gestures, should be means or signs whereby they would express or convey their thoughts one to another.'—SOUTH. The trading part of the community are continually striking bargains; 'We see men frequently dexterous and sharp enough in making a bargain, who, if you reason with them about matters of religion, appear perfectly stupid.'—LOCKE.

AGREEABLE, PLEASANT, PLEASING.

The first two of these epithets approach so near in sense and application, that they can with propriety be used indifferently, the one for the other; yet there is an occasional difference which may be clearly defined; the agreeable is that which agrees with or suits the character, temper, and feelings of a person: the pleasant that which pleases; the pleasing that which is adapted to please.

Agreeable expresses a feeling less vivid than pleasant: people of the soberest and gravest character may talk of passing agreeable hours, or enjoying agreeable society, if those hours were passed agreeably to their turn of mind, or that society which suited their taste; 'To divert me, I took up a volume of Shakspeare, where I chanced to cast my eye upon a part in the tragedy of Richard the Third, which filled my mind with an agreeable horror.'—STEELE. The young and the gay will prefer pleasant society, where vivacity and mirth prevail, suitable to the tone of their spirits;

Pleasant the sun
When first on this delightful land he spreads
His orient beams.—MILTON.

A man is agreeable who by a soft and easy address contributes to the amusement of others; a man is pleasant who to this softness adds affability and communicativeness.

Pleasing marks a sentiment less vivid and distinctive than either;

Nor this alone 't' indulge a vain delight,
And make a pleasing prospect for the sight.
DRYDEN

A pleasing voice has something in it which we like; an agreeable voice strikes with positive pleasure upon the ear. A pleasing countenance denotes tranquillity and contentment; it satisfies us when we view it. a pleasant countenance bespeaks happiness; it gratifies the beholder, and invites him to behold.

TO AGREE, ACCORD, SUIT.

Agree (v. To agree) is here used in application to things in which it is allied; to accord, in French accorder, from the Latin chorda the string of a harp, signifies the same as to attune or join in tune; and suit, from the Latin secutus, participle of sequor to follow, signifies to be in a line, in the order as it ought to be.

An agreement between two things requires an entire sameness; an accordance supposes a considerable resemblance; a suitableness implies an aptitude to coalesce.

Opinions agree, feelings accord, and tempers suit.

Two statements agree which are in all respects alike: that accords with our feelings, which produces pleasurable sensations; that suits our taste, which we wish to adopt, or in adopting gives us pleasure.

Where there is no agreement in the essentials of any two accounts, their authenticity may be greatly questioned: if a representation of any thing accords with what has been stated from other quarters, it serves to corroborate: it is advisable that the ages and stations as well as tempers of the parties should be suitable, who look forward for happiness in a matrimonial connexion.

Where there is no agreement of opinion, there can be no assimilation of habit; where there is no accordance of sound, there can be no harmony; where there is no suitableness of temper, there can be no co-operation.

When opinions do not agree, men must agree to differ: the precepts of our Saviour accord with the tenderest as well as the noblest feelings of our nature: when the humours and dispositions of people do not suit, they do wisely not to have any intercourse with each other;

'The laurel and the myrtle sweets agree.—DRYDEN.

'Metre aids and is adapted to the memory; it accords to music, and is the vehicle of enthusiasm.' CUMBERLAND. 'Rollo followed, in the partition of his states, the customs of the feudal law, which was then universally established in the southern countries of Europe, and which suited the peculiar circumstances of the age'—HUME.

CONSONANT, ACCORDANT, CONSISTENT.

Consonant, from the Latin consonans, participle of con and sono to sound together, signifies to sound, or be, in unison or harmony; accordant, from accord (v. To Agree), signifies the quality of according; consistent, from the Latin consistens, participle of consisto, or con and sisto to place together, signifies the quality of being able to stand in unison together.

Consonant is employed in matters of representation; accordant in matters of opinion or sentiment; consistent in matters of conduct. A particular passage is consonant with the whole tenour of the Scriptures; a particular account is accordant with all one hears and sees on a subject; a person's conduct is not always consistent with his station.

The consonance of the whole Scriptures, in the Old and New Testaments, with regard to the character, dignity, and mission of our Blessed Saviour, has justly given birth to that form which constitutes the established religion of England; 'Our faith in the discoveries of the Gospel will receive confirmation from discerning their consonance with the natural sentiments of the human heart.'—BLAIR. The accordance of the prophecies respecting our Saviour with the event of his birth, life, and sufferings, are incontestable evidences of his being the true Messiah; 'The difference of good and evil in actions is not founded on arbitrary opinions or institutions, but in the nature of things, and the nature of man; it accords with the universal sense of the human mind.'—BLAIR. The consistency of a man's practice with his profession is the only criterion of his sincerity;

Keep one consistent plan from end to end.—ADDISON.

Consonant is opposed to dissonant; accordant to discordant; consistent to inconsistent. Consonance is not so positive a thing as either accordance or consistency, which respect real events, circumstances, and actions. Consonance mostly serves to prove the truth of any thing, but dissonance does not prove its falsehood until it amounts to direct discordance or inconsistency. There is a dissonance in the accounts given by the four Evangelists of our Saviour, which serves to prove the absence of all collusion and imposture, since there is neither discordance nor inconsistency in what they have related or omitted.

TO CONCILIATE, RECONCILE.

Conciliate, in Latin conciliatus, participle of concilio; and reconcile, in Latin reconcilio, both come from concilium a council, denoting unity and harmony. Conciliate and reconcile are both employed in the sense of uniting men's affections, but under different circumstances.

The conciliator gets the good will and affections for himself; the reconciler unites the affections of two persons to each other. The conciliator may either gain new affections, or regain those which are lost; the reconciler always renews affections which have been once lost. The best means of conciliating esteem is by reconciling all that are at variance.

Conciliate is mostly employed for men in public stations; 'The preacher may enforce his doctrines in the style of authority, for it is his profession to summon mankind to their duty; but an uncommissioned instructor will study to conciliate while he attempts to correct.'—CUMBERLAND. Reconcile is indifferently employed for those in public or private stations; 'He (Hammond) not only attained his purpose of uniting distant parties to each other, but, contrary to the usual fate of reconcilers, gained them to himself.'—FELL. Men in power have sometimes the happy opportunity of conciliating the good will of those who are most averse to their authority, and thus reconciling them to measures which would otherwise be odious.

Kindness and condescension serve to conciliate; a friendly influence, or a well-timed exercise of authority, is often successfully exerted in reconciling. Conciliate is employed only for persons, or that which is personal; but reconciling is also employed in the sense of bringing a person's thoughts or feelings in unison with the things that he has not liked before, or might be expected not to like: 'It must be confessed a happy attachment, which can reconcile the Laplander to his freezing snows, and the African to his scorching sun.'—CUMBERLAND.

COMPATIBLE, CONSISTENT.

Compatible, compounded of com or cum with, and patior to suffer, signifies a fitness to be suffered together; consistent, in Latin consistens, participle of consisto, compounded of con and sisto, to place, signifies the fitness to be placed together.

Compatibility has a principal reference to plans and measures; consistency to character, conduct, and station. Every thing is compatible with a plan which does not interrupt its prosecution; every thing is consistent with a person's station by which it is neither degraded nor elevated. It is not compatible with the good discipline of a school to allow of foreign interference; 'Whatever is incompatible with the highest dignity of our nature should indeed be excluded from our conversation.'—HAWKESWORTH. It is not consistent with the elevated and dignified character of a clergyman to engage in the ordinary pursuits of other men; 'Truth is always consistent with itself, and needs nothing to help it out.'—TILLOTSON.

INCONSISTENT, INCONGRUOUS, INCOHERENT.

Inconsistent, from sisto to place, marks the unfitness of being placed together; incongruous, from congruo to suit, marks the unsuitableness of one thing to another; incoherent, from hæreo to stick, marks the incapacity of two things to coalesce or be united to each other.

Inconsistency attaches either to the actions or sentiments of men; incongruity attaches to the modes and qualities of things; incoherency to words or thoughts: things are made inconsistent by an act of the will; a man acts or thinks inconsistently, according to his own pleasure; 'Every individual is so unequal to himself that man seems to be the most wavering and inconsistent being in the universe.'—HUGHES. Incongruity depends upon the nature of the things; there is some thing very incongruous in blending the solemn and decent service of the church with the extravagant rant of Methodism; 'The solemn introduction of the Phoenix, in the last scene of Sampson Agonistes, is incongruous to the personage to whom it is ascribed.'—JOHNSON. Incoherence marks the want of coherence in that which ought to follow in a train; extemporary effusions from the pulpit are often distinguished most by their incoherence; 'Be but a person in credit with the multitude, he shall be able to make rambling incoherent stuff pass for high rhetoric.'—SOUTH.

CONFORMABLE, AGREEABLE, SUITABLE.

Conformable signifies able to conform (v. To comply), that is, having a sameness of form; agreeable, the quality of being able to agree (v. To agree); suitable, able to suit (v. To agree).

Conformable is employed for matters of obligation; agreeable for matters of choice; suitable for matters of propriety and discretion: what is conformable accords with some prescribed form or given rule of others; 'A man is glad to gain numbers on his side, as they serve to strengthen him in his opinions. It makes him believe that his principles carry conviction with them, and are the more likely to be true, when he finds they are conformable to the reason of others as well as to his own.'—ADDISON. What is agreeable accords with the feelings, tempers, or judgements of ourselves or others; 'As you have formerly offered some arguments for the soul's immortality, agreeable both to reason and the Christian doctrine I believe your readers will not be displeased to see how the same great truth shines in the pomp of Roman eloquence.'—HUGHES. What is suitable accords with outward circumstances; 'I think banging a cushion gives a man too warlike or perhaps too theatrical a figure to be suitable to a Christian congregation.'—SWIFT. It is the business of those who act for others to act conformably to their directions; it is the part of a friend to act agreeably to the wishes of a friend, it is the part of every man to act suitably to his station.

The decisions of a judge must be strictly conformable to the letter of the law; he is seldom at liberty to consult his views of equity: the decision of a partisan is always agreeable to the temper of his party: the style of a writer should be suitable to his subject.

Conformable is most commonly employed for matters of temporary moment; agreeable and suitable are mostly said of things which are of constant value: we make things conformable by an act of discretion; they are agreeable or suitable by their own nature: a treaty of peace is made conformable to the preliminaries; a legislator must take care to frame laws agreeably to the Divine law; it is of no small importance for every man to act suitably to the character he has assumed.

TO FIT, SUIT, ADAPT, ACCOMMODATE, ADJUST.

Fit signifies to make or be fit; suit to make or be suitable; adapt, from aptus fit, to make fit for a specific purpose; accommodate, to make commodious; adjust, to make a thing such as it is desired to be.

To fit and suit are used in the literal sense of applying things to each other as they are intended: but fit is employed mostly in regard to material and familiar objects. A tailor fits on a coat, or a coat fits when it is made right to the body;

Then meditates the mark; and couching low,
Fits the sharp arrow to the well-strung bow.—POPE.

Suit is employed for intellectual or moral objects; 'Suit the action to the word, the word to the action, with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty of nature.'—SHAKESPEARE. So also intransitively;

Ill suits it now the joys of love to know,
Too deep my anguish, and too wild my woe.—POPE.

In an extended application of the terms to fit is intransitively used for what is morally fit in the nature of things;

Nor fits it to prolong the feast
Timeless, indecent, but retire to rest.—POPE.

Whence we speak of the fitness of things; suit is applied either transitively or intransitively in the sense of agree, as a thing suits a person's taste, or one thing suits with another; 'The matter and manner of their tales, and of their telling, are so *suit*ed to their different educations and humours, that each would be improper in any other.'—DRYDEN.

Her purple habit sits with such a grace
On her smooth shoulders, and so suits her face.
DRYDEN.

The one intense, the other still remiss,
Cannot well suit with either, but soon prove Tedious alike.—MILTON.

To adapt is a species of fitting; to accommodate is a species of suiting; both applied to the intellectual and moral actions of conscious beings. Adaptation is an act of the judgement; accommodation is an act of the will: we adapt by an exercise of discretion; we accommodate by a management of the humours: the adaptation does not interfere with our interests; but the accommodation always supposes a sacrifice: we adapt our language to the understandings of our hearers; 'It is not enough that nothing offends the ear, but a good poet will adapt the very sounds as well as words to the things he treats of.'—POPE. We accommodate ourselves to the humours of others; 'He had altered many things, not that they were not natural before, but that he might accommodate himself to the age in which he lived.'—DRYDEN. The mind of an infinitely wise Creator is clearly evinced in the world, by the universal adaptation of means to their ends; 'It is in his power so to adapt one thing to another, as to fulfil his promise of making all things work together for good to those who love him.'—BLAIR. A spirit of accommodation is not merely a characteristic of polite ness: it is of sufficient importance to be ranked among the Christian duties; 'It is an old observation which has been made of politicians, who would rather ingratiate themselves with their sovereigns, than promote his real service, that they accommodate their counsels to his inclinations.'—ADDISON. The term adapt is sometimes applied to things of a less familiar nature; 'It may not be a useless inquiry, in what respects the love of novelty is peculiarly adapted to the present state.'—GROVE. 'Adhesion may be in part ascribed, either to some elastic motion in the pressed glass, or to the exquisite adaptation of the almost innumerable, though very small asperities of the one, and the numerous little cavities of the other, whereby the surfaces do lock in with one another, or are as it were clasped together.'—BOYLE.

Accommodate and adjust are both applied to the affairs of men which require to be kept or put in right order; but the former implies the keeping as well as putting in order; the latter simply the putting in order. Men accommodate each other, that is, make things commodious for each other; but they adjust things either for themselves or for others. Thus they accommodate each other in pecuniary matters; or they adjust the ceremonial of a visit. On this ground we may say that a difference is either accommodated or adjusted: for it is accommodated, inasmuch as the parties yield to each other; it is adjusted, inasmuch as that which was wrong is set right; 'When things were thus far adjusted, towards a peace, all other differences were soon accommodated.'—ADDISON.

TO FIT, EQUIP, PREPARE, QUALIFY.

To fit signifies to adopt means in order to make fit, and conveys the general sense of all the other terms, which differ principally in the means and circumstances of fitting: to equip, probably from the old barbarous Latin equipare to furnish or adorn ships, is to fit out by furnishing the necessary materials; to prepare, from the Latin parare, compounded of præ and paro to get before hand, is to take steps for the purpose of fitting in future: to qualify, from the Latin qualifico, or facio and qualis to make a thing as it should be, is to fit or furnish with the moral requisites.

To fit is employed for ordinary cases; to equip only for expeditions; they may be both employed in application to the same objects with this distinction, a vessel is equipped when it is furnished with every thing requisite for a voyage; it is fitted by simply putting those things to it which have been temporarily removed;

With long resounding cries they urge the train,
To fit the ships and launch into the main.—POPE

The word equip is also applied figuratively in the same sense; 'The religious man is equipped for the storm as well as the calm in this dubious navigation of life.'—BLAIR. To fit is for an immediate purpose; to prepare is for a remote purpose. A person fits himself for taking orders when he is at the university; he prepares himself at school before he goes to the university. To fit is to adopt positive and decisive measures; to prepare is to use those which are only precarious: a scholar fits himself for reading Horace by reading Virgil with attention; he prepares for an examination by going over what he has already learned.

To fit is said of every thing, both in a natural and a moral sense: to qualify is used only in a moral sense. Fit is employed mostly for acquirements which are gained by labour: qualify for those which are gained by intellectual exertion; a youth fits himself for a mechanical business by working at it; a youth qualifies himself for a profession by following a particular course of studies.

COMPETENT, FITTED, QUALIFIED.

Competent, in Latin competens, participle of competo to agree or suit, signifies suitable; fitted signifies made fit; qualified, participle of qualify, from the Latin qualis and facio, signifies made as it ought to be.

Competency mostly respects the mental endowments and attainments; fitness the disposition and character; qualification the artificial acquirements. A person is competent to undertake an office; fitted or qualified to fill a situation.

Familiarity with any subject aided by strong mental endowments gives competency; suitable habits and temper constitute the fitness: acquaintance with the business to be done, and expertness in the mode of performing it, constitutes the qualification: none should pretend to give their opinions on serious subjects who are not competent judges; none but lawyers are competent to decide in cases of law; none but medical men are competent to prescribe medicines; none but divines of sound learning, as well as piety, to determine on doctrinal questions: 'Man is not competent to decide upon the good or evil of many events which befall him in this life.'—CUMBERLAND. Men of sedentary and studious habits, with a serious temper, are most fitted to be clergymen; 'What is more obvious and ordinary than a mole? and yet what more palpable argument of Providence than it? The members of her body are so exactly fitted to her nature and manner of life.'—ADDISON. Those who have the most learning and acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures are the best qualified for the important and sacred office of instructing the people; 'Such benefits only can be bestowed as others are capable to receive, and such pleasures imparted as others are qualified to enjoy.'—JOHNSON.

Many are qualified for managing the concerns of others, who would not be competent to manage a concern for themselves. Many who are fitted from their turn of mind for any particular charge, may be unfortunately incompetent for want of the requisite qualifications.

FIT, APT, MEET.

Fit, from the Latin fit it is made, signifying made for the purpose, is either an acquired or a natural property; apt, in Latin aptus, from the Greek ἄρτω to connect, is a natural property; meet, from to meet or measure, signifying measured, is a moral quality. A house is fit for the accommodation of the family according to the plan of the builder;

He lends him vain Goliath's sacred word,
The fittest help just fortune could afford.—COWLEY.

The young mind is apt to receive either good or bad impressions; 'If you hear a wise sentence or an apt phrase commit it to your memory.'—SIR HENRY SIDNEY. Meet is a term of rare use, except in spiritual matters or in poetry; it meets to offer our prayers to the Supreme Disposer of all things;

My image not imparted to the brute
Whose fellowship therefore not unmeet for thee,
Good reason was thou freely shouldst dislike.

MILTON.

CONCORD, HARMONY.

The idea of union is common to both these terms, but under different circumstances. Concord, in French concorde, Latin concordia, from con and cor, having the same heart and mind, is generally employed for the union of wills and affections; harmony, in French harmonie, Latin harmonia, Greek ἁρμονία, from ἁρμω to fit or suit, signifying the state of fitting or suiting, respects the aptitude of minds to coalesce.

There may be concord without harmony, and harmony without concord. Persons may live in concord who are at a distance from each other;

Kind concord, heavenly born! whose blissful reign
Holds this vast globe in one surrounding chain
Soul of the world.—TICKEL.

Harmony is mostly employed for those who are in close connexion, and obliged to co-operate;

In us both one soul
Harmony to behold in wedded pair!
More grateful than harmonious sounds to the ear.

MILTON.

Concord should never be broken by relations under any circumstances; harmony is indispensable in all members of a family that dwell together. Interest will sometimes stand in the way of brotherly concord; a love of rule, and a dogmatical temper, will sometimes disturb the harmony of a family. Concord is as essential to domestic happiness, as harmony is to the peace of society and the uninterrupted prosecution of business. What concord can there be between kindred who despise each other? what harmony between the rash and the discreet? These terms are both applied to music; but concord solely respects the agreement of two or more sounds;

The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not mov'd with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, villanies, and spoils.

SHAKESPEARE.

But harmony respects the effect of an aggregate number of sounds; 'Harmony is a compound idea made up of different sounds united.'—WATTS. Harmony has also a farther application to objects in general to denote their adaptation to each other;

The harmony of things
As well as that of sounds, from discord springs.

DENHAM.

'If we consider the world in its subserviency to man, one would think it was made for our use; but if we consider it in its natural beauty and harmony, one would be apt to conclude it was made for our pleasure.'—ADDISON.

MELODY, HARMONY, ACCORDANCE

Melody, in Latin melodia, from melos, in Greek μέλος a verse, and the Hebrew מִלָּה a word or a verse; harmony, in Latin harmonia, Greek ἁρμονία concord, from ἁρμω apto to fit or suit, signifies the agreement of sounds; accordance denotes the act or state of according (v. To agree).

Melody signifies any measured or modulated sounds measured after the manner of verse into distinct members or parts; harmony signifies the suiting or adapting different modulated sounds to each other; melody is therefore to harmony as a part to the whole: we must first produce melody by the rules of art; the harmony which follows must be regulated by the ear: there may be melody without harmony, but there cannot be harmony without melody: we speak of simple melody where the modes of music are not very much diversified; but we cannot speak of harmony unless there be a variety of notes to fall in with each other.

A voice is melodious inasmuch as it is capable of producing a regularly modulated note; it is harmonious inasmuch as it strikes agreeably on the ear, and produces no discordant sounds. The song of a bird is melodious or has melody in it, inasmuch as there is a concatenation of sounds in it which are admitted to be regular, and consequently agreeable to the musical ear;

Lend me your song, ye nightingales! Oh pour
The mazy-running soul of melody
Into my varied verse.—THOMSON.

There is harmony in a concert of voices and instruments;

Now the distemper'd mind
Has lost that concord of harmonious powers,
Which forms the soul of happiness.—THOMSON.

Accordance is strictly speaking the property on which both melody and harmony is founded: for the whole of music depends on an accordance of sounds;

The music
Of man's fair composition best accords
When 't is in concert.—SHAKESPEARE.

The same distinction marks accordance and harmony in the moral application. There may be occasional accordance of opinion or feeling; but harmony is an entire accordance in every point.

CORRESPONDENT, ANSWERABLE, SUITABLE.

Correspondent, in French correspondant, from the Latin cum and respondeo to answer, signifies to answer in unison or in uniformity; answerable and suitable from answer and suit, mark the quality or capacity of answering or suiting. Correspondent supposes a greater agreement than answerable, and answerable requires a greater agreement than suitable. Things that correspond must be alike in size, shape, colour and every minute particular; those that suit must have nothing disproportionate or discordant. In the artificial disposition of furniture, or all matters of art and ornament, it is of considerable importance to have some things made to correspond, so that they may be placed in suitable directions to answer to each other.

In the moral application, actions are said to correspond with professions; the success of an undertaking to answer the expectation; particular measures to suit the purpose of individuals. It ill corresponds with a profession of friendship to refuse assistance to a friend in the time of need; 'As the attractive power in bodies is the most universal principle which produceth innumerable effects, so the corresponding social appetite in human souls is the great spring and source of moral actions.'—BERKELEY. Wild schemes undertaken without thought, will never answer the expectations of the projectors; 'All the features of the face and tones of the voice answer like strings upon musical instruments to the impressions made on them by the mind.'—HUGHES. It never suits the purpose of the selfish and greedy to contribute to the relief of the necessitous; 'When we consider the infinite power and wisdom of the Maker, we have reason to think that it is suitable to the magnificent harmony of the universe, that the species of creatures should also by gentle degrees ascend upward from us.'—ADDISON.

ASSENT, CONSENT, APPROBATION, CONCURRENCE.

Assent, in Latin assentio, is compounded of as or ad and sentio to think, signifying to bring one's mind or judgement to a thing; approbation in Latin approbatio, is compounded of ad and probo to prove, signifying to make a thing out good: consent and concurrence are taken in the same sense as in the preceding articles.

Assent respects the judgement; consent respects the will. We assent to what we think true; we consent to the wish of another by agreeing to it and allowing it. Some men give their hasty assent to propositions which they do not fully understand; 'Precept gains only the cold approbation of reason, and compels an assent which judgement frequently yields with reluctance, even when delay is impossible.'—HAWKESWORTH. Some men give their hasty consent to measures which are very injudicious.

What in sleep thou didst abhor to dream,
Waking thou never wilt consent to do.—MILTON.

It is the part of the true believer not merely to assent to the Christian doctrines, but to make them the rule of his life: those who consent to a bad action are partakers in the guilt of it.

Approbation is a species of assent; concurrence of consent. To approve is not merely to assent to a thing that is right, but to feel it positively; to have the will and judgement in accordance; concurrence is the consent of many. Approbation respects the practical conduct of men in their intercourse with each other; assent is given to speculative truths, abstract propositions, or direct assertions. It is a happy thing when our actions meet with the approbation of others; but it is of little importance if we have not at the same time an approving conscience;

That not past me, but
By learned approbation of my judges.
SHAKESPEARE.

We may often assent to the premises of a question or proposition, without admitting the deductions drawn from them; 'Faith is the assent to any proposition not thus made out by the deduction of reason, but upon the credit of the proposer.'—LOCKE.

Concurrence respects matters of general concern, as consent respects those of individual interest. No bill in the house of parliament can pass for a second reading without the concurrence of a majority; 'Tarquin the Proud was expelled by a universal concurrence of nobles and people.'—SWIFT. No parent should be induced by persuasion to give his consent to what his judgement disapproves; 'I am far from excusing or denying that compliance; for plenary consent it was not.'—KING CHARLES.

Assent is opposed to contradiction or denial; consent to refusal; approbation to dislike or blame; concurrence to opposition; but we may sometimes seem to give our assent to what we do not expressly contradict, or seem to approve what we do not blame; and we are supposed to consent to a request when we do not positively refuse it. We may approve or disapprove of a thing without giving an intimation either of our approbation or the contrary: but concurrence can not be altogether a negative action; it must be signified by some sign, although that need not necessarily be a word.

The assent of some people to the most important truths is so tame, that it might with no great difficulty be converted into a contradiction; 'The evidence of God's own testimony added unto the natural assent of reason, concerning the certainty of them, doth not a little comfort and confirm the same.'—HOOKER. He who is anxious to obtain universal approbation, or even to escape censure, will find his fate depicted in the story of the old man and his ass; 'There is as much difference between the approbation of the judgement and the actual volitions of the will with relation to the same object, as there is between a man's viewing a desirable thing with his eye and his reaching after it with his hand.'—SOUTH. According to the old proverb, 'Silence gives consent.' 'Whatever be the reason, it appears by the common consent of mankind that the want of virtue does not incur equal contempt with the want parts.'—HAWKESWORTH. It is not uncommon for ministerial men to give their concurrence in parliament to the measures of administration by a silent vote, while those of the opposite party spout forth their opposition to catch the applause of the multitude; 'Sir Matthew Hale mentions one case wherein the Lords may alter a money bill (that is, from a greater to a less time)—here he says the bill need not be sent back to the Commons for their concurrence.'—BLACKSTONE.

TO CONSENT, PERMIT, ALLOW

Consent has the same meaning as given under the head of Accede; permit, in French permettre, Latin permitto, compounded of per and mitto, signifies to send or let go past; allow, in French allower, compounded of ad and lower, in German loben, low German laven, &c. from the Latin laudare to praise, signifies to give one's assent to a thing.

The idea of determining the conduct of others by some authorized act of one's own is common to these terms, but under various circumstances. They express either the act of an equal or a superiour.

As the act of an equal we consent to that in which we have an interest; we permit or allow what is for the accommodation of others; we allow by abstaining to oppose; we permit by a direct expression of our will; contracts are formed by the consent of the parties who are interested;

When thou canst truly call these virtues thine,
Be wise and free, by heaven's consent and mine.
DRYDEN.

The proprietor of an estate permits his friends to sport on his ground; 'You have given me your permission for this address, and encouraged me by your perusal and approbation.'—DRYDEN. A person allows of passage through his premises; 'I was by the freedom allowable among friends tempted to vent my thoughts with negligence.'—BOYLE. It is sometimes prudent to consent; complainant to permit; good natured or weak to allow.

When applied to superiours, consent is an act of private authority; permit and allow are acts of private or public authority: in the first case, consent respects matters of serious importance; permit and allow regard those of an indifferent nature: a parent consents to the establishment of his children; he permits them to read certain books; he allows them to converse with him familiarly.

We must pause before we give our consent; it is an express sanction to the conduct of others; it involves our own judgement, and the future interests of those who are under our control;

Though what thou tell'st some doubt within me move,
But more desire to hear, if thou consent
The full relation.—MILTON.

This is not always so necessary in permitting and allowing; they are partial actions, which require no more than the bare exercise of authority, and involve no other consequences than the temporary pleasure of the parties concerned. Public measures are permitted and allowed, but never consented to. The law permits or allows; or the person who is authorized permits or allows. Permit in this case retains its positive sense; allow its negative sense, as before. Government permits individuals to fit out privateers in time of war;

After men have acquired as much as the law permits them, they have nothing to do but to take care of the publick.—SWIFT. When magistrates are not vigilant, many things will be done which are not allowed; 'They referred all laws, that were to be passed in Ireland, to be considered, corrected, and allowed by the state of England.'—SPENSER. A judge is not permitted to pass any sentence, but what is strictly conformable to law: every man who is accused is allowed to plead his own cause, or intrust it to another, as he thinks fit.

All these terms may be used in a general sense with the same distinction;

O no! our reason 'was not vainly lent!

Nor is a slave, but by its own consent.—DRYDEN.

Shame, and his conscience,

Will not permit him to deny it.—RANDOLPH.

'I think the strictest moralists allow forms of address to be used, without much regard to their literal acceptation.'—JOHNSON.

TO ADMIT, ALLOW, PERMIT, SUFFER, TOLERATE.

Admit, in French admettre, Latin admitto, compounded of ad and mitto, signifies to send or to suffer to pass into; to allow, in French allower, compounded of the intensive syllable al or ad and lower, in German loben, old German lauban, low German laven, Swedish lofva, Danish lover, &c. Latin laus praise, laudare to praise, signifies to give praise or approbation to a thing; permit, in French permettre, Latin permitto, is compounded of per through or away, and mitto to send or let go, signifying to let it go its way; suffer, in French souffrir, Latin suffero, is compounded of sub and fero, signifying to bear with; tolerate, in Latin toleratus, participle of tolero, from the Greek τλάω to sustain, signifies also to bear or bear with.

The actions denoted by the first three terms are more or less voluntary; those of the last two are involuntary; admit is less voluntary than allow; and that than permit. We admit what we profess not to know, or seek not to prevent; we allow what we know, and tacitly consent to; we permit what we authorize by a formal consent; we suffer and tolerate what we object to, but do not think proper to prevent. We admit of things from inadvertence, or the want of inclination to prevent them; we allow of things from easiness of temper, or the want of resolution to oppose them; we permit things from a desire to oblige or a dislike to refuse; we suffer things for want of ability to remove them; we tolerate things from motives of discretion.

What is admitted, allowed, suffered, or tolerated, has already been done; what is permitted is desired to be done. To admit, suffer, and tolerate, are said of what ought to be avoided; allow and permit of things good, bad, or indifferent. Suffer is employed mostly with regard to private individuals; tolerate with respect to the civil power. It is dangerous to admit of familiarities from persons in a subordinate station, as they are apt to degenerate into impertinent freedoms, which though not allowable cannot be so conveniently resented: in this case we are often led to permit what we might otherwise prohibit: it is a great mark of weakness and blindness in parents to suffer that in their children which they condemn in others: opinions, however absurd, in matters of religion, must be tolerated by the civil authority when they have acquired such an ascendancy that they cannot be prevented without great violence.

A well-regulated society will be careful not to admit of any deviation from good order, which may afterward become injurious as a practice; 'Both Houses declared that they could admit of no treaty with the king, till he took down his standard and recalled his proclamations, in which the parliament supposed themselves to be declared traitors.'—HUME. It frequently happens that what has been allowed from indiscretion is afterward claimed as a right; 'Plutarch says very finely, that a man should not allow himself to hate even his enemies.'—ADDISON. No earthly power can permit that which is prohibited by the Divine law;

Permit our ships a shelter on your shores,

Refitted from your woods with planks and oars,

That if our prince be safe, we may renew

Our destin'd course, and Italy pursue.—DRYDEN.

When abuses are suffered to creep in, and to take deep root in any established institution, it is difficult to bring about a reform without endangering the existence of the whole; 'No man can be said to enjoy health, who is only not sick, without he feel within himself a light some and invigorating principle, which will not suffer him to remain idle.'—SPECTATOR. When abuses are not very grievous, it is wiser to tolerate them than run the risk of producing a greater evil; 'No man ought to be tolerated in an habitual humour, whim, or partiality of behaviour, by any who do not wait upon him for bread.'—STEELE.

TO ADMIT, ALLOW, GRANT.

Admit and allow are here taken mostly in application to things that the mind assents to, and in this sense they are closely allied to the word grant, which, like the words guarantee, warrant, and guard, come from the German währen to see or look to, &c. signifying here to take consideration of.

We admit the truth of a position; allow the propriety of a remark; grant what is desired. Some men will not readily admit the possibility of overcoming bad habits; 'Though the fallibility of man's reason, and the narrowness of his knowledge, are very liberally confessed, yet the conduct of those who so willingly admit the weakness of human nature, seems to discover that this acknowledgment is not sincere.'—JOHNSON. It is ungenerous not to allow that some credit is due to those who effect any reformation in themselves; 'The zealots in atheism are perpetually teasing their friends to come over to them, although they allow that neither of them shall get any thing by the bargain.'—ADDISON. It is necessary, before any argument can be commenced, that something should be taken for granted on both sides; 'I take it at the same time for granted that the immortality of the soul is sufficiently established by other arguments'—STEELE.

TO ASK, BEG, REQUEST.

Ask (v. To ask, inquire) is here taken to denote an expression of our wishes generally for what we want from another; beg is contracted from the word beggar, and the German begehren to desire vehemently; request in Latin requisitus, participle of requiro, is compounded of re and quero to seek or look after with indications of desire to possess.

The expression of a wish to some one to have something is the common idea comprehended in these terms. As this is the simple signification of ask, it is the generic term; the other two are specific: we ask in begging and requesting, but not vice versa.

Asking is peculiar to no rank or station; in consequence of our mutual dependence on each other, it is requisite for every man to ask something; of another: the master asks of the servant, the servant asks of the master; the parent asks of the child, the child asks of the parent. Begging marks a degree of dependence which is peculiar to inferiours in station: we ask for matters of indifference; we beg that which we think is of importance; a child asks a favour of his parent; a poor man begs the assistance of one who is able to afford it: that is asked for which is easily granted; that is begged which is with difficulty obtained. To ask therefore requires no effort; but to beg is to ask with importunity; those who by merely asking find themselves unable to obtain what they wish will have recourse to begging.

As ask sometimes implies a demand, and beg a vehemence of desire, or strong degree of necessity, politeness has adopted another phrase, which conveys neither the importuness of the one, nor the urgency of the other; this is the word request. Asking carries with it an air of superiority; begging that of submission; requesting has the air of independence and equality. Asking borders too nearly on an infringement of personal liberty: begging imposes a constrainty making an appeal to the feelings; requests leave the liberty of granting or refusing unencumbered. It is the character of impertinent people to ask without considering the circumstances and situation of the person asked; they seem ready to take without permission that which is asked if it be not granted;

Let him pursue the promis'd Latian shore,
A short delay is all I ask him now,
A pause of grief, an interval from wo.—DRYDEN.

Selfish and greedy people beg with importunity, and in a tone that admits of no refusal;

But we must beg our bread in climes unknown,
Beneath the scorching or the frozen zone.—DRYDEN.

Men of good breeding tender their requests with moderation and discretion; they request nothing but what they are certain can be conveniently complied with;

But do not you my last request deny,
With yon perfidious man your int'rest try.

DRYDEN.

Ask is altogether exploded from polite life, although beg is not. We may beg a person's acceptance of any thing; we may beg him to favour or honour us with his company; but we can never talk of asking a person's acceptance, or asking him to do us an honour. Beg in such cases indicates a condescension which is sometimes not unbecoming, but on ordinary occasion request is with more propriety substituted in its place.

TO BEG, DESIRE.

Beg in its original sense as before given (v. To ask, beg) signifies to desire; desire, in French desir, Latin desidero, comes from desido to fix the mind on an object.

To beg, marks the wish; to desire, the will and determination.

Beg is the act of an inferior, or one in subordinate condition; desire is the act of a superior: we beg a thing as a favour; we desire it as a right; children beg their parents to grant them an indulgence;

She'll hang upon his lips, and beg him tell
The story of my passion o'er again.—SOUTHERN.

Parents desire their children to attend to their business; 'Once, when he was without lodging, meat, or clothes, one of his friends left a message, that he desired to see him about nine in the morning. Savage knew that it was his intention to assist him; but was very much disgusted that he should presume to prescribe the hour of his attendance, and I believe refused to see him.'—JOHNSON.

TO BEG, BESEECH, SOLICIT, ENTREAT, SUPPLICATE, IMPLORE, CRAVE.

Beg is here taken as before (v. To ask, beg); beseech, compounded of be and sech, or seek, is an intensive verb, signifying to seek strongly; solicit, in French soliciter, Latin solicito, is probably compounded of solum or tolum, and cito to cite, summon, appeal to, signifying to rouse altogether; entreat, compounded of en or in and træat, in French træiter, Latin tracto to manage, signifies to act upon; supplicate, in Latin supplicatus, participle of supplico, compounded of sup or sub and plico to fold, signifies to bend the body down in token of submission or distress in order to awaken notice; implore, in French implorer, Latin imploro, compounded of im or in and ploro to weep or lament, signifies to act upon by weeping; crave, in Saxon cravian, signifies to long for earnestly.

All these terms denote a species of asking, varied as to the person, the object, and the manner; the first four do not mark such a state of dependence in the agent as the last three: to beg denotes a state of want; to beseech, entreat, and solicit, a state of urgent necessity; supplicate and implore, a state of abject distress; crave, the lowest state of physical want: one begs with importunity; beseeches with earnestness; entreats by the force of reasoning and strong representation; one solicits by virtue of one's interest; supplicates by an humble address; implores by every mark of dejection and annihilation.

Begging is the act of the poor when they need assistance: beseeching and entreating are resorted to by friends and equals, when they want to influence or persuade, but beseeching is more urgent; entreating more argumentative: solicitations are employed to obtain favours, which have more respect to the circumstances than the rank of the solicitor: supplicating and imploping are resorted to by sufferers for the relief of their misery, and are addressed to those who have the power of averting or increasing the calamity: craving is the consequence of longing; it marks an earnestness of supplication: an abject state of suffering dependence.

Those who have any object to obtain commonly have recourse to begging;

What more advance can mortals make in sin,
So near perfection, who with blood begin?
Deaf to the calf that lies beneath the knife,
Looks up, and from the butcher begs her life.

DRYDEN.

A kind parent will sometimes rather beseech an undutiful child to lay aside his wicked courses, than plunge him deeper into guilt by an ill-timed exercise of authority; 'Modesty never rages, never murmurs, never pouts when it is ill-treated; it pines, it beseeches, it languishes.'—STEELE. When we are entreated to do an act of civility, it is a mark of unkindness to be heedless to the wishes of our friends;

I have a wife, whom I protest I love;
I would she were in heav'n, so she could
Entreat some pow'r to change this curish Jew.

SHAKESPEARE.

Gentlemen in office are perpetually exposed to the solicitations of their friends, to procure for themselves or their connexions places of trust and emolument; 'As money collected by subscription is necessarily received in small sums, Savage was never able to send his poems to the press, but for many years continued his solicitation, and squandered whatever he obtained.'—JOHNSON. A slave supplicates his master for pardon, whom he has offended; 'Savage wrote to Lord Tyrconnel, not in a style of supplication and respect; but of reproach, menace, and contempt.'—JOHNSON. An offender implores mercy for the mitigation, if not the remission, of his punishment;

Is't then so hard, Monimia, to forgive
A fault, where humble love, like mine, implores thee?

OWTAY.

A poor wretch, suffering with hunger, craves a morsel of bread;

For my past crimes, my forfeit life receive.
No pity for my sufferings here I crave,
And only hope forgiveness in the grave.

ROWE'S JANE SHORE.

SOLICITATION, IMPORTUNITY.

Solicitation (v. To beg) is general; importunity, from the Latin importunus, or in and portus, signifies a running into harbour after the manner of distressed mariners, is a vehement and troublesome form of solicitation. Solicitation is itself indeed that which gives trouble to a certain extent, but it is not always unreasonable: there may be cases in which we may yield to the solicitations of friends, to do that which we have no objection to be obliged to do: but importunity is that solicitation which never ceases to apply for that which it is not agreeable to give. We may sometimes be urgent in our solicitations of a friend to accept some proffered honour; the solicitation however, in this case, although it may even be troublesome, yet it is sweetened by the motive of the action: the importunity of beggars is often a politic means of extorting money from the passenger; 'Although the devil cannot compel a man to sin, yet he can follow a man with continual solicitations.'—SOUTH. 'The torment of expectation is not easily to be borne, when the heart has no rival engagements to withdraw it from the importunities of desire.'—JOHNSON.

PRESSING, URGENT, IMPORTUNATE

Pressing and urgent, from to press and urge, are applied as qualifying terms, either to persons or things; importunate, from the verb to importune, which probably signifies to wish to get into port, to land at some port, is applied only to persons. In regard to pressing, it is said either of one's demands, one's requests or one's exhortations ; urgent is said of one's solicitations or entreaties ; importunate is said of one's begging or applying for. The pressing has more of violence in it ; it is supported by force and authority ; it is employed in matters of right, and appeals to the understanding ; ' Mr. Gay, whose zeal in your concern is worthy a friend, writes to me in the most pressing terms about it.'—POPE. The urgent makes an appeal to one's feelings ; it is more persuasive, and is employed in matters of favour ; ' Neither would he have done it at all but at my urgency.'—SWIFT. The importunate has some of the force, but none of the authority or obligation of the pressing ; it is employed in matters of personal gratification : ' Sleep may be put off from time to time, yet the demand is of so importunate a nature as not to remain long unsatisfied.'—JOHNSON. When applied to things, pressing is as much more forcible than urgent, as in the former case ; we speak of a pressing necessity, an urgent case. A creditor will be pressing for his money when he fears to lose it ; one friend is urgent with another to intercede in his behalf ; beggars are commonly importunate with the hope of teasing persons out of their money.

TO DESIRE, WISH, LONG FOR, HANKER AFTER, COVET.

Desire, in Latin desidero, comes from desido to rest or fix upon with the mind ; wish, in German wünschen, comes from wonne pleasure, signifying to take pleasure in a thing ; long, from the German langen to reach after, signifies to seek after with the mind ; hanker, hanger, or hang, signifies to hang on an object with one's mind ; covet is changed from the Latin cupio to desire.

The desire is imperious, it demands gratification ; ' When men have discovered a passionate desire of fame in the ambitious man (as no temper of mind is more apt to show itself,) they become sparing and reserved in their commendations.'—ADDISON. The wish is less vehement, it consists of a strong inclination ; ' It is as absurd in an old man to wish for the strength of youth, as it would be in a young man to wish for the strength of a bull or a horse.'—STEELE. Longing is an impatient and continued species of desire ;

Extended on the fun'ral couch he lies,
And soon as morning paints the eastern skies,
The sight is granted to thy longing eyes.—POPE.

Hankering is a desire for that which is set out of one's reach ; ' The wife is an old coquette that is always hankering after the diversions of the town.'—ADDISON. Coveting is a desire for that which belongs to another, or what it is in his power to grant ; ' You know Chaucer has a tale, where a knight saves his head by discovering it was the thing which all women most coveted.'—GAY. We desire or long for that which is near at hand, or within view ; we wish for and covet that which is more remote, or less distinctly seen ; we hanker after that which has been once enjoyed ; a discontented person wishes for more than he has ; he who is in a strange land longs to see his native country ; vicious men hanker after the pleasures which are denied them ; ambitious men covet honours, avaricious men covet riches.

Desires ought to be moderated ; wishes to be limited ; longings, hankerings, and covetings to be suppressed ; uncontrolled desires become the greatest torments ; unbounded wishes are the bane of all happiness ; ardent longings are mostly irrational, and not entitled to indulgence ; coveting is expressly prohibited by the Divine law.

Desire, as it regards others, is not less imperative than when it respects ourselves ; it lays an obligation on the person to whom it is expressed : a wish is gentle and unassuming ; it appeals to the good nature of another : we act by the desire of a superiour, and according to the wishes of an equal : the desire of a parent will amount to a command in the mind of a dutiful child ; his wishes will be anticipated by the warmth of affection.

TO WILL, WISH.

The will is that faculty of the soul which is the most prompt and decisive ; it immediately impels to action : he wish is but a gentle motion of the soul towards a thing. We can will nothing but what we can effect ; we may wish for many things which lie above our reach. The will must be under the entire control of reason, or it will lead a person into every mischief ; ' A good inclination is but the first rude draught of virtue ; but the finishing strokes are from the will.'—SOUTH. Wishes ought to be under the direction of reason ; or otherwise they may greatly disturb our happiness ; ' The wishing of a thing is not properly the willing of it ; it imports no more than an idle, unoperative, complacency in, and desire of, the object.'—SOUTH.

WILLINGLY, VOLUNTARILY, SPONTANEOUSLY.

To do a thing willingly is to do it with a good-will ; to do a thing voluntarily is to do it of one's own accord : the former respects one's willingness to comply with the wishes of another ; we do what is asked of us, it is a mark of good nature ; the latter respects our freedom from foreign influence ; we do that which we like to do ; it is a mark of our sincerity. It is pleasant to see a child do his task willingly ;

Food not of angels, yet accepted so,
As that more willingly thou couldst not seem,
At heav'n's high feasts t' have fed.—MILTON.

It is pleasant to see a man voluntarily engage in any service of public good ; ' Thoughts are only criminal when they are first chosen, and then voluntarily continued.'—JOHNSON. Spontaneously is but a mode of the voluntary, applied, however, more commonly to inanimate objects than to the will of persons : the ground produces spontaneously, when it produces without culture ; and words flow spontaneously, which require no effort on the part of the speaker to produce them ;

Of these none uncontroll'd and lawless rove,
But to some destin'd end spontaneous move.

JENYNS

If, however, applied to the will, it bespeaks in a stronger degree the totally unbiassed state of the agent's mind : the spontaneous effusions of the heart are more than the voluntary services of benevolence. The willing is opposed to the unwilling, the voluntary to the mechanical or involuntary, the spontaneous to the reluctant or the artificial.

TO LEAN, INCLINE, BEND.

Lean and incline both come from the Latin clino, and Greek κλῖνω to bow or bend ; bend is connected with the German wenden to turn, and the English wind, &c.

In the proper sense lean and incline are both said of the position of bodies ; bend is said of the shape of bodies : that which leans rests on one side, or in a side-ward direction ; that which inclines, leans or turns only in a slight degree : that which bends forms a curvature ; it does not all lean the same way : a house leans when the foundation gives way ; a tree may grow so as incline to the right or the left, or a road may incline this or that way ; a tree or a road bends when it turns out of the straight course.

In the improper sense the judgement leans, the will inclines, the will or conduct bends, in consequence of some outward action. A person leans to this or that side of a question which he favours ; he inclines or is inclined to this or that mode of conduct ; he bends to the will of another. It is the duty of a judge to lean to the side of mercy as far as is consistent with justice ;

Like you a courtier born and bred,
Kings lean t' their ear to what I said.—GAY.

Whoever inclines too readily to listen to the tales of distress which are continually told to excite compassion, will find himself in general deceived ;

Say what you want : the Latins you shall find,
Not forc'd to goodness, but by will inclin'd.—DRYDEN.
An unbending temper is the bane of domestic felicity ;

And as on corn when western gusts descend,
Before the blast the lofty harvest bend.—POPE.

BENT, BIAS, INCLINATION, PREOCCUPATION.

Bias, in French Biais, signifies a weight fixed on one side of a bowl in order to turn its course that way towards which the bias leans, from the Greek βία force; inclination, in French inclination, Latin inclinatio, from inclino, Greek κλίνω, signifies a leaning towards; prepossession, compounded of pre and possession, signifies the taking possession of the mind previously, or beforehand.

All these terms denote a preponderating influence on the mind. Bent is applied to the will, affection, and power in general; bias solely to the judgement; inclination and prepossession to the state of the feelings. The bent includes the general state of the mind, and the object on which it fixes a regard;

Servile inclinations, and gross love,
The guilty bent of vicious appetite.—HAYWARD.

Bias, the particular influential power which sways the judging faculty; 'The choice of man's will is indeed uncertain, because in many things free; but yet there are certain habits and principles in the soul that have some kind of sway upon it, apt to bias it more one way than another.'—SOUTH. The one is absolutely considered with regard to itself; the other relatively to its results and the object it acts upon.

Bent is sometimes with regard to bias, as cause is to effect; we may frequently trace in the particular bent of a person's likes and dislikes the principal bias which determines his opinions. Inclination is a faint kind of bent; prepossession is a weak species of bias: an inclination is a state of something, namely, a state of the feelings; prepossession is an actual something, namely, the thing that prepossesses.

We may discover the bent of a person's mind in his gay or serious moments; in his occupations, and in his pleasures; in some persons it is so strong, that scarcely an action passes which is not more or less influenced by it, and even the exterior of a man will be under its control: in all disputed matters the support of a party will operate more or less to bias the minds of men for or against particular men, or particular measures: when we are attached to the party that espouses the cause of religion and good order, this bias is in some measure commendable and salutary: a mind without inclination would be a blank, and where inclination is, there is the groundwork for prepossession. Strong minds will be strongly bent, and labour under a strong bias; but there is no mind so weak and powerless as not to have its inclinations, and none so perfect as to be without its prepossessions: the mind that has virtuous inclinations will be prepossessed in favour of every thing that leans to virtue's side; it were well for mankind that this were the only prepossession; but in the present mixture of truth and error, it is necessary to guard against prepossessions as dangerous anticipations of the judgement; if their object be not perfectly pure, or their force be not qualified by the restrictive powers of the judgement, much evil springs from their abuse;

'T is not indulging private inclination,
The selfish passions, that sustains the world,
And lends its Ruler grace.—THOMSON.

I take it for a rule, that in marriage the chief business is to acquire a prepossession in favour of each other.'—STEELE.

INCLINATION, TENDENCY, PROPENSITY, PRONENESS.

All these terms are employed to designate the state of the will towards an object: inclination (v. Bent) denotes its first movement towards an object; tendency, from tend, is a continued inclination; propensity, from the Latin propensus and propendeo to hang forward, denotes a still stronger leaning of the will; and prone, from the Latin pronus downward, characterizes an habitual and fixed state of the will towards an object. The inclination expresses the leaning but not the direction of that leaning; it may be to the right or to the left, upwards or downwards; consequently we may have an inclination to that which is good or bad, high or low; tendency does not specify any particular direction; but from the idea of pressing, which it conveys, it is appropriately applied to those things which degenerate or lead to what is bad; excessive strictness in the treatment of children has a tendency to damp the spirit; propensity and *prone*ness both designate a downward direction, and consequently refer only to that which is bad and low; a person has a propensity to drinking, and a *prone*ness to lying.

Inclination is always at the command of the understanding; it is our duty therefore to suppress the first risings of any inclination to extravagance, intemperance, or any irregularity; 'Partiality is properly the understanding's judging according to the inclination of the will.'—SOUTH. As tendency refers to the thing rather than the person, it is our business to avoid that which has a tendency to evil; 'Every immoral act, in the direct tendency of it, is certainly a step down wards.'—SOUTH. The propensity will soon get the mastery of the best principles, and the firmest resolution; it is our duty therefore to seek all the aids which religion affords to subdue every propensity; 'Such is the propensity of our nature to vice, that stronger restraints than those of mere reason are necessary to be imposed on man.'—BLAIR. Proneness to evil is inherent in our nature which we derive from our first parents; it is the grace of God which alone can lift us up above this grovelling part of ourselves; 'Every commission of sin imprints upon the soul a further disposition and *prone*ness to sin.'—SOUTH.

BIAS, PREPOSESSION, PREJUDICE.

Bias (v. Bent, Bias) marks the state of the mind; prepossession applies either to the general or particular state of the feelings; prejudice is employed only for opinions. Prejudice, in French prejudice, Latin præjudicium, compounded of præ before, and judicium judgement, signifies a judgement before hand, that is, before examination. Children may receive an early bias that influences their future character and destiny: prepossessions spring from casualities; they do not exist in young minds: prejudices are the fruits of a contracted education. Physical infirmities often give a strong bias to serious pursuits; 'It should be the principal labour of moral writers to remove the bias which inclines the mind rather to prefer natural than moral endowments.'—HAWKESWORTH. Prepossessions created by outward appearances are not always fallacious; 'A man in power, who can, without the ordinary prepossessions which stop the way to the true knowledge and service of mankind, overlook the little distinctions of fortune, raise obscure merit, and discountenance successful indolence, has, in the minds of knowing men, the figure of an angel rather than a man.'—STEELE. It is at present the fashion to brand every thing with the name of prejudice, which does not coincide with the lax notions of the age 'It is the work of a philosopher to be every day subduing his passions, and laying aside his prejudices. I endeavour at least to look upon men and their actions only as an impartial spectator.'—SPECTATOR. A bias may be overpowered, a prepossession overcome, and a prejudice corrected or removed.

We may be biased for or against, we are always prepossessed in favour, and mostly prejudiced against.

COVETOUSNESS, CUPIDITY, AVARICE

Covetousness, from covet, and cupido to desire, signifies having a desire; cupidity is a more immediate derivative from the Latin cupiditas, and signifies the same thing; avarice, from avo to long for, signifies by distinction a longing for money.

All these terms are employed to express an illicit desire after objects of gratification; but covetousness is applied to property in general; cupidity and avarice only to money or possessions. A child may display its covetousness in regard to the playthings which fall in its way; a man shows his cupidity in regard to the gains that fall in his way; we should therefore be careful to check a covetous disposition in early life, lest it show itself in the more hateful character of cupidity in advanced years. Covetousness is the natural disposition for having or getting; cupidity is the acquired disposition. As the love of appropriation is an innate characteristic in man, that of accumulating or wanting to accumulate, which constitutes covetousness, will show itself, in some persons, among the first indications of character; 'Nothing lies on our hands with such uneasiness as time. Wretched and thoughtless creatures! In the only place where covetousness were a virtue, we turn prodigals.'—ADISON. Where the prospect of amassing great wealth is set before a man, as in the case of a governor of a distant province, it will evince great virtue in him, if his cupidity be not excited; 'If prescription be once shaken, no species of property is secure, when it once becomes an object large enough to tempt the cupidity of indigent power.'—BURKE.

The covetous man seeks to add to what he has: the avaricious man only strives to retain what he has; the covetous man sacrifices others to indulge himself; the avaricious man will sometimes sacrifice himself to indulge others: for generosity, which is opposed to covetousness, is sometimes associated with avarice; 'At last Swift's avarice grew too powerful for his kindness; he would refuse (his friends) a bottle of wine.'—JOHNSON.

AVARICIOUS, MISERLY, PARSIMONIOUS, NIGGARDLY.

Avaricious, from the Latin aveo to desire, signifies in general longing for, but by distinction longing for money; miserly signifies like a miser or miserable man, for none are so miserable as the lovers of money; parsimonious, from the Latin parco to spare or save, signifies literally saving; niggardly is a frequentative of nigh or close, signifies very nigh.

The avaricious man and the miser are one and the same character, with this exception, that the miser carries his passion for money to a still greater excess. An avaricious man shows his love of money in his ordinary dealings; but the miser lives upon it, and suffers every privation rather than part with it. An avaricious man may sometimes be indulgent to himself, and generous to others; 'Though the apprehensions of the aged may justify a cautious frugality, they can by no means excuse a sordid avarice.'—BLAIR. The miser is dead to every thing but the treasure which he has amassed;

As some lone miser visiting his store,
Bends at his treasure, counts, recounts it o'er;
Hoards after hoards his rising raptures fill,
Yet still he sighs, for hoards are wanting still;
Thus to my breast alternate passions rise,
Pleas'd with each bliss that Heav'n to man supplies.
Yet oft a sigh prevails and sorrows fall,
To see the hoard of human bliss so small.

GOLDSMITH.

Parsimonious and niggardly are the subordinate characteristics of avarice. The avaricious man indulges his passion for money by parsimony, that is, by saving out of himself, or by niggardly ways in his dealings with others. He who spends a farthing on himself, where others with the same means spend a shilling, does it from parsimony; 'Armstrong died in September, 1779, and to the surprise of his friends left a considerable sum of money, saved by great parsimony out of a very moderate income.'—JOHNSON. He who looks to every farthing in the bargains he makes, gets the name of a niggard; 'I have heard Dodsley, by whom Akenside's "Pleasures of the Imagination" was published, relate, that when the copy was offered him, he carried the work to Pope, who, having looked into it, advised him not to make a niggardly offer, for this was no every day writer.'—JOHNSON. Avarice sometimes cloaks itself under the name of prudence: it is, as Goldsmith says, often the only virtue which is left a man at the age of seventy-two. The miser is his own greatest enemy, and no man's friend; his ill-gotten wealth is generally a curse to him by whom it is inherited. A man is sometimes rendered parsimonious by circumstances; he who first saves from necessity but too often ends with saving from inclination. The niggard is an object of contempt, and sometimes hatred; every one fears to lose by a man who strives to gain from all.

ECONOMICAL, SAVING, SPARING, THRIFTY, PENURIOUS, NIGGARDLY.

The idea of not spending is common to all these terms; but economical signifies not spending unnecessarily or unwisely; saving is keeping and laying by with care; sparing is keeping out of that which ought to be spent; thrifty or thriving is accumulating by means of saving; penurious is suffering as from penury by means of saving; niggardly, after the manner of a niggard, nigh or close person, is not spending or letting go, but in the smallest possible quantities.

To be economical is a virtue in those who have but narrow means; 'I cannot fancy that a shopkeeper's wife in Cheapside has a greater tenderness for the fortune of her husband than a citizen's wife in Paris; or that Miss in a boarding-school is more an economist in dress than Mademoiselle in a nunnery.'—GOLDSMITH. All the other epithets however are employed in a sense more or less unfavourable; he who is saving when young, will be covetous when old; he who is sparing will generally be sparing out of the comforts of others; he who is thrifty commonly adds the desire of getting with that of saving; he who is penurious wants no thing to make him a complete miser; he who is niggardly in his dealings will be mostly avaricious in his character; 'I may say of fame as Falstaff did of honour, "if it comes it comes unlook'd for, and there is an end on't." I am content with a bare saving game.'—POPE.

Youth is not rich, in time it may be poor,
Part with it, as with money, sparing.—YOUNG.

'Nothing is penuriously imparted, of which a more liberal distribution would increase real felicity.'—JOHNSON.

Who by resolves and vows engag'd does stand,
For days that yet belong to fate,
Does like an *unthrif*t mortgage his estate
Before it falls into his hands.—COWLEY.

No niggard nature; men are prodigals.—YOUNG.

ECONOMY, FRUGALITY, PARSIMONY

Economy, from the Greek oikonomia, implies management; frugality, from the Latin fruges fruits, implies temperance; parsimony (v. Avaricious) implies simply forbearing to spend, which is in fact the common idea included in these terms; but the economical man spares expense according to circumstances; he adapts his expenditure to his means, and renders it by contrivance as effectual to his purpose as possible; 'War and economy are things not easily reconciled, and the attempt of leaning towards parsimony in such a state may be the worst economy in the world.'—BURKE. The frugal man spares expense on himself or on his indulgences; he may however be liberal to others while he is frugal towards himself; 'I accept of your invitation to supper, but I must make this agreement beforehand, that you dismiss me soon, and treat me frugally.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny). The parsimonious man saves from himself as well as others; he has no other object than saving. By economy, a man may make a limited income turn to the best account for himself and his family; by frugality he may with a limited income be enabled to do much good to others; by parsimony he may be enabled to accumulate great sums out of a narrow income: hence it is that we recommend a plan for being economical; we recommend a diet for being frugal; we condemn a habit or a character for being parsimonious.

ECONOMY, MANAGEMENT.

Economy (v. Economy) has a more comprehensive meaning than management; for it includes the system of science and of legislation as well as that of domestic arrangements; as the economy of agriculture; the internal economy of a government; political, civil, or religious economy; or the economy of one's house hold; 'Your economy I suppose begins now to be settled; your expenses are adjusted to your revenue.'—JOHNSON. Management, on the contrary, is an action that is very seldom abstracted from its agent, and is always taken in a partial sense, namely, as a part of economy. The internal economy of a family depends principally on the prudent management of the female: the economy of every well-regulated community requires that all the members should keep their station, and preserve a strict subordination;

Oh spare this waste of being half divine,
And vindicate th' economy of heav'n.—YOUNG.

The management of particular branches of civil economy should belong to particular individuals; 'What incident can show more management and address in the poet (Milton), than this of Sampson's refusing the summons of the idolaters, and obeying the visitation of God's spirit.'—CUMBERLAND.

AVIDITY, GREEDINESS, EAGERNESS,

Are epithets expressive of a strong desire; avidity, in Latin aviditas, from aveo to desire, expresses very strong desire; greediness, from the German gierig, and begehren to desire, signifies the same; eagerness, from eager, and the Latin acer sharp, signifies acuteness of feeling.

Avidity is in mental desires what greediness is in animal appetites: eagerness is not so vehement, but more impatient than avidity or greediness. Avidity and greediness respect simply the desire of possessing; eagerness the general desire of attaining an object. An opportunity is seized with avidity; or a person gratifies his avidity; 'I have heard that Addison's avidity did not satisfy itself with the air of renown, but that with great eagerness he laid hold on his proportion of the profits.'—JOHNSON. The miser grasps at money with greediness, or the glutton devours with greediness. A person runs with eagerness in order to get to the place of destination: a soldier fights with eagerness in order to conquer: a lover looks with eager impatience for a letter from the object of his affection;

Bid the sea listen, when the greedy merchant,
To gorge its ravenous jaws, hurls all his wealth,
And stands himself upon the splitting deck
For the last plunge.—LEE.

Avidity is employed in an adverbial form to qualify an action: we seize with avidity. Greediness marks the abstract quality or habit of the mind; it is the characteristic of low and brutal minds: eagerness denotes the transitory state of a feeling; a person discovers his eagerness in his looks.

TO GIVE, GRANT, BESTOW, ALLOW.

Give, in Saxon gifan, German geben, &c. is derived by Adelung from the old word gaff the hollow of the hand, because the hand was commonly used in pledging or giving, whence this word is allied to the Greek εὔωλον to pledge or promise, and γύωλον a limb; grant is probably contracted from guarantee, and the French garantir, signifying to assure any thing to a person by one's word or deed; bestow is compounded of be and stow, which in English and the northern languages signifies to place, whence to bestow signifies to dispose according to one's wishes and convenience; allow is here taken in the same general sense as in the article To admit, allow.

The idea of communicating to another what is our own, or in our power, is common to these terms; this is the whole signification of give; but grant, bestow, and allow include accessory ideas in their meaning. To grant is to give at one's pleasure; to bestow is to give with a certain degree of necessity. Giving is confined to no object; whatever property we transfer into the hands of another, that we give; we give money, clothes, food, or whatever is transferable: granting is confined to such objects as afford pleasure or convenience; they may consist of transferable property or not; bestowing is applied to such objects only as are necessary to supply wants, which always consist of that which is transferable. We give what is liked or not liked, asked for or unasked for; we grant that only which is wished for and requested. One may give poison or medicine; one may give to a beggar, or to a friend; one grants a sum of money by way of loan: we give what is wanted or not wanted; we bestow that only which is expressly wanted: we give with an idea of a return or otherwise; we grant voluntarily, without any prospect of a return; we give for a permanency or otherwise; we bestow only in particular cases which require immediate notice. Many give things to the rich only to increase the number of their superfluities, and they give to the poor to relieve their necessities; they bestow their alms on an indigent sufferer.

To give has no respect to the circumstances of the action or the agent; it is applicable to persons of all conditions: to grant bespeaks not only the will but the power and influence of the grantor; to bestow bespeaks the necessitous condition of the receiver. Children may give to their parents and parents to their children, kings to their subjects or subjects to their kings; but monarchs only grant to their subjects, or parents to their children; and superiors in general bestow upon their dependants that which they cannot provide for themselves.

In an extended application of the terms to moral objects or circumstances, they strictly adhere to the same line of distinction. We give our consent; we give our promise; we give our word; we give credit; we give in all cases that which may be simply transferred from one to another;

Happy when both to the same centre move,
When kings give liberty, and subjects love.

DENHAM.

Liberties, rights, privileges, favours, indulgences, permissions, and all things are granted, which are in the hands only of a few, but are acceptable to many;

The gods will grant
What their unerring wisdom sees they want

DRYDEN.

Blessings, care, concern, and the like, are bestowed upon those who are dependent upon others for what ever they have.

Give and bestow are likewise said of things as well as of persons; grant is said only of persons. Give is here equally general and indefinite; bestow conveys the idea of giving under circumstances of necessity and urgency. One gives a preference to a particular situation; one gives a thought to a subject that is proposed; one gives time and labour to any matter that engages one's attention; 'Milton afterward gives us a description of the morning, which is wonderfully suitable to a divine poem.'—ADDISON. But one bestows pains on that which demands particular attention, one bestows a moment's thought on one particular subject, out of the number which engage attention; 'After having thus treated at large of Paradise Lost, I could not think it sufficient to have celebrated this poem, in the whole, without descending to particulars: I have therefore bestowed a paper on each book.'—ADDISON.

That is granted which is desired, if not directly asked for; that is bestowed which is wanted as a matter of necessity; that is allowed which may be expected, if not directly required.

What is granted is perfectly gratuitous on the part of the giver, it is a pure favour, and lays the receiver under an obligation; what is bestowed is occasional, altogether depending on the circumstances and disposition of both giver and receiver; what is allowed is a gift stipulated as to time and quantity, which as its continuance depends upon the will of the giver.

It is as improper to grant a person more than he asks, as it is to ask a person for more than he can grant. Alms are very ill bestowed which only serve to encourage beggary and idleness; many of the poor are allowed a small sum weekly from the parish.

A grant comprehends in it something more important than an allowance, and passes between persons in a higher station; what is bestowed is of less value than either. A father allows his son a yearly sum for his casual expenses, or a master allows his servant a maintenance; 'Martial's description of a species of lawyers is full of humour: "Men that hire out their words and anger, that are more or less passionate as they are paid for it, and allow their client a quantity of wrath proportionable to the fee which they receive from him."—ADDISON. Kings grant pensions to their officers; governments grant subsidies to one another

If you in pity grant this one request,
My death shall glut the hatred of his breast.

DRYDEN.

Relief is bestowed on the indigent; Our Saviour doth plainly witness that there should not be as much as a cup of cold water bestowed for his sake without reward.'—HOOKER.

In a figurative acceptance that is granted which is given by way of favour or indulgence; that is bestowed which is done in justice, or by way of reward or necessity; that is allowed which is done by way of courtesy or compliance.

In former times the kings of England granted certain privileges to some towns, which they retain to this day; 'All the land is the queen's, unless there be some grant of any part thereof to be shewed from her majesty.'—SPENSER. Those who are hasty in as plauding frequently bestow their commendations on very undeserving objects ;

So much the more thy diligence bestow,
In depth of winter to defend the snow.—DRYDEN.

A candid man allows merit even in his rivals ; ' I shall be ready to allow the pope as little power here as you please.'—SWIFT.

TO GIVE, AFFORD, SPARE.

Give is here the generic term, as in the preceding article ; afford, probably changed from afferred, from the Latin affero, or ad and fero, signifies literally to bring to a person ; spare, in German sparen, Latin parco, and Hebrew פָּרַק to preserve, signifies here to lay up for a particular purpose. These words are allied to each other in the sense of sending forth : but the former denotes an unqualified and unconditional action ; the latter bears a relation to the circumstances of the agent. A person is said to give money without any regard to the state of his finances : he is said to afford what he gives, when one wishes to define his pecuniary condition ; ' Nothing can give that to another which it hath not itself.'—BRAMHALL. ' The same errors run through all families, where there is wealth enough to afford that their sons may be good for nothing.'—SWIFT. The same idea runs through the application of these terms to all other cases, in which inanimate things are made the agents ;

Are these our great pursuits ? Is this to live,
These all the hopes this much-lov'd world can give ?
JENYNS.

' Our paper manufacture takes into use several mean materials, which could be put to no other use, and affords work for several hands in the collection of them, which are incapable of any other employment.'—ADDISON. When we say a thing gives satisfaction, we simply designate the action ; when we say it affords pleasure, we refer to the nature and properties of the thing thus specified ; the former is employed only to declare the fact, the latter to characterize the object. Hence, in certain cases, we should say, this or that posture of the body gives ease to a sick person ; but, as a moral sentiment, we should say, nothing affords such ease to the mind as a clear conscience ; ' This is the consolation of all good men, unto whom the ubiquity affordeth continual comfort and security.'—BROWN. (Vulg. Err.) Upon the same grounds the use of these terms is justified in the following cases ; to give rise ; or give birth ; to give occasion : to afford an opportunity ; to afford a plea or a pretext ; to afford ground, and the like.

To afford and spare both imply the deducting from one's property with convenience, but afford respects solely expenses which are no more than commensurate with our income ; spare is said of things in general, which we may part with without any sensible diminution of our comfort. There are few so destitute that they cannot afford something for the relief of others, who are more destitute ;

Accept what'er Aeneas can afford,
Untouch'd thy arms, untaken by thy sword.
DRYDEN.

He who has two things of a kind may easily spare one ; ' How many men, in the common concerns of life, lend sums of money which they are not able to spare.'—ADDISON.

TO GIVE, PRESENT, OFFER, EXHIBIT.

These terms have a common signification, inasmuch as they designate the manual act of transferring something from one's self to another. The first is here as elsewhere (v. To give, grant) the most indefinite and extensive in its meaning ; it denotes the complete act ; the latter two refer rather to the preliminaries of giving, than to the act itself. What is given is actually transferred : what is presented, that is made a present to any one ; what is offered is brought in the way of a person, or put in the way of being transferred : we present in giving, and offer in order to give ; but it may be that we may give without presenting or offering ; and, on the other hand, we may present or offer without giving.

To give is the familiar term which designates the ordinary transfer of property : to present is a term of respect ; it includes in it the formality and ceremony of setting before another that which we wish to give : to offer is an act of humility or solemnity : it bespeaks the movement of the heart, which impels to the making a transfer or gift. We give to our domesticks ; we present to princes ; we offer to God : we give to a person what we wish to be received ; we present to a person what we think agreeable ; we offer what we think acceptable : what is given is supposed to be ours ;

Of seven smooth joints a mellow pipe I have,
Which with his dying breath Dametas gave.
DRYDEN.

What we offer is supposed to be at our command ;

Alexis will thy homely gifts disdain ;
Nor, shouldst thou offer all thy little store,
Will rich Iolas yield, but offer more.—DRYDEN.

What we present need not be either our own or at our command ; ' It fell out at the same time, that a very fine colt, which promised great strength and speed, was presented to Octavius : Virgil assured them that he would prove a jade : upon trial, it was found as he had said.'—WALSH. We give a person not only our external property, but our esteem, our confidence, our company, and the like ; an ambassador presents his credentials at court ; a subject offers his services to his king.

They bear the same relation to each other when applied to words or actions, instead of property ; we speak of giving a person an assurance, or a contradiction ; of presenting an address, and offering an apology ; of giving a reception, presenting a figure, or offering an insult. They may likewise be extended in their application, not only to personal and individual actions, but also to such as respect the publick at large : ' We give a description in writing, as well as by word of mouth ; one presents the publick with the fruit of one's labours ; we offer remarks on such things as attract notice, and call for animadversion.

These terms may also be employed to designate the actions of unconscious agents, by which they are characterized : in this sense they come very near to the word exhibit, which, from exhibeo, signifies to hold or put forth. Here the word give is equally indefinite and general, denoting simply to send from itself, and applies mostly to what proceeds from another thing, by a natural cause : thus, a thing is said to give pain, or to give pleasure ;

The apprehension of the good
Gives but the greater feeling to the worse.

SHAKESPEARE.

Things are said to present or offer, that is, in the sense of setting them to view ; others only by the figure of personification : thus, a town is said to present a fine view, or an idea presents itself to the mind ;

Its pearl the rock presents, its gold the mine.
JENYNS.

An opportunity offers, that is, offers itself to our notice ;

True genuine dulness mov'd his pity,
Unless it offer'd to be witty.—SWIFT

To exhibit is properly applied in this sense of setting forth to view ; but expresses likewise the idea of attracting notice also : that which is exhibited is more striking than what is presented or offered ; thus a poem is said to exhibit marks of genius ; ' The recollection of the past becomes dreadful to a guilty man. It exhibits to him a life thrown away on vanities and follies.'
BLAIR.

TO INTRODUCE, PRESENT.

To introduce, from the Latin introduco, signifies literally to bring within or into any place ; to present (v. To give) signifies to bring into the presence of. As they respect persons, the former passes between equals, the latter only among persons of rank and power : one literary man is introduced to another by means of a common friend : he is presented at court by a nobleman.

As these terms respect things, we say that subjects

* Vide Girard : " Donner, presenter, offrir."

are introduced in the course of conversation; 'The endeavours of freethinkers tend only to introduce slavery and error among men.'—BERKELEY. Men's particular views upon certain subjects are presented to the notice of others through the medium of publication, or objects are presented to the view;

Now every leaf, and every moving breath,
Presents a foe, and every foe a death.

DENHAM.

ALLOWANCE, STIPEND, SALARY, WAGES, HIRE, PAY.

All these terms denote a stated sum paid according to certain stipulations. Allowance, from allow (v. To admit, allow), signifies the thing allowed; stipend, in Latin stipendium, from stipes a piece of money, signifies money paid; salary, in French salaire, Latin salarium, comes from sal salt, which was originally the principal pay for soldiers; wages, in French gage, Latin vadum, from the Hebrew וָדַן, labour, signifies that which is paid for labour; hire expresses the sum for which one is hired, and pay the sum that is to be paid.

An allowance is gratuitous; it ceases at the pleasure of the donor; 'Sir Richard Steele was officiously informed, that Mr. Savage had ridiculed him: by which he was so much exasperated that he withdrew the allowance which he had paid him.'—JOHNSON. All the rest are the requital for some supposed service; they cease with the engagement made between the parties. A stipend is more fixed and permanent than a salary; and that than wages, hire, or pay: a stipend depends upon the fulfilling of an engagement, rather than on the will of an individual; a salary is a matter of contract between the giver and receiver, and may be increased or diminished at will.

An allowance may be given in any form, or at any stated times; a stipend and salary are paid yearly, or at even portions of a year; wages, hire, and pay, are estimated by days, weeks, or months, as well as years.

An allowance may be made by, with, and to persons of all ranks, a stipend and salary are assignable only to persons of respectability;

Is not the care of souls a load sufficient?
Are not your holy stipends paid for this?

DRYDEN.

Several persons, out of a salary of five hundred pounds, have always lived at the rate of two thousand.'—SWIFT. Wages are given to labourers; 'The peasant and the mechanic, when they have received the wages of the day, and procured their strong beer and supper, have scarce a wish unsatisfied.'—HAWKSWORTH. Hire is given to servants;

I have five hundred crowns,
The thrifty hire I sav'd under your father.

SHAKESPEARE.

Pay is given to soldiers or such as are employed under government;

Come on, brave soldiers, doubt not of the day;
And that once gotten, doubt not of large pay.

SHAKESPEARE.

GIFT, PRESENT, DONATION, BENEFAC-TION.

Gift is derived from to give, in the sense of what is communicated to another gratuitously of one's property; present is derived from to present, signifying the thing presented to another; donation, from the French donation, and the Latin dono to present or give, is a species of gift.

The gift is an act of generosity or condescension; it contributes to the benefit of the receiver: the present is an act of kindness, courtesy, or respect; it contributes to the pleasure of the receiver. The gift passes from the rich to the poor, from the high to the low, and creates an obligation: the present passes either between equals, or from the inferior to the superior. Whatever we receive from God, through the bounty of his Providence, we entitle a gift;

The gifts of heav'n my following song pursues,
Aerial honey and ambrosial dews.—DRYDEN.

Whatever we receive from our friends, or whatever princes receive from their subjects, are entitled presents;

Have what you ask, your presents I receive;
Land, where and when you please, with ample leave.

DRYDEN

We are told by all travellers that it is a custom in the east, never to approach a great man without a present; the value of a gift is often heightened by being given opportunely. The value of a present often depends upon the value we have for the giver; the smallest present from an esteemed friend is of more worth in our eyes, than the costliest presents that monarchs receive.

The gift is private, and benefits the individual; the donation is public, and serves some general purpose: what is given to relieve the necessities of any poor person, is a gift; what is given to support an institution is a donation. The clergy are indebted to their patrons for the livings which are in their gift;

And she shall have them, if again she sues,

Since you the giver and the gift refuse.—DRYDEN.

It has been the custom of the pious and charitable, in all ages, to make donations for the support of alms-houses, hospitals, infirmaries, and such institutions as serve to diminish the sum of human misery; 'The ecclesiastics were not content with the donations made them by the Saxon princes and nobles.'—HUME.

Benefaction and donation both denote an act of charity, but the former comprehends more than the latter; a benefaction comprehends acts of personal service in general towards the indigent: donation respects simply the act of giving and the thing given. Benefactions are for private use; donations are for public service. A benefactor to the poor does not confine himself to the distribution of money; he enters into all their necessities, consults their individual cases, and suits his benefactions to their exigencies; his influence, his counsel, his purse, and his property, are employed for their good: his donations form the smallest part of the good which he does; 'The light and influence that the heavens bestow upon this lower world, though the lower world cannot equal their benefaction, yet with a kind of grateful return, it reflects those rays that it cannot recompense.'—SOUTH. 'Titles and lands given to God are never, and plates, vestments, and other sacred utensils, are seldom consecrated; yet certain it is that after the donation of them to the church, it is as really a sacrilege to steal them as it is to pull down a church.'—SOUTH.

TO DEVISE, BEQUEATH.

Devise, compounded of de and vise or visus, participle of video to see or show, signifies to point out specifically; bequeath, compounded of be and queath, in Saxon cuesan, from the Latin quiesco to say, signifies to give over to a person by saying or by word of mouth.

To devise is a formal, to bequeath is an informal assignment of our property to another on our death. We devise only by a legal testament; 'The right of inheritance or descent to his children and relations seems to have been allowed much earlier than the right of devising by testament.'—BLACKSTONE. We may bequeath simply by word of mouth, or by any expression of our will: we can devise only that which is property in the eye of the law; we may bequeath in the moral sense any thing which we cause to pass over to another: a man devises his lands; he bequeaths his name or his glory to his children;

With this, the Medes to lab'ring age bequeath
New lungs.—DRYDEN.

WILL, TESTAMENT.

A will is any written document which contains the last will of a man in regard to the disposal of his property; this may be either a formal or an informal instrument in the eye of the law; 'Do men make their last wills by word of mouth only?'—STEPHENS. A testament, on the other hand, is a formal instrument regularly drawn up, and duly attested, according to the forms of law; 'He bringeth arguments from the love which the testator always bore him, imagining that these, or the like proofs, will convict a testament to nave that in it which other men can nowhere by reading find."—HOOKER.

BENEFICENT, BOUNTIFUL OR BOUNTEOUS, MUNIFICENT, GENEROUS, LIBERAL.

Beneficent, from benefacio, signifies doing well or good, that is, by distinction for others: bountiful signifies full of bounty or goodness, from the French bonté, Latin bonitas; munificent, in Latin munificus, from munus and facio, in French genereux, Latin generosus, of high blood, noble extraction, and consequently of a noble character; liberal, in French liberal, Latin liberalis, from liber free, signifies the quality of being like a free man in distinction from a bondman, and by a natural association being of a free disposition, ready to communicate.

Beneficent respects every thing done for the good of others: bounty, munificence, and generosity, are species of beneficence: liberality is a qualification of all. The first two denote modes of action: the latter three either modes of action or modes of sentiment. The sincere well-wisher to his fellow-creatures is beneficent according to his means; he is bountiful in providing for the comfort and happiness of others; he is munificent in dispensing favours; he is generous in imparting his property; he is liberal in all he does.

Beneficence and bounty are characteristics of the Deity as well as of his creatures: munificence, generosity, and liberality, are mere human qualities. Beneficence and bounty are the peculiar characteristics of the Deity: with him the will and the act of doing good are commensurate only with the power: he was beneficent to us as our Creator, and continues his beneficence to us by his daily preservation and protection; to some, however, he has been more bountiful than to others, by providing them with an unequal share of the good things of this life.

The beneficence of a man is regulated by the bounty of Providence: to whom much is given, from him much will be required. Instructed by his word, and illumined by that spark of benevolence which was infused into their souls with the breath of life, good men are ready to believe that they are but stewards of all God's gifts, holden for the use of such as are less bountifully provided for; 'The most beneficent of all beings is He who hath an absolute fulness of perfection in himself, who gave existence to the universe, and so cannot be supposed to want that which he communicated.'—GROVE. Good men will desire, as far as their powers extend, to imitate this feature of the Deity by bettering with their beneficent counsel and assistance the condition of all who require it, and by gladdening the hearts of many with their bountiful provisions;

Hail! Universal Lord, be bounteous still
To give us only good.—MILTON.

Princes are munificent, friends are generous, patrons liberal. Munificence is measured by the quality and quantity of the thing bestowed: generosity by the extent of the sacrifice made; liberality by the warmth of the spirit discovered. A monarch displays his munificence in the presents which he sends by his ambassadors to another monarch. A generous man will waive his claims, however powerful they may be, when the accommodation or relief of another is in question. A liberal spirit does not stop to inquire the reason for giving, but gives when the occasion offers.

Munificence may spring either from ostentation or a becoming sense of dignity; 'I esteem a habit of benignity greatly preferable to munificence.'—STEELE after CICERO. Generosity may spring either from a generous temper, or an easy unconcern about property; 'We may with great confidence and equal truth affirm, that since there was such a thing as mankind in the world, there never was any heart truly great and generous, that was not also tender and compassionate.'—SOUTH. Liberality of conduct is dictated by nothing but a warm heart and an expanded mind: 'The citizen, above all other men, has opportunities of arriving at the highest fruit of wealth, to be liberal without the least expense of a man's own fortune.'—STEELE. Munificence is confined simply to giving, but we may be generous in assisting, and liberal in rewarding.

BENEVOLENCE, BENEFICENCE.

Benevolence is literally well-willing; beneficence is literally well doing. The former consists of intention, the latter of action: the former is the cause, the latter the result. Benevolence may exist without beneficence: but beneficence always supposes benevolence: a man is not said to be beneficent who does good from sinister views. The benevolent man enjoys but half his happiness if he cannot be beneficent; yet there will still remain to him an ample store of enjoyment in the contemplation of others' happiness: the man who is gratified only with that happiness which he himself is the instrument of producing, is not entitled to the name of benevolent; 'The pity which arises on sight of persons in distress, and the satisfaction of mind which is the consequence of having removed them into a happier state, are instead of a thousand arguments to prove such a thing as a disinterested benevolence.'—GROVE.

As benevolence is an affair of the heart, and beneficence of the outward conduct, the former is confined to no station, no rank, no degree of education or power: the poor may be benevolent as well as the rich, the unlearned as well as the learned, the weak as well as the strong: the latter on the contrary is controlled by outward circumstances, and is therefore principally confined to the rich, the powerful, the wise, and the learned; 'He that banishes gratitude from among men, by so doing stops up the stream of beneficence: for though, in conferring kindness, a truly generous man doth not aim at a return, yet he looks to the qualities of the person obliged.'—GROVE.

BENEVOLENCE, BENIGNITY, HUMANITY, KINDNESS, TENDERNESS.

Benevolence is well-willing; benignity, in Latin benignitas, from bene and gigno, signifies the quality or disposition for producing good; humanity, in French humanité, Latin humanitas, from humanus and homo, signifies the quality of belonging to man, or having what is common to man; kindness, the disposition to be kind, or the act which marks that disposition; tenderness, a tender feeling.

Benevolence and benignity lie in the will; humanity lies in the heart; kindness and tenderness in the affections; benevolence indicates a general good will to all mankind; benignity a particular good will, flowing out of certain relations; humanity is a general tone of feeling; kindness and tenderness are particular modes of feeling.

Benevolence consists in the wish or intention to do good: it is confined to no station or object: the benevolent man may be rich or poor, and his benevolence will be exerted wherever there is an opportunity of doing good: benignity is always associated with power, and accompanied with condescension.

Benevolence in its fullest sense is the sum of moral excellence, and comprehends every other virtue; when taken in this acceptance, benignity, humanity, kindness, and tenderness, are but modes of benevolence.

Benevolence and benignity tend to the communicating of happiness; humanity is concerned in the removal of evil. Benevolence is common to the Creator and his creatures; it differs only in degree; the former has the knowledge and power as well as the will to do good; man often has the will to do good without having the power to carry it into effect; 'I have heard say, that Pope Clement XI. never passes through the people, who always kneel in crowds and ask his benediction, but the tears are seen to flow from his eyes. This must proceed from an imagination that he is the father of all these people, and that he is touched with so extensive a benevolence, that it breaks out into a passion of tears.'—STEELE. Benignity is ascribed to the stars, to heaven, or to princes; ignorant and superstitious people are apt to ascribe their good fortune to the benign influence of the stars rather than to the gracious dispensations of Providence; 'A constant benignity in commerce with the rest of the world, which ought to run through all a man's actions, has effects more useful to those whom you oblige, and is less ostentatious in yourself.'—STEELE. Humanity belongs to man only; it is his peculiar characteristic, and ought at all times to be his boast; when he throws off this, his distinguishing badge, he loses every thing valuable in him; it is a virtue that is indispensable in his present suffering condition humanity is as universal in its application as benevolence; wherever there is distress, humanity flies to its relief; humanity is, however, not merely an attribute of man; it is also the peculiar feeling for one's fellow-creatures which exists in some men in a greater degree than in others; 'The greatest wits I have conversed with are men eminent for their humanity.'—ADDISON. Kindness and tenderness are partial modes of affection, confined to those who know or are related to each other: we are kind to friends and acquaintances, tender towards those who are near and dear: kindness is a mode of affection most fitted for social beings: it is what every one can show, and every one is pleased to receive; 'Benevolence, would the followers of Epicurus say, is all founded in weakness; and whatever be pretended, the kindness that passeth between men and men is by every man directed to himself. This it must be confessed is of a piece with that hopeful philosophy which, having patched man up out of the four elements, attributes his being to chance.'—GROVE. Tenderness is a state of feeling that is sometimes praiseworthy: the young and the weak demand tenderness from those who stand in the closest connexion with them, but this feeling may be carried to an excess so as to injure the object on which it is fixed; 'Dependence is a perpetual call upon humanity, and a greater incitement to tenderness and pity than any other motive whatsoever.'—ADDISON.

There are no circumstances or situation in life which preclude the exercise of benevolence: next to the pleasure of making others happy, the benevolent man rejoices in seeing them so: the benign influence of a benevolent monarch extends to the remotest corner of his dominions: benignity is a becoming attribute for a prince, when it does not lead him to sanction vice by its impunity; it is highly to be applauded in him as far as it renders him forgiving of minor offences, gracious to all who are deserving of his favours, and ready to afford a gratification to all whom it is in his power to serve: the multiplied misfortunes to which all men are exposed afford ample scope for the exercise of humanity, which, in consequence of the unequal distribution of wealth, power, and talent, is peculiar to no situation of life; even the profession of arms does not exclude humanity from the breasts of its followers; and when we observe men's habits of thinking in various situations, we may remark that the soldier, with arms by his side, is commonly more humane than the partisan with arms in his hands. Kindness is always an amiable feeling, and in a grateful mind always begets kindness; but it is sometimes ill bestowed upon selfish people, who requite it by making fresh exactions: tenderness is frequently little better than an amiable weakness, when directed to a wrong end, and fixed on an improper object; the false tenderness of parents has often been the ruin of children.

BENEFIT, FAVOUR, KINDNESS, CIVILITY.

Benefit signifies here that which benefits; favour, in French favor, Latin favor and faveo to bear good will, signifies the act flowing from good will; kindness signifies an action that is kind; civility, that which is civil (v. Civil).

The idea of an action gratuitously performed for the advantage of another is common to these terms.

Benefits and favours are granted by superiors; kindnesses and civilities pass between equals.

Benefits serve to relieve actual wants: the power of conferring and the necessity of receiving them, constitute the relative difference in station between the giver and the receiver: favours tend to promote the interest or convenience: the power of giving and the advantage of receiving are dependent on local circumstances, more than on difference of station. Kindnesses and civilities serve to afford mutual accommodation by a reciprocity of kind offices on the many and various occasions which offer in human life: they are not so important as either benefits or favours, but they carry a charm with them which is not possessed by the former. Kindnesses are more endearing than civilities, and pass mostly between those who are known to each other: civilities may pass between strangers.

Dependence affords an opportunity for conferring benefits; partiality gives rise to favours: kindnesses are the result of personal regard: civilities of general benevolence. A master confers his benefits on such of his domesticks as are entitled to encouragement for their fidelity. Men in power distribute their favours so as to increase their influence. Friends, in their intercourse with each other, are perpetually called upon to perform kindnesses for each other. There is no man so mean that he may not have it in his power to show civilities to those who are above him.

Benefits tend to draw those closer to each other who by station in life are set at the greatest distance from each other: affection is engendered in him who benefits; and devoted attachment in him who is benefited; 'I think I have a right to conclude that there is such a thing as generosity in the word. Though if I were under a mistake in this, I should say as Cicero in relation to the immortality of the soul, I willingly err; for the contrary notion naturally teaches people to be ungrateful by possessing them with a persuasion concerning their benefactors, that they have no regard to them in the benefits they bestow.'—GROVE. Favours increase obligation beyond its due limits; if they are not asked and granted with discretion, they may produce servility on the one hand, and haughtiness on the other; 'A favour well bestowed is almost as great an honour to him who confers it, as to him who receives it. What, indeed, makes for the superior reputation of the patron in this case is, that he is always surrounded with specious pretences of unworthy candidates.'—STEELE. Kindnesses are the offspring and parent of affection; they convert our multiplied wants into so many enjoyments; 'Ingratitude is too base to return a kindness, and too proud to regard it.'—SOUTH. Civilities are the sweets which we gather in the way as we pass along the journey of life: 'A common civility to an impertinent fellow often draws upon one a great many unforeseen troubles.'—STEELE.

BENEFIT, SERVICE, GOOD OFFICE.

These terms, like the former (v. Benefit, favour), agree in denoting some action performed for the good of another, but they differ in the principle on which the action is performed.

A benefit (v. Benefit, favour) is perfectly gratuitous, it produces an obligation: a service (v. Advantage) is not altogether gratuitous; it is that at least which may be expected, though it cannot be demanded: a good office is between the two; it is in part gratuitous, and in part such as one may reasonably expect.

Benefits flow from superiors, and services from inferiours or equals; but good offices are performed by equals only. Princes confer benefits on their subjects; subjects perform services for their princes; neighbours do good offices for each other. Benefits are sometimes the reward of services: good offices produce a return from the receiver.

Benefits consist of such things as serve to relieve the difficulties, or advance the interests, of the receiver: services consist in those acts which tend to lessen the trouble, or increase the ease and convenience of the person served: good offices consist in the employ of one's credit, influence, and mediation for the advantage of another: it is a species of voluntary service.

Humanity leads to benefits; the zeal of devotion or friendship renders services; general good-will dictates good offices.

It is a great benefit to assist an embarrassed tradesman out of his difficulty; 'I have often pleased myself with considering the two kinds of benefits which accrue to the publick from these my speculations, and which, were I to speak after the manner of logicians, I should distinguish into the material and formal.'—ADDISON. It is a great service for a soldier to save the life of his commander, or for a friend to open the eyes of another to see his danger; 'Cicero, whose learning and services to his country are so well known, was inflamed by a passion for glory to an extravagant degree.'—MIRCHES. It is a good office for any one to interpose his mediation to settle disputes, and heal divisions; 'There are several persons who have many pleasures and entertainments in their possession which they do not enjoy. It is therefore a kind and good office to acquaint them with their own happiness.'—STEELE.

It is possible to be loaded with benefits so as to affect one's independence of character. Services are sometimes a source of dissatisfaction and disappointment when they do not meet with the remuneration or return which they are supposed to deserve. Good offices tend to nothing but the increase of good will. Those who perform them are too independent to expect a return, and those who receive them are too sensible of their value not to seek an opportunity of making a return.

TO OFFER, BID, TENDER, PROPOSE.

Offer signifies the same as before (v. To Offer, exhibit); bid, in Saxon besidan, bidden to offer, old German buden, low German bedan, high German bieten, &c. comes in all probability from the Latin vito and invito, from in and viam, signifying to call into the way or measure of another; tender, like the word tend, from tendo to stretch, signifies to stretch forth by way of offering; propose, in Latin proponi, perfect of propono to place or set before, likewise characterizes a mode of offering.

Offer is employed for that which is literally transferable, or for that which is indirectly communicable: bid and tender belong to offer in the first sense; propose belongs to offer in the latter sense. To offer is a voluntary and discretionary act; the offer may be accepted or rejected at pleasure; to bid and tender are specific modes of offering which depend on circumstances: one bids with the hope of its being accepted; one tenders from a prudential motive, and in order to serve specific purposes. We offer money to a poor person, it is an act of charity or good nature; or we offer a reward by way of inducing another to do a thing, which is an act of discretion;

Nor should thou offer all thy little store,
Will rich Iolas yield but offer more.—DRYDEN.

Should all these offers for my friendship call,
'T is he that offers, and I scorn them all.—POPE.

We bid a price for the purchase of a house, it is a commercial dealing subject to the rules of commerce; 'To give interest a share in friendship, is to sell it by inch of candle; he that bids most shall have it; and when it is mercenary, there is no depending upon it.'—COLLIER. We tender a sum of money by way of payment, it is a matter of prudence in order to fulfil an obligation; 'Aulus Gellius tells a story of one Lucius Neratius who made it his diversion to give a blow to whomsoever he pleased, and then tender them the legal forfeiture.'—BLACKSTONE. By the same rule one offers a person the use of one's horse; one bids a sum at an auction; one tenders one's services to the government.

To offer and propose are both employed in matters of practice or speculation; but the former is a less definite and decisive act than the latter; we offer an opinion by way of promoting a discussion; we propose a plan for the deliberation of others. Sentiments which differ widely from those of the major part of the present company ought to be offered with modesty and caution; 'Our author offers no reason.'—LOCKE. We should not propose to another what we should be unwilling to do ourselves; 'We propose measures for securing to the young the possession of pleasure (by connecting with it religion).'—BLAIR. We commonly offer by way of obliging; we commonly propose by way of arranging or accommodating. It is an act of suavity to offer to do more than one is enabled to perform; it does not evince a sincere disposition for peace to propose such terms as we know cannot be accepted; 'Upon the proposal of an agreeable object, a man's choice will rather incline him to accept than refuse it.'

SOUTH.

TO INVEST, ENDUE OR ENDOW.

To invest, from vestio, signifies to clothe with any thing; endue or endow, from the Latin induo, signifies to put on any thing. One is invested with that which is external: one is endued with that which is internal. We invest a person with an office or a dignity: one endues a person with good qualities. The investment is a real external action; but endue may be merely fictitious or mental. The king is invested with supreme authority; 'A strict and efficacious constitution, indeed, which invests the church with no power at all, but where men will be so civil as to obey it.'—SOUTH. A lover endues his mistress with every earthly perfection; 'As in the natural body, the eye does not speak, nor the tongue see; so neither in the spiritual, is every one endued also with the gift and spirit of government.'

—SOUTH. Endow is but a variation of endue, and yet it seems to have acquired a distinct office: we may say that a person is endued or endowed with a good understanding; but as an act of the imagination endow is not to be substituted for endue: for we do not say that it endows but endues things with properties.

TO CONFER, BESTOW.

Confer, in French conferer, Latin confero, compounded of con and fero, signifies to bring something towards a person, or place it upon him, in which sense it is allied to bestow (v. To give, grant).

Conferring is an act of authority; bestowing that of charity or generosity. Princes and men in power confer; people in a private station bestow. Honours, dignities, privileges, and rank, are the things conferred; 'The conferring this honour upon him, would increase the credit he had.'—CLARENDON. Favours, kindnesses, and pecuniary relief, are the things bestowed; 'You always exceed expectations as if yours was not your own, but to bestow on wanting merit.'—DRYDEN.

Merit, favour, interest, caprice, and intrigue, give rise to conferring; necessity, solicitation, and private affection, lead to bestowing. England affords more than one instance in which the highest honours of the state have been conferred on persons of distinguished merit, though not of elevated birth: it is the characteristic of Christianity, that it inspires its followers with a desire of bestowing their goods on the poor and necessitous.

It is not easy to confer a favour on the unthankful. the value of a kindness is greatly enhanced by the manner in which it is bestowed;

On him confer the poet's sacred name,
Whose lofty voice declares the heavenly flame.

ADDISON.

'It sometimes happens, that even enemies and envious persons bestow the sincerest marks of esteem when they least design it.'—STEELE.

TO MINISTER, ADMINISTER, CONTRIBUTE.

To minister, from the noun minister, in the sense of a servant, signifies to act in subservience to another, either in a good, bad, or indifferent sense: we minister to the caprices or indulgences of another when we encourage them unnecessarily; or, we minister to one who is entitled to our services; administer is taken in the good sense of serving another to his advantage; thus the good Samaritan administered to the comfort of the man who had fallen among thieves; contribute, from the Latin contribuo, or con and tribuo to bestow, signifying to bestow for the same end, or for some particular purpose, is taken in either a good or bad sense; we may contribute to the relief of the indigent, or we may contribute to the follies and vices of others.

It is the part of the Christian minister to minister to the spiritual wants of the flock intrusted to his charge; 'Those good men who take such pleasure in relieving the miserable for Christ's sake, would not have been less forward to minister unto Christ himself.'—ATTERBURY. It is the part of every Christian to administer, as far as lies in his power, comfort to those who are in want, consolation to the afflicted, advice to those who ask for it, and require it; help to those who are feeble, and support to those who cannot uphold themselves. On the same ground we speak of grace or spiritual gifts being administered; 'By the universal administration of grace, begun by our blessed Saviour, enlarged by his Apostles, carried on by their immediate successors, and to be completed by the rest to the world's end; all types that darkened this faith are enlightened.'—SPRATT. It is the part of all who are in high stations to contribute to the dissemination of religion and morality among their dependants; but there are, on the contrary, many who contribute to the spread of immorality, and a contempt of all sacred things, by the most pernicious example of irreligion in themselves; 'Parents owe their children not only material subsistence for their body, but much more spiritual contributions for their mind.'—DIGBY. As expressing the act of unconscious agents, they bear a similar distinction;

He flings the pregnant ashes through the air,
And speaks a mighty prayer,
Both which the minist'ring winds around all Egypt bear.—COWLEY.

Thus do our eyes, as do all common mirrors,
Successively reflect succeeding images;
Not what they would, but must! a star or load,
Just as the hand of chance administers.

CONGREVE.

May from my bones a new Achilles rise,
That shall infest the Trojan colonies
With fire, and sword, and famine, when, at length,
Time to our great attempts contributes strength.

DENHAM.

TO CONDUCE, CONTRIBUTE.

To conduce, from the Latin conduco, or con and duco, signifying to bring together for the same end, is applied to that which serves the full purpose; to contribute, as in the preceding article, is applied to that only which serves as a subordinate instrument: the former is always taken in a good sense, the latter in a bad or good sense. Exercise conduces to the health; it contributes to give vigour to the frame.

Nothing conduces more to the well-being of any community than a spirit of subordination among all ranks and classes: 'It is to be allowed that doing all honour to the superiority of heroes above the rest of mankind, must needs conduce to the glory and advantage of a nation.'—STEELE. A want of firmness and vigilance in the government or magistrates contributes greatly to the spread of disaffection and rebellion; 'The true choice of our diet, and our companions at it, seems to consist in that which contributes most to cheerfulness and refreshment.'—FULLER.

Schemes of ambition never conduce to tranquillity of mind. A single failure may contribute sometimes to involve a person in perpetual trouble.

TAX, CUSTOM, DUTY, TOLL, IMPOST, TRIBUTE, CONTRIBUTION.

Tax, in French taxe, Latin taxo, from the Greek τάσσω, τάω, to dispose or put in order, signifies what is disposed in order for each to pay; custom signifies that which is given under certain circumstances, according to custom; duty, that which is given as a due or debt; toll, in Saxon toll, &c. Latin telonium, from the Greek τέλος a custom, signifies a particular kind of custom or due.

Tax is the most general of these terms, and applies to or implies whatever is paid by the people to the government, according to a certain estimate: the customs are a species of tax which are less specific than other taxes, being regulated by custom rather than any definite law; the customs apply particularly to what was customarily given by merchants for the goods which they imported from abroad; the duty is a species of tax more positive and binding than the custom, being a specific estimate of what is due upon goods, according to their value; hence it is not only applied to goods that are imported, but also to many other articles of inland produce; toll is that species of tax which serves for the repair of roads and havens.

The preceding terms refer to that which is levied by authority on the people; but they do not directly express the idea of levying or paying; impost, on the contrary, signifies literally that which is imposed; and tribute that which is paid or yielded: the former, therefore exclude that idea of coercion which is included in the latter. The tax is levied by the consent of many; the impost is imposed by the will of one; and the tribute is paid at the demand of one or a few; the tax serves for the support of the nation; the impost and the tribute serve to enrich a government. Conquerors lay heavy imposts upon the conquered countries; distant provinces pay a tribute to the princes to whom they owe allegiance. Contribution signifies the tribute of many in unison, or for the same end; in this general sense it includes all the other terms; for taxes and imposts are alike paid by many for the same purpose; but as the predominant idea in contribution is that of common consent, it supposes a degree of freedom in the agent which is incompatible with the exercise of authority expressed by the other terms hence the term is with more propriety applied to those cases in which men voluntarily unite in giving towards any particular object; as charitable contributions, or contributions in support of a war; but it may be taken in the general sense of a forced payment, as in speak ing of military contribution.

TAX, RATE, ASSESSMENT.

Tax, agreeably to the above explanation (v. Tax), and rate, from the Latin ratus and reor to think or estimate, both derive their principal meaning from the valuation or proportion according to which any sum is demanded from the people; but the tax is imposed directly by the government for public purposes, as the land tax, the window tax, and the like; and the rate is imposed indirectly for the local purposes of each parish, as the church rates, the poor rates, and the like. The tax or rate is a general rule or ratio, by which a certain sum is raised upon a given number of persons; the assessment is the application of that rule to the individual.

The house-duty is a tax upon houses, according to their real or supposed value; the poor's rate is a rate laid on the individual likewise, according to the value of his house, or the supposed rent which he pays; the assessment in both these, is the valuation of the house, which determines the sum to be paid by each individual: it is the business of the minister to make the tax; of the parish officers to make the rate; of the commissioners or assessors to make the assessment; the former has the public to consider; the latter the individual. An equitable tax must not bear harder upon one class of the community than another: an equitable assessment must not bear harder upon one inhabitant than another.

TO ALLOT, ASSIGN, APPORTION, DISTRIBUTE.

Allot is compounded of the Latin al or ad and the word lot, which owes its origin to the Saxon and other northern languages. It signifies literally to set apart as a particular lot; assign, in French assigner, Latin assigno, is compounded of as or ad and signo to sign, or mark to, or for, signifying to mark out for any one, apportion is compounded of ap or ad and portion, signifying to portion out for a certain purpose; distribute, in Latin distributus, participle of dis and tribuo, signifies to bestow or portion out to several.

To allot is to dispose on the ground of utility for the sake of good order; to assign is to communicate according to the merit of the object; to apportion is to regulate according to the due proportion; to distribute is to give in several distinct portions.

A portion of one's property is allotted to charitable purposes, or a portion of one's time to religious meditation; 'Every one that has been long dead, has a due proportion of praise allotted him, in which, while he lived, his friends were too profuse, and his enemies too sparing.'—ADDISON. A prize is assigned to the most meritorious, or an honourable post to those whose abilities entitle them to distinction; I find by several hints in ancient authors, that when the Romans were in the height of power and luxury they assigned out of their vast dominions an island called Anticyra, as a habitation for madmen.'—STEELE. A person's business is apportioned to the time and abilities he has for performing it; 'Of the happiness and misery of our present condition, part is distributed by nature, and part is in a great measure apportioned by ourselves.'—JOHNSON. A person's alms ought to be distributed among those who are most indigent;

From thence the cup of mortal man he fills,
Blessings to these, to those distributes ill.—POPE

When any complicated undertaking is to be performed by a number of individuals, it is necessary to allot to each his distinct task. It is the part of a wise prince to assign the highest offices to the most worthy and to apportion to every one of his ministers an employment suited to his peculiar character and qualications; the business of the state thus distributed will proceed with regularity and exactitude.

TO ALLOT, APPOINT, DESTINE.

To allot is taken in a similar sense as in the preceding article; appoint, in French appointer, Latin appono, that is, ap or ad and pono to place, signifies to put in a particular place, or in a particular manner; destine, in Latin destino, compounded of de and stino, sto or sisto, signifies to place apart.

Allot is used only for things, appoint and destine for persons or things. A space of ground is allotted for cultivation; a person is appointed steward or governor; a youth is destined for a particular profession. Allotments are mostly made in the time past or present; they are made for a special purpose, and according to a given design, whence we may speak of the allotments of Providence; 'It is unworthy a reasonable being to spend any of the little time allotted us without some tendency, direct or oblique, to the end of our existence.'—JOHNSON. Appointments respect either the present or the future; they mostly regard matters of human prudence; 'Having notified to my good friend, Sir Roger, that I should set out for London the next day, his horses were ready at the appointed hour.'—STEELE. Destinations always respect some distant purposes, and include preparatory measures; they may be either the work of God or man; 'Look round and survey the various beauties of the globe, which Heaven has destined for man, and consider whether a world thus exquisitely framed could be meant for the abode of misery and pain.'—JOHNSON. A conscientious man allots a portion of his annual income to the relief of the poor; when public meetings are held it is necessary to appoint a particular day for the purpose: our plans in life are defeated by a thousand contingencies: the man who builds a house is not certain he will live to use it for the purpose for which it was destined.

DESTINY, FATE, LOT, DOOM.

Destiny, from destine (v. To appoint) signifies either the power that destines, or the thing destined; fate, in Latin fatum, participle of for to speak or decree, signifies that which is decreed, or the power that decrees; lot, in German loos, signifies a ticket, die, or any other thing by which the casual distribution of things is determined; and in an extended sense, it expresses the portion thus assigned by chance; doom, in Saxon dome, Danish döm, most probably like the word deem, comes from the Hebrew לך to judge, signifying the thing judged, spoken, or decreed.

All these terms are employed with regard to human events which are not under one's control: among the heathens destiny and fate were considered as deities, who each in his way could direct human affairs, and were both superiour even to Jupiter himself: the Destinies, or Parce as they were termed, presided only over life and death; but fate was employed in ruling the general affairs of men. Since revelation has instructed mankind in the nature and attributes of the true God, these blind powers are now not acknowledged to exist in the overruling providence of an all-wise and an all-good Being; the terms destiny and fate therefore have now only a relative sense, as to what happens without the will or control of the individual who is the subject of it.

Destiny is used in regard to one's station and walk in life; fate in regard to what one suffers; lot in regard to what one gets or possesses; and doom is that portion of one's destiny or fate which depends upon the will of another: destiny is marked out; fate is fixed; a lot is assigned; a doom is passed.

It was the destiny of Julius Cæsar to act a great part in the world, and to establish a new form of government at Rome; it was his fate at last to die by the hands of assassins, the chief of whom had been his avowed friends; had he been contented with an humbler lot than that of an empire, he might have enjoyed honours, riches, and a long life; his doom was sealed by the last step which he took in making himself emperor: it is not permitted for us to inquire into our future destiny; it is our duty to submit to our fate, to be contented with our lot, and prepared for our doom: a parent may have great influence over the destiny of his child, by the education he gives to him or the principles he instils into his mind;

If death be your design—at least, said she,

Take us along to share your destiny.—DRYDEN.

There are many who owe their unhappy fate entirely to the want of early habits of piety;

The gods these armies and this force employ,

The hostile gods conspire the fate of Troy.—POPE

Riches and poverty may be assigned to us as our lot, but the former will not ensure us happiness, nor the latter prevent us from being happy if we have a contented temper;

To labour is the lot of man below,

And when Jove gave us life, he gave us wo.

POPE

Criminals must await the doom of an earthly judge; but all men, as sinners, must meet the doom which is prepared for them at the awful day of judgement;

Oh! grant me, gods! ere Hector meets his doom,

All I can ask of Heav'n, an early tomb.—POPE.

It is the destiny of some men to be always changing their plan of life; it is but too frequently the fate of authors to labour for the benefit of mankind, and to reap nothing for themselves but poverty and neglect; it is the lot but of very few, to enjoy what they themselves consider a competency.

DESTINY, DESTINATION.

Both destiny and destination are used for the thing destined; but the former is said in relation to a man's important concerns, the latter only of particular circumstances; in which sense it may likewise be employed for the act of destining.

Destiny is the point or line marked out in the walk of life; destination is the place fixed upon in particular: as every man has his peculiar destiny, so every traveller has his particular destination. Destiny is altogether set above human control; no man can determine, though he may influence the destiny of another: destination is, however, the specific act of an individual, either for himself or another: we leave the destiny of a man to develop itself; but we may inquire about his own destination, or that of his children; it is a consoling reflection that the destinies of short-sighted mortals, like ourselves, are in the hands of One who both can and will overrule them to our advantage if we place full reliance in Him:

At the pit of Acheron

Meet one i' th' morning; thither he

Will come to know his destiny.—SHAKESPEARE.

In the destination of children for their several professions or callings, it is of importance to consult their particular turn of mind, as well as inclination; 'Moore's original destination appears to have been for trade'—JOHNSON.

TO SENTENCE, DOOM, CONDEMN.

To sentence, or pass sentence, is to give a final opinion or decision which is to influence the fate of an object; condemn, from dammum a loss, is to pass such a sentence as shall be to the hurt of an object: doom, which is a variation from dammum, has the same meaning.

Sentence is the generic, the two others specific terms. Sentence and condemn are used in the juridical as well as the moral sense; doom is employed in the moral sense only. In the juridical sense, sentence is indefinite; condemn is definite: a criminal may be sentenced to a mild or severe punishment; he is always condemned to that which is severe; he is sentenced to imprisonment, or transportation, or death: he is condemned to the galleys, to transportation for life, or to death.

In the moral application they are in like manner distinguished. To sentence is a softer term than to condemn, and this is less than to doom. Sentence applies to inanimate objects; condemn and doom only to persons or that which is personal. An author is sentenced by the decision of the publick to suffer neglect; a thing is sentenced to be thrown away which is esteemed as worthless; we may be condemned to hear the prating of a loquacious person; we may be doomed to spend our lives in penury and wretchedness. Sentence, particularly when employed as a noun, may even be favourable to the interests of a person; condemn is always prejudicial, either to his interest, his comfort, or his reputation; doom is always destructive of his happiness, it is that which always runs most counter to the wishes of an individual. It is of importance for an author, that a critic should pronounce a favourable sentence on his works; 'Let him set out some of Luther's works; that by them we may pass sentence upon his doctrines.'

—ATTERBURY. But, in the signification of a sentence passed by a judge, it is, when absolutely taken, always in a bad sense; 'At the end of the tenth book the poet joins this beautiful circumstance, that they offered up their penitential prayers on the very place where their judge appeared to them when he pronounced their sentence.'—ADDISON. Immoral writers are justly condemned to oblivion or perpetual infamy; 'Liberty (Thomson's Liberty) called in vain upon her votaries to read her praises, her praises were condemned to harbour spiders and gather dust.'—JOHNSON. Some of the best writers have been doomed to experience neglect in their life time; 'Even the abridger, compiler, and translator, though their labours cannot be ranked with those of the diurnal biographer, yet must not be rashly doomed to annihilation.'—JOHNSON.

A sentence and condemnation is always the act of some person or conscious agent: doom is sometimes the fruit of circumstances. Tarquin the Proud was *sentence*d by the Roman people to be banished from Rome: Regulus was condemned to the most cruel death by the Carthaginians; many writers have been doomed to pass their lives in obscurity and want, whose works have acquired for them lasting honours after their death.

CHANCE, FORTUNE, FATE.

Chance, probably contracted from the Latin cadens falling, is here considered as the cause of what falls out; fortune, in French fortune, Latin fortuna, from fortis chance, in Hebrew פֶּזֶז; fate signifies the same as in the preceding article. These terms have served at all times as cloaks for human ignorance, and before mankind were favoured by the light of Divine Revelation, they had an imaginary importance which has now happily vanished.

Believers in Divine Providence no longer conceive the events of the world as left to themselves, or as under the control of any unintelligent or unconscious agent, but ascribe the whole to an overruling mind, which, though invisible to the bodily eye, is clearly to be traced by the intellectual eye, wherever we turn ourselves. In conformity however to the preconceived notions attached to these words, we now employ them in regard to the agency of secondary causes. But how far a Christian may use them without disparagement to the majesty of the Divine Being, it is not so much my business to inquire, as to define their ordinary acceptation; 'Some there are who utterly proscribe the name of chance as a word of impious and profane signification: and indeed if it be taken by us in that sense in which it was used by the heathens, so as to make any thing casual in respect of God himself, their exception ought to be admitted. But to say a thing is a chance or casualty as it relates to second causes, is not profane, but a great truth.'—SOUTH.

In this ordinary sense, chance is the generic, fortune and fate are specific terms; chance applies to all things personal or otherwise: fortune and fate are mostly said of that which is personal.

Chance neither forms orders nor designs: neither knowledge nor intention is attributed to it; its events are uncertain and variable;

Chance aids their daring with unhop'd success.

DRYDEN.

Fortune forms plans and designs, but without choice; we attribute to it an intention without discernment; it is said to be blind; 'We should learn that none but intellectual possessions are what we can properly call our own. All things from without are but borrowed. What fortune gives us is not ours, and whatever she gives she can take away.'—STEEL. Fate forms plans and chains of causes; intention, knowledge, and power are attributed to it: its views are fixed, its results decisive;

Since fate divides then, since I must lose thee,
For pity's sake, for love's, oh! suffer me,
Thus languishing, thus dying, to approach thee;
And sigh my last adieu upon thy bosom.—TRAPP

A person goes as chance directs him when he has no express object to determine his choice one way or other; his fortune favours him, if without any expectation he gets the thing he wishes; his fate wills it, if he reaches the desired point contrary to what he intended.

Men's success in their undertakings depends oftener on chance than on their ability: we are ever ready to ascribe to ourselves what we owe to our good fortune; it is the fate of some men to fail in every thing they undertake.

When speaking of trivial matters, this language is unquestionably innocent, and any objection to their use must spring from an over scrupulous conscience.

If I suffer my horse to direct me in the road I take to London, I may fairly attribute it to chance if I take the right instead of the left; if I meet with an agreeable companion by the way I shall not hesitate to call it my good fortune that led me to take one road in preference to another; if in spite of any previous intention to the contrary, I should be led to take the same road repeatedly, and as often to meet with an agreeable companion, I shall immediately say that is my fate to meet with an agreeable companion whenever I go to London.

CHANCE, PROBABILITY.

Chance signifies the same as in the preceding article; probability, in French probabilité, Latin probabilitas, from probabilis and probo to prove, signifies the quality of being able to be proved or made good.

These terms are both employed in forming an estimate of future events; but the chance is either for or against, the probability is always for a thing. Chance is but a degree of probability; there may in this latter case be a chance where there is no probability. A chance affords a possibility; many chances are requisite to constitute a probability.

What has been once may, under similar circumstances, be again; for that there is a chance; what has fallen to one man may fall to another; so far he has a chance in his favour; but in all the chances of life there will be no probability of success, where a man does not unite industry with integrity;

Thus equal deaths are dealt with equal chance,
By turns they quit their ground, by turns advance.

DRYDEN.

Chance cannot be calculated upon; it is apt to produce disappointment; probability justifies hope; it is sanctioned by experience; "There never appear," says Swift, "more than five or six men of genius in an age, but if they were united the world could not stand before them." It is happy therefore for mankind that of this union there is no probability.'—JOHNSON.

CHANCE, HAZARD.

Chance signifies the same as in the preceding article, hazard comes from the oriental zar and tzar, signifying any thing bearing an impression, particularly the dice used in chance games, which is called by the Italians zara, and by the Spaniards azar.

Both these terms are employed to mark the course of future events, which is not discernible by the human eye. With the Deity there is neither chance nor hazard; his plans are the result of omniscience: but the designs and actions of men are all dependent on chance or hazard. Chance may be favourable or unfavourable, more commonly the former; hazard is always unfavourable: it is properly a species of chance. There is a chance either of gaining or losing: there is a hazard of losing. In most speculations the chance of succeeding scarcely outweighs the hazard of losing;

Against ill chances men are ever merry,
But heaviness foreruns the good event.

SHAKESPEARE.

'Though wit and learning are certain and habitual perfections of the mind, yet the declaration of them which alone brings the repute, is subject to a thousand hazards."—SOUTH

TO HAZARD, RISK, VENTURE.

Hazard signifies the same as in the preceding article; risk may be traced to the French risque, the Italian rischio, and the Spanish riesgo, and has been further traced by Meursius to the barbarous Greek word πίγκνον fortune or chance, but its more remote derivation is uncertain; venture is the same as adventure.

All these terms denote actions performed under an uncertainty of the event; but hazard bespeaks a want of design and choice on the part of the agent; to risk implies a choice of alternatives; to venture, a calculation and balance of probabilities: one hazard and risks under the fear of an evil; one ventures with the hope of a good. He who hazards an opinion or an assertion does it from presumptuous feelings and upon slight grounds; chances are rather against him than for him that it may prove erroneous;

They list with women each degenerate name
Who dares not hazard life for future fame.

DRYDEN.

He who risks a battle does it often from necessity; he who chooses the least of two evils, although the event is dubious, yet he fears less from a failure than from inaction; 'If the adventurer risques honour, he risques more than the knight.'—HAWKESWORTH. He who ventures on a mercantile speculation does it from a love of gain; he flatters himself with a favourable event, and acquires boldness from the prospect; 'Socrates, in his discourse before his death, says, he did not know whether his body shall (would) remain after death, but he thought so, and had such hopes of it that he was very willing to venture his life upon these hopes.'—TILLOTSON.

There are but very few circumstances to justify us in hazarding; there may be several occasions which render it necessary to risk, and very many cases in which it may be advantageous to venture.

DANGER, PERIL, HAZARD.

Danger, in French danger, comes from the Latin dammum a loss or damage, signifying the chance of a loss; peril, in French peril, comes from pereo, which signifies either to go over, or to perish, and periculum, which signifies literally that which is undergone; designating a critical situation, a rude trial, which may terminate in one's ruin; hazard signifies the same as in the preceding article.

The idea of chance or uncertainty is common to all these terms; but the two former may sometimes be foreseen and calculated upon; the latter is purely contingent. Danger and peril are applied to a positive evil; hazard may simply respect the loss of a good; risks are voluntarily run from the hope of good: there may be many dangers included in a hazard; and there cannot be a hazard without some danger.

A general hazard a battle, in order to disengage himself from a difficulty; he may by this step involve himself in imminent danger of losing his honour or his life; but it is likewise possible that by his superiour skill he may set both out of all danger: we are hourly exposed to dangers which no human foresight can guard against, and are frequently induced to engage in enterprises at the hazard of our lives, and of all that we hold dear;

One was their care, and their delight was one;
One common hazard in the war they shared.

DRYDEN.

Dangers are far and near, ordinary and extraordinary; they meet us if we do not go in search of them;

Proud of the favours mighty Jove has shown,
On certain dangers we too rashly run.—POPE.

Perils are always distant and extraordinary; we must go out of our course to expose ourselves to them: in the quiet walk of life as in the most busy and tumultuous, it is the lot of man to be surrounded by danger; he has nothing which he is not in danger of losing; and knows of nothing which he is not in danger of suffering: the mariner and the traveller who go in search of unknown countries put themselves in the way of undergoing perils both by sea and land;

From that dire deluge through the watery waste,
Such length of years, such various perils past,
At last escaped, to Latium we repair.—DRYDEN.

The same distinction exists between the epithets that are derived from these terms.

It is dangerous for a youth to act without the advice of his friends; it is perilous for a traveller to explore the wilds of Africa: it is hazardous for a merchant to speculate in time of war: experiments in matters of policy or government are always dangerous;

Hear this and tremble! all who would be great,
Yet know not what attends that dang'rous, wretched state.—JENYNS.

A journey through deserts that are infested with beasts of prey is perilous;

The grisly boar is singled from his herd,
A match for Hercules; round him they fly
In circles wide, and each in passing send
His feather'd death into his brawny sides;
But perilous th' attempt.—SOMERVILLE.

A military expedition conducted with inadequate means is hazardous; 'The previous steps being taken, and the time fixed for this hazardous attempt, Admiral Holmes moved with his squadron farther up the river, about three leagues above the place appointed for the disembarkation, that he might deceive the enemy'—SMOLLET.

TO HAPPEN, CHANCE.

To happen, that is, to fall out by a hap, is to chance (v. Chance, fortune) as the genus to the species; whatever chances happens, but not vice versâ. Happen respects all events without including any collateral idea; chance comprehends, likewise, the idea of the cause and order of events: whatever comes to pass happens, whether regularly in the course of things, or particularly, and out of the order; whatever chances happens altogether without concert, intention, and often without relation to any other thing. Accidents happen daily which no human foresight could prevent; the newspapers contain an account of all that happens in the course of the day or week;

With equal mind what happens let us bear,
Nor joy, nor grieve too much for things beyond our care.

DRYDEN.

Listeners and busy bodies are ready to catch every word that chances to fall in their hearing; 'An idiot chancing to live within the sound of a clock, always amused himself with counting the hour of the day whenever the clock struck; but the clock being spoiled by accident, the idiot continued to count the hour without the help of it.'—ADDISON.

ACCIDENT, CHANCE.

Accident, in French accident, Latin accidens, participle of accido to happen, compounded of ac or ad and cado to fall, signifies the thing falling out; chance (v. Chance, fortune).

Accident is said of things that have been; chance of things that are to be. That is an accident which is done without intention: that is a chance which cannot be brought about by the use of means. It is an accident when a house falls: it is a chance when and how it may fall; 'That little accident of Alexander's taking a fancy to bathe himself caused the interruption of his march; and that interruption gave occasion to that great victory that founded the third monarchy of the world.'—SOUTH. 'Surely there could not be a greater chance than that which brought to light the Powder-Treason.'—SOUTH.

Accidents cannot be prevented: chances cannot be calculated upon. Accidents may sometimes be remedied; chances can never be controlled: accidents give rise to sorrow, they mostly occasion mischief; chances give rise to hope; they often produce disappointment: it is wise to dwell upon neither.

ACCIDENT, CONTINGENCY, CASUALTY.

Accident signifies the same as in the preceding article; contingency, in French contingence, Latin contingens, participle of contingo, compounded of con and tango to touch one another, signifies the falling out or happening together; or the thing that happens in conjunction with another; casualty, in French casualté, from the Latin casualis and cado to fall or happen, signifies what happens in the course of events.

These words imply whatever takes place independently of our intentions. Accidents express more than contingencies; the former comprehend events with their causes and consequences; the latter respect collateral actions, or circumstances appended to events; casualties have regard simply to circumstances. Accidents are frequently occasioned by carelessness, and contingencies by trivial mistakes; but casualties are altogether independent of ourselves.

The overturning a carriage is an accident; our situation in a carriage, at the time, is a contingency, which may occasion us to be more or less hurt; the passing of any one at the time is a casualty. We are all exposed to the most calamitous accidents; 'This natural impatience to look into futurity, and to know what accidents may happen to us hereafter, has given birth to many ridiculous arts and inventions.'—ADDISON. The happiness or misery of every man depends upon a thousand contingencies; 'Nothing less than infinite wisdom can have an absolute command over fortune; the highest degree of it which man can possess is by no means equal to fortuitous events, and to such contingencies as may rise in the prosecution of our affairs.'—ADDISON. The best concerted scheme may be thwarted by casualties, which no human foresight can prevent; 'Men are exposed to more casualties than women, as battles, sea-voyages, with several dangerous trades and professions.'—ADDISON.

ACCIDENTAL, INCIDENTAL, CASUAL, CONTINGENT.

Accidental belonging to or after the manner of an accident (v. Accident); incidental, from incident, in Latin incidens and incido or in and cado to fall upon, signifies belonging to a thing by chance; casual after the manner of a chance or casualty; and contingent, after the manner of a contingency.

Accidental is opposed to what is designed or planned, incidental to what is premeditated, casual to what is constant and regular, contingent to what is definite and fixed. A meeting may be accidental, an expression incidental, a look, expression, &c. casual, an expense or circumstance contingent. We do not expect what is accidental; we do not suspect or guard against what is incidental; we do not heed what is casual; we are not prepared for what is contingent. Many of the most fortunate and important occurrences in our lives are accidental; many remarks, seemingly incidental, do in reality conceal a settled intent, 'This book fell accidentally into the hands of one who had never seen it before.'—ADDISON. 'The distempers of the mind may be figuratively classed under the several characters of those maladies which are incidental to the body.'—CUMBERLAND. A casual remark in the course of conversation will sometimes make a stronger impression on the minds of children than the most eloquent and impressive discourse or repeated counsel; 'Savage lodged as much by accident and passed the night sometimes in mean houses, which are set open at night to any casual wanderers.'—JOHNSON. In the prosecution of any plan we ought to be prepared for the numerous contingencies which we may meet with to interfere with our arrangements; 'We see how a contingent event baffles man's knowledge and evades his power.'—SOUTH.

EVENT, INCIDENT, ADVENTURE, OCCURRENCE.

Event, in Latin eventus, participle of evenio to come out, signifies that which falls out or turns up; incident, in Latin incidens, from incido, signifies that which falls in or forms a collateral part of any thing (v. Accidental); adventure, from the Latin advenio to come to, signifies what comes to or befalls one; occurrence, from the Latin occurro, signifies that which runs or comes in the way.

These terms are expressive of what passes in the world, which is the sole signification of the term event; while to that of the other terms are annexed some accessory ideas: an incident is a personal event; an accident an unpleasant event; an adventure an extraordinary event; an occurrence an ordinary or domestic event; event in its ordinary and unlimited acceptance excludes the idea of chance; accident excludes that of design; incident, adventure, and occurrence, are applicable in both cases.

Events affect nations and communities as well as individuals; incidents and adventures affect particular individuals; accidents and occurrences affect persons or things particularly or generally, individually or collectively: the making of peace, the loss of a battle, or the death of a prince, are national events; a marriage or a death are domestic events; 'These events, the permission of which seems to accuse his goodness now, may, in the consummation of things, both magnify his goodness and exalt his wisdom.'—ADDISON. The forming a new acquaintance and the revival of an old one are incidents that have an interest for the parties concerned; 'I have laid before you only small incidents seemingly frivolous, but they are principally evils of this nature which make marriages unhappy.'—STEELE. An escape from shipwreck, an encounter with wild beasts or savages, are adventures which individuals are pleased to relate, and others to hear;

For I must love, and am resolv'd to try

My fate, or failing in the adventure, die.—DRYDEN

A fire, the fall of a house, the breaking of a limb are accidents or occurrences; a robbery or the death of individuals are properly occurrences which afford subjects for a newspaper, and excite an interest in the reader; 'I think there is somewhere in Montaigne mention made of a family book, wherein all the occurrences that happened from one generation of that house to another were recorded.'—STEELE.

Event, when used for individuals, is always of greater importance than an incident. The settlement of a young person, in life, the adoption of an employment, or the taking a wife, are events, but not incidents; while on the other hand the setting out on a journey or the return, the purchase of a house or the despatch of a vessel, are characterized as incidents and not events.

It is farther to be observed that incident, event, and occurrence are said only of that which is supposed really to happen: incidents and adventures are often fictitious; in this case the incident cannot be too important, nor the adventure too marvellous. History records the events of nations; plays require to be full of incident in order to render them interesting; 'No person, no incident in the play, but must be of use to carry on the main design.'—DRYDEN. Romances and novels derive most of their charms from the extravagance of the adventures which they describe; 'To make an episode, "take any remaining adventure of your former collection," in which you could no way involve your hero, or any unfortunate accident that was too good to be thrown away.'—POPE. Periodical works supply the publick with information respecting daily occurrences.

CIRCUMSTANCE, INCIDENT, FACT.

Circumstance, in Latin circumstantia, from circum and sto, signifies what stands about a thing or belongs to it as its accident; incident signifies the same as before; fact, in Latin factum, participle of facio to do, signifies the thing done.

Circumstance is a general term; incident and fact are species of circumstances. Incident is what happens; fact is what is done; circumstance is not only what happens and is done, but whatever is or belongs to a thing. To every thing are annexed circumstances either of time, place, age, colour, or other collateral appendages which change its nature. Every thing that moves and operates is exposed to incidents, effects are produced, results follow, and changes are brought about; these are incidents: whatever moves and operates does, and what it produces is done or is the fact; when the artificer performs any work of art, it depends not only on his skill, but on the excellence of his tools, the time he employs, the particular frame of his mind, the place where he works, with a variety of other circumstances whether he will succeed in producing any thing masterly. Newspapers abound with the various incidents which occur in the animal or the vegetable world, some of which are surprising and singular; they likewise contain a number of facts which serve to present a melancholy picture of human depravity.

Circumstance is as often employed with regard to the operations of things, in which case it is most analogous to incident and fact: it may then be employed for the whole affair, or any part of it whatever, that can be distinctly considered. Incidents and facts either are circumstances, or have circumstances belonging to them. A remarkably abundant crop in any particular part of a field is for the agriculturist a singular circumstance or incident; this may be rendered more surprising if associated with unusual sterility in other parts of the same field. A robbery may either be a fact or a circumstance; its atrocity may be aggravated by the murder of the injured parties; the savageness of the perpetrators, and a variety of circumstances.

Circumstance comprehends in its signification whatever may be said or thought of any thing: 'You very often hear people after a story has been told with some entertaining circumstances, tell it again with particulars that destroy the jest.'—STEELE. Incident carries with it the idea of whatever may befall or be said to befall any thing; 'It is to be considered that Providence in its economy regards the whole system of time and things together, so that we cannot discover the beautiful connexion between incidents which lie widely separate in time.'—ADDISON. Fact includes in it nothing but what really is or is done; 'In describing the achievements and institutions of the Spaniards in the New World, I have departed in many instances from the accounts of preceding historians, and have often related facts which seem to have been unknown to them.'—ROBERTSON. A narrative therefore may contain many circumstances and incidents without any fact, when what is related is either fictitious or not positively known to have happened: it is necessary for a novel or play to contain much incident, but no facts, in order to render it interesting; history should contain nothing but facts, as authenticity is its chief merit.

CIRCUMSTANCE, SITUATION.

Circumstance signifies the same as in the preceding article; situation, in French situation, comes from the Latin situs, and the Hebrew מַשָּׁבֵט to place, signifying what is placed in a certain manner.

Circumstance is to situation as a part to a whole; many circumstances constitute a situation; a situation is an aggregate of circumstances. A person is said to be in circumstances of affluence who has an abundance of every thing essential for his comfort; he is in an easy situation when nothing exists to create uneasiness.

Circumstance respects that which externally affects us; situation is employed both for the outward circumstances and the inward feelings. The success of any undertaking depends greatly on the circumstances under which it is begun; 'As for the ass's behaviour in such nice circumstances, whether he would starve sooner than violate his neutrality to the two bundles of hay, I shall not presume to determine.'—ADDISON. The particular situation of a person's mind will give a cast to his words or actions; 'We are not at present in a proper situation to judge of the councils by which Providence acts.'—ADDISON. Circumstances are critical, a situation is dangerous.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL, PARTICULAR, MINUTE.

Circumstantial, from circumstance, signifies consisting of circumstances; particular, in French particulier, from the word particule, signifies consisting of particles; minute, in French minute, Latin minutus, participle of minuo to diminish, signifies diminished or reduced to a very small point.

Circumstantial expresses less than particular, and that less than minute. A circumstantial account contains all leading events; a particular account includes every event and movement however trivial; a minute account omits nothing as to person, time, place, figure, form, and every other trivial circumstance connected with the events. A narrative may be circumstantial, particular, or minute; an inquiry, investigation, or description may be particular or minute, a detail may be minute. An event or occurrence may be particular, a circumstance or particular may be minute. We may be generally satisfied with a circumstantial account of ordinary events; but whatever interests the feelings cannot be detailed with too much particularity or minuteness; 'Thomson's wide expansion of general views and his enumeration of circumstantial varieties, would have been obstructed and embarrassed by the frequent intersections of the sense which are the necessary effects of the rhyme.'—JOHNSON. 'I am extremely troubled at the return of your deafness; you cannot be too particular in the accounts of your health to me.'—POPE. When Pope's letters were published and avowed, as they had relation to recent facts, and persons either then living or not yet forgotten, they may be supposed to have found readers, but as the facts were minute, and the characters little known, or little regarded, they awakened no popular kindness or resentment.'—JOHNSON.

CONJUNCTURE, CRISIS.

Conjuncture, in Latin conjunctura, from conjungo to join together, signifies the joining together of circumstances; crisis, in Latin crisis, Greek κρίσις a judgement, signifies in an extended sense whatever decides or turns the scale.

Both these terms are employed to express a period of time marked by the state of affairs. A conjuncture is a joining or combination of corresponding circumstances tending towards the same end; 'Every virtue requires time and place, a proper object, and a fit conjuncture of circumstances for the due exercise of it.'—ADDISON. A crisis is the high-wrought state of any affair which immediately precedes a change;

Thought he, this is the lucky hour,
Wines work, when vines are in the flower;
This crisis then I will set my rest on,
And put her boldly to the question.—BUTLER.

A conjuncture may be favourable, a crisis alarming. An able statesman seizes the conjuncture which promises to suit his purpose, for the introduction of a favourite measure: the abilities, firmness, and perseverance of Alfred the Great, at one important crisis of his reign, saved England from destruction.

EXIGENCY, EMERGENCY.

Necessity is the idea which is common to the signification of these terms: the former, from the Latin exigo to demand, expresses what the case demands; and the latter, from exigere, to arise out of, denotes what rises out of the case.

The exigency is more common, but less pressing; the emergency is inuperous when it comes, but comes less frequently: a prudent traveller will never carry more money with him than what will supply the exigencies of his journey; and in case of an emergency will rather borrow of his friends than risk his property; 'Savage was again confined to Bristol, where he was every day hunted by bailiffs. In this exigence he once more found a friend who sheltered him in his house.'—JOHNSON. When it was formerly the fashion to husband a lie and to trump it up in some extraordinary emergency, it generally did execution; but at present every man is on his guard.'—ADDISON.

ENTERPRISING, ADVENTUROUS.

These terms mark a disposition to engage in that which is extraordinary and hazardous; but enterprising, from enterprise (v. Attempt), is connected with the understanding; and adventurous, from adventure, venture or trial, is a characteristic of the passions. The enterprising character conceives great projects, and pursues objects that are difficult to be obtained; the adventurous character is contented with seeking that which is new, and placing himself in dangerous and unusual situations. An enterprising spirit belongs to the commander of an army, or the ruler of a nation; an adventurous disposition is sometimes to be found in men of low degree, but was formerly attributed for the most part to knights; Robinson Crusoe was a man of an adventurous turn;

At land and sea, in many a doubtful fight
Was never known a more adventurous knight,
Who oftener drew his sword, and always for the right
DROYDEN.

Peter the Great possessed, in a peculiar manner, an enterprising genius; 'Sir Walter Raleigh, who had anew forfeited the king's friendship, by an intrigue with a maid of honour, and who had been thrown into prison for this misdemeanour, no sooner recovered his liberty than he was pushed by his active and enterprising genius to attempt some great action.'—HUME. Enterprising characterizes persons only; but adventurous is also applied to things, to signify containing adventures; as a journey, or a voyage, or a history, may be denominated adventurous: also in the sense of hazardous;

But 'tis enough

In this late age, advent'rous have touch'd
Light on the numbers of the Samian sage;
High heaven forbids the bold presumptuous strain.
THOMSON.

TO HOLD, CONTAIN.

These terms agree in sense, but differ in application. To hold (v. To hold, keep) is the familiar term employed only for material objects; contain, in French contenir, Latin contineo, compounded of con and teneo, signifying to keep together in one place, is a term of more noble use, being applied to moral or spiritual objects.

To hold is to occupy a space, whether enclosed or open: to contain is to fill an enclosed space; hence it is that these words may both be applied to the same objects. A cask is said to hold, or in more polished language it is said to contain a certain number of gallons. A coach holds or contains a given number of persons; a room holds a given quantity of furniture; a house or city contains its inhabitants. Hold is applied figuratively and in poetry in a similar sense;

Death only this mysterious truth unfolds,
The mighty soul how small a body holds.

DRYDEN.

Contain is applied in its proper sense to spiritual as material objects;

But man, the abstract
Of all perfection, which the workmanship
Of heav'n hath modell'd, in himself contains Passions of several qualities.—FORD.

CAPACITY, CAPACIOUSNESS.

Capacity is the abstract of capax, receiving or apt to hold, and is therefore applied to the contents of hollow bodies: capaciousness is the abstract of capacious, and is therefore applied to the plane surface comprehended within a given space. Hence we speak of the capacity of a vessel, and the capaciousness of a room.

Capacity is an indefinite term simply designating fitness to hold or receive; but capaciousness denotes something specifically large. Measuring the capacity of vessels belongs to the science of mensuration: the capaciousness of rooms is to be observed by the eye. They are marked by the same distinction in their moral application: men are born with various capacities; some are remarkable for the capaciousness of their minds.

TO COMPRISE, COMPREHEND, EMBRACE, CONTAIN, INCLUDE.

Comprise, through the French compris, participle of comprendre, comes from the same source as comprehend (v. Comprehensive); embrace, in French embrasser, from em or in and bras the arm, signifies literally to enclose in the arms; contain has the same signification as in the preceding article; include, in Latin includo, compounded of in and cludo or claudo, signifies to shut in or within a given space.

Persons or things comprise or include; things only comprehend, embrace, and contain: a person comprises a certain quantity of matter within a given space; he includes one thing within another: an author comprises his work within a certain number of volumes, and includes in it a variety of interesting particulars.

When things are spoken of, comprise, comprehend, and embrace, have regard to the aggregate value, quantity, or extent: include, to the individual things which form the whole: contain, either to the aggregate or to the individual, being in fact a term of more ordinary application than any of the others. Comprise and contain are used either in the proper or the figurative sense; comprehend, embrace, and include, in the figurative sense only: a stock comprises a variety of articles; a library comprises a variety of books; the whole is comprised within a small compass:

What, Egypt, do thy pyramids comprise?

What greatness in the high-raised folly lies!

SEWELL.

Rules comprehend a number of particulars; laws comprehend a number of cases; countries comprehend a certain number of districts or divisions; terms comprehend a certain meaning; 'That particular scheme which comprehends the social virtues may give employment to the most industrious temper, and find a man in business more than the most active station of life.'—ADDISON. A discourse embraces a variety of topics; a plan, project, scheme, or system, embraces a variety of objects;

The virtues of the several soils I sing,
Mæcenas, now the needful succour bring;
Not that my song in such a scanty space
So large a subject fully can embrace.—DRYDEN.

A house contains one, two, or more persons; a city contains a number of houses; a book contains much useful matter; a society contains very many individuals; 'All a woman has to do in this world is contained within the duties of a daughter, a sister, a wife, and a mother.'—STEELE. A society includes none but persons of a certain class; or it includes some of every class; 'The universal axiom in which all complaisance is included is, that no man should give any preference to himself.'—JOHNSON.

Their arms and fishing tackle comprise the personal effects of most savages; all the moral law of a Christian is comprised under the word charity: Sweden comprehends Finland and Lapland: London is said to contain above a million of inhabitants: bills of mortality are made out in most large parishes, but they include only such persons as die of diseases; a calculator of expenses will always fall short of his estimate who does not include the minor contingencies which usually attach to every undertaking.

It is here worthy of observation, that in the last two examples from Steele and Johnson the words comprehend and comprise would, according to established usage, have been more appropriate than contain and include.

COMPREHENSIVE, EXTENSIVE.

Comprehensive respects quantity, extensive regards space; that is comprehensive that comprehends much, that is extensive that extends into a wide field: a comprehensive view of a subject includes all branches of it; an extensive view of a subject enters into minute details: the comprehensive is associated with the concise; the extensive with the diffuse: it requires a capacious mind to take a comprehensive survey of any subject; it is possible for a superficial thinker to enter very extensively into some parts, while he passes over others.

Comprehensive is employed only with regard to intellectual objects; 'It is natural to hope that a comprehensive is likewise an elevated soul, and that whoever is wise is also honest.'—JOHNSON. Extensive is used both in the proper and the improper sense: the signification of a word is comprehensive, or the powers of the mind are comprehensive: a plain is extensive, or a field of inquiry is extensive; 'The trade carried on by the Phœnicians of Sidon and Tyre was more extensive and enterprising than that of any state in the ancient world.'—ROBERTSON.

TO ENCLOSE, INCLUDE.

From the Latin includo and its participle inclusus are derived enclose and include; the former to express the proper, and the latter the improper signification: a yard is enclosed by a wall; particular goods are included in a reckoning; the kernel of a nut is enclosed in a shell, or a body of men are enclosed within walls;

With whom she marched straight against her foes,
And them unawares besides the Severne did enclose

SPENSER.

Morality as well as faith is included in Christian perfection; 'The idea of being once present is included in the idea of its being past.'—GROVE.

TO CIRCUMSCRIBE, ENCLOSE.

Circumscribe, from the Latin circum about, and scribo to write, marks simply the surrounding with a line; enclose, from the Latin inclusus, participle of includo, compounded of in and claudo to shut, marks a species of confinement.

The extent of any place is drawn out to the eye by a circumscription: 'Who can imagine that the existence of a creature is to be circumscribed by time, whose thoughts are not?'—ADDISON. The extent of a place is limited to a given point by an enclosure;

Remember on that happy coast to build,
And with a trench enclose the fruitful field.

DRYDEN.

A garden is circumscribed by any ditch, line, or posts, that serve as its boundaries; it is enclosed by a wall or fence. An enclosure may serve to circumscribe, but that which barely circumscribes will seldom serve to enclose.

TO SURROUND, ENCOMPASS, ENVIRON, ENCIRCLE.

Surround, in old French surround, signifies, by means of the intensive syllable sur over, to go all round; encompass, compounded of en or in and compass, signifies to bring within a certain compass formed by a circle; so likewise environ, from the Latin gyrus, and the Greek γυρῶ a curve, and also encircle, signify to bring within a circle.

Surround is the most literal and general of all these terms, which signify to enclose any object either directly or indirectly. We may surround an object by standing at certain distances all round it; in this manner a town, a house, or a person, may be surrounded by other persons, or an object may be surrounded by enclosing it in every direction, and at every point; in this manner a garden is surrounded by a wall;

But not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of ev'n or morn,
But cloud instead, and ever-during dark
Surrounds me.—MILTON.

To encompass is to surround in the latter sense, and applies to objects of a great or indefinite extent: the earth is encompassed by the air, which we term the atmosphere; towns are encompassed by walls;

Where Orpheus on his lyre laments his love,
With beasts encompass'd, and a dancing grove.

DRYDEN.

To surround is to go round an object of any form, whether square or circular, long or short; but to environ and to encircle carry with them the idea of forming a circle round an object; thus a town or a valley may be envirown by hills, a basin of water may be encircled by trees, or the head may be encircled by a wreath of flowers;

Of fighting elements, on all sides round
Environ'd.—MILTON.

As in the hollow breast of Apennine,
Beneath the shelter of encircling hills,
A myrtle rises, far from human eye,
So flourish'd, blooming, and unseen by all,
The sweet Lavinia.—THOMSON.

In an extended or moral sense we are said to be surrounded by objects which are in great numbers, and in different directions about us: thus a person living in a particular spot where he has many friends may say he is surrounded by his friends; so likewise a particular person may say that he is surrounded by dangers and difficulties: but in speaking of man in a general sense, we should rather say he is encompassed by dangers, which expresses in a much stronger manner our peculiarly exposed condition.

CIRCLE, SPHERE, ORB, GLOBE.

Circle, in Latin circulus, Greek κύκλος, in all probability comes from the Hebrew צִיָּר a circle; sphere, in Latin sphæra, Greek σφαῖρα, from σπένδα a line, signifies that which is contained within a prescribed line; orb, in Latin orbis, from orbo to circumscribe with a circle, signifies the thing that is circumscribed; globe, in Latin globus, in all probability comes from the Hebrew גִּבּוֹר a rolled heap.

Rotundity of figure is the common idea expressed by these terms; but the circle is that figure which is represented on a plane superficies; the others are figures represented by solids. We draw a circle by means of compasses; the sphere is a round body, conceived to be formed according to the rules of geometry by the circumvolution of a circle round about its diameter; hence the whole frame of the world is denominated a sphere. An orb is any body which describes a circle; hence the heavenly bodies are termed orbs;

Thousands of suns beyond each other blaze,
Orbs roll o'er orbs, and glow with mutual rays

JENYNS.

A globe is any solid body, the surface of which is in every part equidistant from the centre; of this description is the terrestrial globe.

The term circle may be applied in the improper sense to any round figure, which is formed or supposed to be formed by circumscribing a space; simple rotundity constituting a circle: in this manner a circle may be formed by real objects, as persons, or by moral objects, as pleasures;

Might I from fortune's bounteous hand receive
Each boon, each blessing in her power to give;
E'en at this mighty price I'd not be bound
To tread the same dull circle round and round.
The soul requires enjoyments more sublime,
By space unbounded, undestroy'd by time.

JENYNS.

To the idea of circle is annexed that of extent around, in the signification of a sphere, as a sphere of activity, whether applied in the philosophical sense to natural bodies, or in the moral sense to men;

Or if some stripes from Providence we feel,
He strikes with pity, and but wounds to heal;
Kindly, perhaps, sometimes afflicts us here,
To guide our views to a sublimer sphere.—JENYNS

Hollowness, as well as rotundity, belongs to an orb; hence we speak of the orb of a wheel. Of a globe solidity is the peculiar characteristic; hence any ball, like the ball of the earth, may be represented as a globe;

Thus roaming with advent'rous wing the globe,
From scene to scene excursive, I behold
In all her workings, beauteous, great, or new Fair nature.—MALLET.

CIRCUIT, TOUR, ROUND.

Circuit, in French circuit, Latin circuitus, participle of circueo, signifies either the act of going round, or the extent gone; tour is but a variation of turn, signifying a mere turn of the body in travelling; round marks the track round, or the space gone round.

A circuit is made for a specific end of a serious kind; a tour is always made for pleasure; a round, like a circuit, is employed in matters of business; but of a more familiar and ordinary kind. A judge goes his circuit at particular periods of time: gentlemen, in times of peace, consider it as an essential part of their education to make what is termed the grand tour: tradesmen have certain rounds which they take on certain days;

'T is night! the season when the happy take Repose, and only wretches are awake;
Now discontented ghosts begin their rounds,
Haunt ruin'd buildings and unwholesome grounds.

OTWAY.

We speak of making the circuit of a place; of taking a tour in a given county; or going a particular round. A circuit is wide or narrow; a tour and a round is great or little. A circuit is prescribed as to extent: a tour is optional; a round is prescribed or otherwise. Circuit is seldom used but in a specific sense;

Th' unfledg'd commanders and the martial train,
First make the circuit of the sandy plain.—DRYDEN

Tour is seldom employed but in regard to travelling; Goldsmith's tour through Europe we are told was made for the most part on foot.—JOHNSON. Round may be taken figuratively, as when we speak of going one's round of pleasure; 'Savage had projected a perpetual round of innocent pleasure in Wales, of which he suspected no interruption from pride, or ignorance, or brutality.'—JOHNSON.

TO BOUND, LIMIT, CONFINE, CIRCUMSCRIBE, RESTRICT.

Bound comes from the verb bind, signifying that which binds fast or close to an object; limit, from the Latin limes a landmark, signifies to draw a line which is to be the exterior line or limit; confine signifies to bring within confines (v. Border); circumscribe has the same signification as given under the head of Circumscribe; restrict, in Latin restrictum, participle of restringo, compounded of re and stringo, signifies to keep fast back.

The first four of these terms are employed in the proper sense of parting off certain spaces.

Bound applies to the natural or political divisions of the earth: countries are bounded by mountains and seas; kingdoms are often bounded by each other; Spain is bounded on one side by Portugal, on another side by the Mediterranean, and on the third by the Pyrenees. Limit applies to any artificial boundary: as landmarks in fields serve to show the limits of one man's ground from another; so may walls, palings, hedges, or any other visible sign, be converted into a limit, to distinguish one spot from another, and in this manner a field is said to be limited, because it has limits assigned to it. To confine is to bring the limits close together; to part off one space absolutely from another: in this manner we confine a garden by means of walls. To circumscribe is literally to surround: in this manner a circle may circumscribe a square: there is this difference however between confine and circumscribe, that the former denotes not only visible limits, but such as may also prevent egress and ingress; whereas the latter, which is only a line, is but a simple mark that limits.

From the proper acceptance of these terms we may easily perceive the ground on which their improper acceptance rests: to bound is an action suited to the nature of things or to some given rule; in this manner our views are bounded by the objects which intercept our sight: we bound our desires according to principles of propriety. To limit, confine, and circumscribe, all convey the idea of control which is more or less exercised. To limit, whether it be said of persons limiting things, or persons being limited by things, is an affair of discretion or necessity; we limit our expenses because we are limited by circumstances. Confine conveys the same idea to a still stronger degree: what is confined is not only brought within a limit but is kept to that limit which it cannot pass: in this manner a person confines himself to a diet which he finds absolutely necessary for his health, or he is confined in the size of his house, in the choice of his situation, or in other circumstances equally uncontrollable: hence the term confined expresses also the idea of the limits being made narrow as well as impassable or unchangeable. To circumscribe is figuratively to draw a line round; in this manner we are circumscribed in our pecuniary circumstances when our sphere of action is brought within a line by the want of riches. In as much as all these terms convey the idea of being acted upon involuntarily, they become allied to the term restrict, which simply expresses the exercise of control on the will: we use restriction when we limit and confine, but we may restrict without limiting or confining: to limit and confine are the acts of things upon persons, or persons upon persons; but restrict is only the act of persons upon persons: we are limited or confined only to a certain degree, but we may be restricted to an indefinite degree: the limiting and confining depend often on ourselves, the restriction depends upon the will of others: a person limits himself to so many hours' work in a day; an author confines himself to a particular branch of a subject; a person is restricted by his physician to a certain portion of food in the day: to be confined to a certain spot is irksome to one who has always had his liberty; but to be restricted in all his actions would be intolerable.

Our greatest happiness consists in bounding our desires to our condition;

My passion is too strong
In reason's narrow bounds to be confin'd.

WANDSFORD.

It is prudent to limit our exertions, when we find them prejudicial to our health; 'The operations of the mind are not, like those of the hands, limited to one individual object, but at once extended to a whole species.'—BARTLET. It is necessary to confine our attention to one object at a time; 'Mechanical motions or operations are confined to a narrow circle of low and little things.'—BARTLET. It is unfortunate to be circumscribed in our means of doing good;

Therefore must his choice be circumscrib'd
Unto the voice and yielding of that body,
Whereof he's head.—SHAKESPEARE.

It is painful to be restricted in the enjoyment of innocent pleasure; 'It is not necessary to teach men to thirst after power; but it is very expedient that by moral instructions they should be taught, and by their civil institutions they should be compelled, to put many restrictions upon the immoderate exercise of it.'—BLACKSTONE.

Bounded is opposed to unbounded, limited to extended, confined to expanded, circumscribed to ample, restricted to unshackled.

BORDER, EDGE, RIM OR BRIM, BRINK, MARGIN, VERGE.

Border, in French bord or bordure, Teutonic bord, is probably connected with bret, and the English board from brytan, in Greek πρῆν to split; edge, in Saxon ege, low German egge, high German ecke a point, Latin acies, Greek ἀκὴ sharpness, signifies a sharp point; rim, in Saxon rīma, high German rahmen a frame, riemen a thong, Greek ῥῖμα a tract, from ῥῖν to draw, signifies a line drawn round; brim, brink, are but variations of rim; margin, in French margin, Latin margo, probably comes from mare the sea, as it is mostly connected with water; verge, from the Latin virga, signifies a rod, but is here used in the improper sense for the extremity of an object.

Of these terms border is the least definite point, edge the most so; rim and brink are species of edge; margin and verge are species of border. A border is a stripe, an edge is a line. The border lies at a certain distance from the edge, the edge is the exterior termination of the surface of any substance; 'Methought the shilling that lay upon the table reared itself upon its edge, and turning its face towards me opened its mouth.'—ADDISON. Whatever is wide enough to admit of any space round its circumference may have a border;

So the pure limpid stream, when with foul stains
Of rushing torrents and descending rains,
Works itself clear, and as it runs refines,
Till by degrees the crystal mirror shines,
Reflects each flower that on its border grows.

ADDISON.

Whatever comes to a narrow extended surface has an edge. Many things may have both a border and an edge; of this description are caps, gowns, carpets, and the like; others have a border but no edge, as lands; and others have an edge but no border, as a knife or a table.

A rim is the edge of any vessel;

But Merion's spear o'ertook him as he flew,
Deep in the belly's rim an entrance found
Where sharp the pang, and mortal is the wound.

POPE.

The brim is the exterior edge of a cup; a brink is the edge of any precipice or deep place;

As I approach the precipice's brink,
So steep, so terrible, appears the depth.

LANDSDOWNE.

A margin is the border of a book or a piece of water
By the sea's margin on the watery strand
Thy monument, Themistocles, shall stand.

CUMBERLAND.

A verge is the extreme border of a place;

to the earth's utmost verge I will pursue him;
No place, though e'er so holy, shall protect him.
Rowe.

BOUNDLESS, UNBOUNDED, UNLIMITED, INFINITE.

Boundless, or without bounds, is applied to infinite objects which admit of no bounds to be made or conceived by us; unbounded, or not bounded, is applied to that which might be bounded; unlimited, or not limited, applies to that which might be limited; infinite, or not finite, applies to that which in its nature admits of no bounds.

The ocean is a boundless object so long as no bounds to it have been discovered; o: no bounds are set to it in our imagination;

And see the country far diffus'd around
One boundless blush, one white empurpled shower
Of mingled blossoms.—Thomson.

Desires are often unbounded, which ought always to be bounded;

The soul requires enjoyments more sublime,
By space unbounded, undestroy'd by time.

JENYNS.

Power is sometimes unlimited when it would be better limited; 'Gray's curiosity was unlimited, and his judgement cultivated.'—JOHNSON. Nothing is infinite but that Being from whom all finite beings proceed; 'In the wide fields of nature the sight wanders up and down without confinement, and is fed with an infinite variety of images.'—ADDISON.

BOUNDS, BOUNDARY.

Bounds and boundary, from the verb bound (v. To bound), signify the line which sets a bound, or marks the extent to which any spot of ground reaches. The term bounds is employed to designate the whole space including the outer line that confines; boundary comprehends only this outer line. Bounds are made for a local purpose; boundary for a political purpose: the master of a school prescribes the bounds beyond which the scholar is not to go;

So when the swelling Nile contends her bounds,
And with extended waste the valleys drowns,
At length her ebbing streams resign the field,
And to the pregnant soil a tenfold harvest yield.

CIBBER.

The parishes throughout England have their boundaries, which are distinguished by marks; fields have likewise their boundaries, which are commonly marked out by a hedge or a ditch; 'Alexander did not in his progress towards the East advance beyond the banks of the rivers that fall into the Indus, which is now the Western boundary of the vast continent of India.'—ROBERTSON.

Bounds are temporary and changeable; boundaries permanent and fixed: whoever has the authority of prescribing bounds for others, may in like manner contract or extend them at pleasure; the boundaries of places are seldom altered, but in consequence of great political changes.

In the figurative sense bound or bounds is even more frequently used than boundary: we speak of setting bounds or keeping within bounds; but of knowing a boundary: it is necessary occasionally to set bounds to the inordinate appetites of the best disposed children; 'There are bounds within which our concern for worldly success must be confined.'—BLAIR. Children cannot be expected to know the exact boundary for indulgence; 'It is the proper ambition of heroes in literature to enlarge the boundaries of knowledge by discovering and conquering new regions of the intellectual world.'—JOHNSON.

LIMIT, EXTENT.

Limit is a more specific and definite term than extent; by the former we are directed to the point where any thing ends; by the latter we are led to no particular point, but to the whole space included; the limits are in their nature something finite; the extent is either finite or infinite: we therefore speak of that which exceeds the limits, or comes within the limits; and of that which comprehends the extent, or is according to the extent: a plenipotentiary or minister must not exceed the limits of his instruction; when we think of the immense extent of this globe, and that it is among the smallest of an infinite number of worlds, the mind is lost in admiration and amazement: it does not fall within the limits of a periodical work to enter into historical details; 'Whatsoever a man accounts his treasure answers all his capacities of pleasure. It is the utmost limit of enjoyment.'—SOUTH. A complete history of any country is a work of great extent; 'It is observable that, either by nature or habit, our faculties are fitted to images of a certain extent.'—JOHNSON

TERM, LIMIT, BOUNDARY.

* Term, in Latin terminus, from the Greek τέμα tema, end, is the point that ends, and to that which we direct our steps: limit, from the Latin limas a landmark, is the line which we must not pass: boundary, from bound, is the obstacle which interrupts our progress, and prevents us from passing.

We are either carried towards or away from the term; we either keep within limits, or we overstep them; we contract or extend a boundary.

The term and the limit belong to the thing; by them it is ended; they include it in the space which it occupies, or contain it within its sphere; the boundary is extraneous of it. The Straits of Gibraltar was the term of Hercules' voyages: it was said with more eloquence than truth, that the limits of the Roman empire were those of the world: the sea, the Alps, and the Pyrenees, are the natural boundaries of France. We mostly reach the term of our prosperity when we attempt to pass the limits which Providence has assigned to human efforts: human ambition often finds a boundary set to its gratification by circumstances which were the most unlooked for, and apparently the least adapted to bring about such important results.

We see the term of our evils only in the term of our life;

No term of time this union shall divide.—DRYDEN.

Our desires have no limits; their gratification only serves to extend our prospects indefinitely; 'The wall of Antoninus was fixed as the limit of the Roman empire.'—GIBBON. Those only are happy whose fortune is the boundary of their desires; 'Providence has fixed the limits of human enjoyment by immoveable boundaries.'—JOHNSON.

CONTRACTED, CONFINED, NARROW

Contracted, from the verb contract, in Latin contractus, participle of contrahere to draw or come close together, signifies either the state or quality of being shrunk up, lessened in size, or brought within a smaller compass; confined marks the state of being confined; narrow is a variation of near, signifying the quality of being near, close, or not extended.

Contraction arises from the inherent state of the object; confined is produced by some external agent: a limb is contracted from disease; it is confined by a chain: we speak morally of the contracted span of a man's life, and the confined view which he takes of a subject.

Contracted and confined respect the operation of things; narrow, their qualities or accidents: whatever is contracted or confined is more or less narrow; but many things are narrow which have never been contracted or confined; what is narrow is therefore more positively so than either contracted or confined: a contracted mind has but few objects on which it dwells to the exclusion of others; 'Notwithstanding a narrow, contracted temper be that which obtains most in the world, we must not therefore conclude this to be the genuine characteristic of mankind.'—GROVE. A confined education is confined to few points of knowledge or information; 'In its present habitation, the soul is plainly confined in its operations.'—BLAIR. 'The presence of every created being is confined to a certain measure of space, and consequently his observation is stinted to a certain number of objects.'—ADDISON. A narrow soul is hemmed in by a single selfish passion. 'Resentments are not easily dislodged from narrow minds.'—CUMBERLAND

* Vide Girard; "Termes, limites, bornes."

TO ABRIDGE, CURTAIL, CONTRACT.

Abridge, in French abrégé, Latin abbreviare, is compounded of the intensive syllable ab and breviare, from brevis short, signifying to make short; curtail, in French courte short, and tailleur to cut, signifies to diminish in length by cutting; contract, in Latin contractus, participle of contrahō, is compounded of con and trahō, signifying to draw close together.

By abridging, in the figurative as well as the literal sense, the quality is diminished; by curtailing, the magnitude or number is reduced; by contracting, a thing is brought within smaller compass. Privileges are abridged, pleasures curtailed, and powers contracted.

When the liberty of a person is too much abridged, the enjoyments of life become curtailed, as the powers of acting and thinking, according to the genuine impulse of the mind, are thereby considerably contracted; 'This would very much abridge the lover's pains in this way of writing a letter, as it would enable him to express the most useful and significant words with a single touch of the needle.'—ADDISON. 'I remember several ladies who were once very near seven feet high, that at present want some inches of five: how they came to be thus curtailed I cannot learn.'—ADDISON. 'He that rises up early and goes to bed late only to receive addresses is really as much tied and abridged in his freedom as he that waits all that time to present one.'—SOUTH. 'God has given no man a body as strong as his appetites; but has corrected the boundlessness of his voluptuous desires, by stinting his strength and contracting his capacities.'—SOUTH.

CONFINEMENT, IMPRISONMENT, CAPTIVITY.

Confinement signifies the act of confining, or the state of being confined; imprisonment, compounded of im and prison, French prison, from pris, participle of prendre, Latin prehendo to take, signifies the act or state of being taken or laid hold of; captivity, in French captivité, Latin captivitas from capio to take, signifies likewise the state of being, or being kept in possession by another.

Confinement is the generic, the other two specific terms. Confinement and imprisonment both imply the abridgement of one's personal freedom, but the former specifies no cause which the latter does. We may be confined in a room by ill health, or confined in any place by way of punishment; but we are never imprisoned but in some specific place appointed for the confinement of offenders, and always on some supposed offence. We are captives by the rights of war, when we fall into the hands of the enemy.

Confinement does not specify the degree or manner as the other terms do; it may even extend to the restricting of the body of its free movements. Imprisonment simply confines the person within a certain extent of ground, or the walls of a prison; 'Confinement of any kind is dreadful: let your imagination acquaint you with what I have not words to express, and conceive, if possible, the horrors of imprisonment, attended with reproach and ignominy.'—JOHNSON. Captivity leaves a person at liberty to range within a whole country or district;

There in captivity he lets them dwell
The space of seventy years; then brings them back,
Rememb'ring mercy.—MILTON.

For life, being weary of these worldly bars,
Never lacks power to dismiss itself;
In that each bondman, in his own hand, bears
The power to cancel his captivity:
But I do think it cowardly and vile.—SHAKESPEARE.

Confinement is so general a term, as to be applied to animals and even to inanimate objects; imprisonment and captivity are applied in the proper sense to persons only, but they admit of a figurative application. Poor stray animals, who are found trespassing on unlawful ground, are doomed to a wretched confinement, rendered still more hard and intolerable by the want of food: the confinement of plants within too narrow a space will stop their growth for want of air;

But now my sorrows, long with pain supprest,
Burst their confinement with impetuous sway.
Young

There is many a poor captivity in a cage who, like Sterne's starling, would say, if it could, 'I want to get out.'

FINITE, LIMITED.

Finite, from finis an end, is the natural property of things; and limited, from limes a boundary, is the artificial property: the former is opposite only to the infinite; but the latter, which lies within the finite, is opposed to the unlimited or the infinite. This word is finite, and space infinite; 'Methinks this single consideration of the progress of a finite spirit to perfection will be sufficient to extinguish all envy in inferior natures, and all contempt in superior.'—ADDISON. The power of a prince is sometimes limited; 'Those complaints which we are apt to make of our limited capacity and narrow view, are just as unreasonable as the childish complaints of our not being formed with a microscopic eye.'—BLAIR. It is not in our power to extend the bounds of the finite, but the limited is mostly under our control. We are finite beings, and our capacities are variously limited either by nature or circumstances.

TO RESERVE, RETAIN.

Reserve, from the Latin servo to keep, signifies to keep back; and retain, from teneo to hold, signifies to hold back; they in some measure, therefore, have the same distinction as hold and keep, mentioned in a former article.

To reserve is an act of more specific design; we reserve that which is the particular object of our choice: to retain is a simple exertion of our power; we retain that which is once come into our possession. To reserve is employed only for that which is allowable; we reserve a thing, that is, keep it back with care for some future purpose; 'Augustus caused most of the prophetic books to be burnt, as spurious, reserving only those which bore the name of some of the sibyls for their authors.'—PRIDEAUX. To retain is often an unlawful act, as when a debtor retains in his hands the money which he has borrowed; sometimes it is simply an unreasonable act; 'They who have restored painting in Germany, not having seen any of those fair relics of antiquity, have retained much of that barbarous method.'—DRYDEN.

Reserve, whether in the proper or improper application, is employed only as the act of a conscious agent; retain is often the act of an unconscious agent: we reserve what we have to say on a subject until a more suitable opportunity offers; 'Conceal your esteem and love in your own breast, and reserve your kind looks and language for private hours.'—SWIFT. The mind retains the impressions of external objects, by its peculiar faculty, the memory; certain substances are said to retain the colour with which they have been dyed; 'Whatever ideas the mind can receive and contemplate without the help of the body, it is reasonable to conclude it can retain without the help of the body too.'—LOCKE. 'The beauties of Homer are difficult to be lost, and those of Virgil to be retained.'—JOHNSON.

RESERVE, RESERVATION.

Reserve and reservation, from servo to keep, both signify a keeping back, but differ as to the object and the circumstance of the action. Reserve is applied in a good sense to any thing natural or moral which is kept back to be employed for a better purpose on a future occasion: reservation is an artful keeping back for selfish purposes: there is a prudent reserve which every man ought to maintain in his discourse with a stranger; equivocators deal altogether in mental reservation; 'There is no maxim in politics more indisputable than that a nation should have many honours in reserve for those who do national services.'—ADDISON. 'There be three degrees of this hiding and veiling of a man's self: first reservation and secrecy, second dissimulation in the negative; and the third simulation.'—BACON.

TO KEEP, PRESERVE, SAVE.

To keep has the same original meaning here as explained under the article To hold, keep; to preserve compounded of pre and the Latin servo to keep, signifies to keep away from all mischief; save signifies to keep safe.

The idea of having in one's possession is common to all these terms: which is, however, the simple meaning of keep; to preserve is to keep with care and free from all injury, to save is to keep laid up in a safe place, and free from destruction. Things are kept at all times, and under all circumstances; they are preserved in circumstances of peculiar difficulty and danger; they are saved in the moment in which they are threatened with destruction; things are kept at pleasure; 'We are resolved to keep an established church, an established monarchy, an established aristocracy, and an established democracy, each in the degree it exists and no greater.'—BURKE. Things are preserved by an exertion of power; 'A war to preserve national independence, property, and liberty, from certain universal havoc, is a war just and necessary'—BURKE. Things are saved by the use of extraordinary means; 'If any thing defensive can possibly save us from the disasters of a regicide peace, Mr. Pitt is the man to save us.'—BURKE. The shepherd keeps his flock by simply watching over them; children are sometimes wonderfully preserved in the midst of the greatest dangers; things are frequently saved in the midst of fire, by the exertions of those present.

KEEPING, CUSTODY.

Keeping is as before the most general term; custody, in Latin custodia and custos, comes in all probability from cura care, because care is particularly required in keeping. The keeping amounts to little more than having purposely in one's possession; but custody is a particular kind of keeping, for the purpose of preventing an escape: inanimate objects may be in one's keeping; but prisoners or that which is in danger of getting away, is placed in custody: a person has in his keeping that which he values as the property of an absent friend; 'Life and all its enjoyments would be scarce worth the keeping, if we were under a perpetual dread of losing them.'—SPECTATOR. The officers of justice get into their custody those who have offended against the laws, or such property as has been stolen; 'Prior was suffered to live in his own house under the custody of a messenger, until he was examined before a committee of the Privy Council.'—JOHNSON.

TO SAVE, SPARE, PRESERVE, PROTECT.

To save signifies the same as in the preceding article; spare, in German sparen, comes from the Latin parco, and the Hebrew פָּרַק to free; to preserve signifies the same as in the preceding article; and protect, the same as under the article To defend, protect.

The idea of keeping free from evil is common to all these terms, and the peculiar signification of the term save; they differ either in the nature of the evil kept off, or the circumstances of the agent: we may be saved from every kind of evil; but we are spared only from those which it is in the power of another to inflict: we may be saved from falling, or saved from an illness; a criminal is spared from the punishment, or we may be spared by Divine Providence in the midst of some calamity: we may be saved and spared from all evils, large or small; we are preserved and protected mostly from evils of magnitude; we may be saved either from the inclemency of the weather, or the fatal vicissitudes of life, or from destruction here and hereafter;

A wondrous ark

To save himself and household from amidst
A world devote to universal wreck.—MILTON.

We may be spared the pain of a disagreeable meeting, or we may be spared our lives;

Let Caesar spread his conquests far,
Less pleased to triumph than to spare.—JOHNSON.

We are preserved from ruin, or protected from oppression; 'Cortes was extremely solicitous to preserve the city of Mexico as much as possible from being destroyed.'—ROBERTSON.

How poor a thing is man, whom death itself
Cannot protect from injuries.—RANDOLPH.

To save and spare apply to evils that are actual and temporary; preserve and protect to those which are possible or permanent: we may be saved from drowning, or we may save a thing instead of throwing it away;

Atilius sacrific'd himself to save
That faith which to his barb'rous foes he gave.
DENHAM.

A person may be spared from the sentence of the law,
or spared a pain;

Spare my sight the pain
Of seeing what a world of tears it costs you.
DRYDEN

We preserve with care that which is liable to injury, or protect ourselves against the attacks of robbers.

To save may be the effect of accident or design; to spare is always the effect of some design or connexion; to preserve and protect are the effect of a special exertion of power; the latter in a still higher degree than the former: we may be preserved, by ordinary means, from the evils of human life; but we are protected by the government, or by Divine Providence, from the active assaults of those who aim at doing us mischief

TO DEFEND, PROTECT, VINDICATE.

To defend, which signifies literally to keep off any evil (v. To guard), is closely allied to protect, which comes from the Latin protectum, participle of protego, compounded of pro and tego, signifies to put any thing before a person as a covering, and also to vindicate, which comes from the Latin vindicco and the Greek ἐνδικῶν to avenge by bringing an offender to justice.

Defend is a general term; it defines nothing with regard to the degree and manner of the action: protect is a particular and positive term, expressing an action of some considerable importance. Persons may defend others without distinction of rank or station: none but superiours protect their inferiours. Defence is an occasional action; protection is a permanent action. A person may be defended in any particular case of actual danger or difficulty; he is protected from what may happen as well as what does happen. Defence respects the evil that threatens; 'A master may justify an assault in defence of his servant, and a servant in defence of his master.'—BLACKSTONE. Protection involves the supply of necessities and the affording of comforts; 'They who protected the weakness of our infancy are entitled to our protection in their old age.'—BLACKSTONE.

Defence requires some active exertion either of body or mind; protection may consist only of the extension of power in behalf of any, particular. A defence is successful or unsuccessful; a protection weak or strong. A soldier defends his country; a counsellor defends his client: 'Savage (on his trial for the murder of Sinclair) did not deny the fact, but endeavoured to justify it by the necessity of self-defence, and the hazard of his own life if he had lost the opportunity of giving the thrust'—JOHNSON. A prince protects his subjects;

First give thy faith and plight, a prince's word,
Of sure protection by thy power and sword;
For I must speak what wisdom would conceal,
And truth invidious to the great reveal.—POPE.

Henry the Eighth styled himself defender of the faith (that is of the Romish faith) at the time that he was subverting the whole religious system of the Catholics: Oliver Cromwell styled himself protector at the time that he was overturning the government.

In a figurative and extended sense, things may either defend or protect with a similar distinction: a coat defends us from the inclemencies of the weather;

How shall the vine with tender leaves defend
Her teeming clusters when the rains descend?
DRYDEN.

Houses are a protection not only against the changes of the seasons, but also against the violence of men;

Some to the holly hedge
Nestling repair, and to the thicket some:
Some to the rude protection of the thorn
Commit their feeble offspring.—THOMSON.

To vindicate is a species of defence only in the moral sense of the word. Acts of importance are defended; those of trifling import are commonly vindicated

Cicero defended Mno against the charge of murder, in which he was implicated by the death of Clodius; a child or a servant vindicates himself when any blame is attached to him. Defence is employed either in matters of opinion or conduct; vindicate only in matters of conduct. No absurdities are too great to want occasional defenders among the various advocates to free inquiry; 'While we can easily defend our character, we are no more disturbed at an accusation, than we are alarmed by an enemy whom we are sure to conquer.'—JOHNSON. He who vindicates the conduct of another should be fully satisfied of the innocence of the person whom he defends; 'In this poem (the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot), Pope seems to reckon with the publick. He vindicates himself from censures, and with dignity rather than arrogance, enforces his claims to kindness and respect.'—POPE.

DEFENDANT, DEFENDER.

The defendant defends himself (v. To defend); the defender defends another. We are defendants when any charge is brought against us which we wish to refute; 'Of what consequence could it be to the cause whether the counsellor did or did not know the defendant?'—SMOLLET. We are defenders when we undertake to rebut or refute the charge brought against another; 'The abbot of Paisley was a warm partizan of France, and a zealous defender of the established religion.'—ROBERTSON.

DEFENDER, ADVOCATE, PLEADER.

A defender exerts himself in favour of one that wants support: an advocate, in Latin advocatus, from advoco to call to one's aid, signified originally one who was called into court to speak in behalf of his friend, and who if he pleaded his cause was styled patronus; 'Qui defendit alterum in judicio, aut patronus dicitur, si orator est; aut advocatus si aut jus suggerit, aut præsentiam suam commodat amico.'—ASCONIUS IN CLEA. A pleader, from plea or excuse, signifies one who brings forward pleas in favour of him that is accused. These terms are now employed more in a general than a technical sense, which brings them into still closer alliance with each other. A defender attempts to keep off the threatened injury by rebutting the attack of another; an advocate states that which is to the advantage of the person or thing advocated: a pleader throws in pleas and extenuations: he blends entreaty with argument. Oppressed or accused persons and disputed opinions require defenders; 'But the time was now come when Warburton was to change his opinion, and Pope was to find a defender in him who had contributed so much to the exaltation of his rival.'—JOHNSON. That which falls in with the humours of men will always have advocates; 'It is said that some endeavours were used to incense the queen against Savage, but he found advocates to obviate at least part of their effect.'—JOHNSON. The unfortunate and the guilty require pleaders;

Next call the pleader from his learned strife,
To the calm blessings of a learned life.

HORNECK.

St. Paul was a bold defender of the faith which is in Christ Jesus. Epicurus has been charged with being the advocate for pleasure in its gross and sensual sense, whence the advocates for sensual indulgences have been termed Epicureans. Veturia and Volumnia, the wife and mother of Coriolanus, were pleaders in behalf of the Roman republick, too powerful for him to be able to refuse their request.

DEFENSIBLE, DEFENSIVE.

Defensible is employed for the thing that is defended: defensive for the thing that defends. An opinion or a line of conduct is defensible; a weapon or a military operation is defensive. The defensible is opposed to the indefensible; and the defensive to the offensive.

It is the height of folly to attempt to defend that which is indefensible; 'Impressing is only defensible from publick necessity, to which all private considerations must give way.'—BLACKSTONE. It is sometimes prudent to act on the defensive, when we are not in a condition to commence the offensive; 'A king circumstanced as the present king (of France) has no generous interest that can excite him to action. At best his conduct will be passive and defensive.'—BURKE.

TO GUARD, DEFEND, WATCH.

Guard is but a variation of ward and guarantee, &c., which comes from the Teutonic wahren to look to; watch and wake, through the medium of the northern languages, are derived from the Latin vigil watchful, vigeo to flourish, and the Greek ἀγάλλω to exult or be in spirits.

Guard seems to include in it the idea of both defend and watch, inasmuch as one aims to keep off danger, by personal efforts; guard comprehends the signification of defend, inasmuch as one employs one's powers to keep off the danger. Guard comprehends the idea of watch, inasmuch as one employs one's eyes to detect the danger; one defends and watches, therefore, when one guards; but one does not always guard when one defends or watches.

To defend is employed in a case of actual attack; to guard is to defend by preventing the attack; the soldier guards the palace of the king in time of peace;

Fix'd on defence, the Trojans are not slow

To guard their shore from an expected foe.

DRYDEN.

He defends the power and kingdom of his prince in time of war, or the person of the king in the field of battle;

Forthwith on all sides to his aid was run,
By angels many and strong, who interpos'd
Defence.—MILTON.

One guards in cases where resistance is requisite, and attack is threatened; one watches in cases where an unresisting enemy is apprehended: soldiers or armed men are employed to guard those who are in custody: children are set to watch the corn which is threatened by the birds: hence it is that those are termed guards who surround the person of the monarch, and those are termed watchmen who are employed by night, to watch for thieves and give the alarm, rather than make any attack.

In the improper application they have a similar sense: modesty guards female honour; it enables her to present a bold front to the daring violator; 'Modesty is not only an ornament, but also a guard to virtue.'—ADDISON. Clothing defends against the inclemency of the weather;

And here th' access a gloomy grove defends,
And here th' unnavigable lake extends.—DRYDEN

Watching is frequently employed not merely to prevent an external evil, but also for the attainment of some object of desire; thus a person watches an opportunity to escape, or watches the countenance of another;

But see the well-plum'd hearse comes nodding on Stately and slow, and properly attended
By the whole sable tribe, that painful watch
The sick man's door, and live upon the dead.

BLAIR.

The love of his subjects is the king's greatest safe guard; walls are no defence against an enraged multitude; it is necessary for every man to set a watch upon his lips, lest he suffer that to escape from him of which he may afterward repent.

GUARD, SENTINEL.

These terms are employed to designate those who are employed for the protection of either persons or things; but the sentinel, in French sentinelle, is properly a species of guard, namely, a military guard in the time of a campaign: any one may be set as guard over property, who is empowered to keep off every intruder by force; but the sentinel acts in the army as the watch in the police, rather to observe the motions of the enemy, than to repel any force;

Fast as he could, he sighing quits the walls,
And thus descending on the guards he calls.

POPE.

'One of the sentinels who stood on the stage to prevent disorder, burst into tears.'—STEELE. In the moral acceptation of the terms, the guard acts in ordinary cases, where there is no immediate danger, but the sentinel where one is surrounded with danger; Conscience is the sentinel of virtue."—JOHNSON.

GUARD, GUARDIAN.

These words are derived from the verb guard (v. To guard); but they have acquired a distinct office.

Guard is used either in the literal or figurative sense; guardian only in the improper sense. Guard is applied either to persons or things; guardian only to persons. In application to persons, the guard is temporary; the guardian is fixed and permanent: the guard only guards against external evils; the guardian takes upon him the office of parent, counsellor, and director: when a house is in danger of being attacked, a person may sit up as a guard; when the parent is dead, the guardian supplies his place: we expect from a guard nothing but human assistance; but from our guardian angel we may expect supernatural assistance;

Him Hermes to Achilles shall convey,
Guard of his life, and partner of his way.

POPE.

Ye guides and guardians of our Argive race!
Come all! let gen'rous rage your arms employ,
And save Patroclus from the dogs of Troy.

POPE.

In an extended application they preserve a similar distinction; 'He must be trusted to his own conduct, since there cannot always be a guard upon him, except what you put into his own mind by good principles.'—LOCKE. 'It then becomes the common concern of all that have truth at heart, and more especially of those who are the appointed guardians of the Christian faith, to be upon the watch against seducers.'

WATERLAND.

TO GUARD AGAINST, TAKE HEED.

Both these terms simply express care on the part of the agent; but the former is used with regard to external or internal evils, the latter only with regard to internal or mental evils: in an enemy's country it is essential to be particularly on one's guard, for fear of a surprise; in difficult matters, where we are liable to err, it is of importance to take heed lest we run from one extreme to another: young men, on their entrance into life, cannot be too much on their guard against associating with those who would lead them into expensive pleasures; 'One would take more than ordinary care to guard one's self against this particular imperfection (changeableness), because it is that which our nature very strongly inclines us to.'—ADDISON. In slippery paths, whether physically or morally understood, it is necessary to take heed how we go; 'Take heed of that dreadful tribunal where it will not be enough to say that I thought this or I heard that.'—SOUTH.

TO APOLOGIZE, DEFEND, JUSTIFY, EXCULPATE, EXCUSE, PLEAD.

Apologize, from the French apologie, Greek ἀπολογία, and ἀπολογέομαι, compounded of ἀπό from away, and λέγω to speak, signifies to do away by speaking; defend, in French défendre, Latin defendo, compounded of de and fendo, signifies to keep or ward off; justify, in French justifier, Latin justifico, compounded of justus and facio, signifies to make or set right, that is, to set one's self right with others; exculpate, in Latin exculpatus, participle of exculpo, compounded of ex and culpa, signifies to get out of a fault; excuse, in French excuser, Latin excuso, compounded of ex and causa, signifies to get out of any cause or affair; plead, in French plaider, may either come from placitum or placendum, or be contracted from appellatum.

There is always some imperfection supposed or real which gives rise to an apology,* with regard to persons it presupposes a consciousness of impropriety, if not of guilt; we apologize for an error by acknowledging ourselves guilty of it: a defence presupposes a consciousness of innocence more or less; we defend ourselves against a charge by proving its fallacy: a justification is founded on the conviction not only of entire innocence, but of strict propriety; we justify our conduct against any imputation by proving that it was blameless: exculpation rests on the conviction of innocence with regard to the fact; we exculpate ourselves from all blame by proving that we took no part in the transaction: excuse and plea are not grounded on any idea of innocence; they are rather appeals for favour resting on some collateral circumstance which serves to extenuate; a plea is frequently an idle or unfounded excuse, a frivolous attempt to lessen displeasure; we excuse ourselves for a neglect by alleging indisposition; we plead for forgiveness by solicitation and entreaty.

An apology mostly respects the conduct of individuals with regard to each other as equals: it is a voluntary act springing out of a regard to decorum, or the good opinion of others. To avoid misunderstandings it is necessary to apologize for any omission that wears the appearance of neglect. A defence respects matters of higher importance; the violation of laws or public morals; judicial questions decided in a court, or matters of opinion which are offered to the decision of the public; no one defends himself, but he whose conduct or opinions are called in question. A justification is applicable to all moral cases in common life, whether of a serious nature or otherwise: it is the act of individuals towards each other according to their different stations: no one can demand a justification from another without a sufficient authority, and no one will attempt to justify himself to another whose authority he does not acknowledge: men justify themselves either on principles of honour, or from the less creditable motive of concealing their imperfections from the observation and censure of others. An exculpation is the act of an inferior, it respects the violations of duty towards a superior; it is dictated by necessity, and seduces the offspring of any higher motive than the desire to screen one's self from punishment: exculpation regards offences only of commission; excuse is employed for those of omission as well as commission: we excuse ourselves oftener for what we have not done, than for what we have done; it is the act of persons in all stations, and arises from various motives dishonourable or otherwise: a person may often have substantial reasons to excuse himself from doing a thing, or for not having done it; an excuse may likewise sometimes be the refuge of idleness and selfishness. To plead is properly a judicial act, and extended in its sense to the ordinary concerns of life; it is mostly employed for the benefit of others, rather than ourselves.

Excuse and plea, which are mostly employed in an unfavourable sense, are to apology, defence, and exculpation, as the means to an end: an apology is lame when, instead of an honest confession of an unintentional error, an idle attempt is made at justification: a defence is poor when it does not contain sufficient to invalidate the charge: a justification is nugatory when it applies to conduct altogether wrong: an excuse or a plea is frivolous or idle, which turns upon some falsehood, misrepresentation, or irrelevant point.

There are some men who are contented to be the apologists for the vices of others; 'But for this practice (detraction), however vile, some have dared to apologize by contending that the report by which they injured an absent character was true.'—HAWKESWORTH. No man should hold precepts secretly which he is not prepared to defend openly; 'Attacked by great injuries, the man of mild and gentle spirit will feel what human nature feels, and will defend and resent as his duty allows him.'—BLAIR. It is a habit with some people contracted in early life to justify themselves on every "Apology for the Bible;" by which, bearing in mind the original meaning of the word, he wished to imply an attempt to do away the alleged imperfections of the Bible, or to do away the objections made to it. Whether the learned prelate might not have used a less classical, but more intelligible expression for such a work, is a question which, happily for mankind it is not necessary now to decide.

* According to the vulgar acceptance of the term, this imperfection is always presumed to be real in the thing for which we apologize; but the bishop of Landaff did not use the term in this sense when he wrote his occasion, from a reluctance which they feel to acknowledge themselves in an error;

Whatever private views and passions plead,
No cause can justify so black a deed.

THOMSON.

When several are involved in a general charge each seeks to exculpate himself 'A good child will not seek to exculpate herself at the expense of the most revered characters.'—RICHARDSON. A plea of incapacity is often set up to excuse remissness, which is in fact but the refuge of idleness and indolence; 'The strength of his passions will never be accepted as an excuse for complying with them.'—SPECTATOR. It is the boast of Englishmen that, in their courts of judicature, the poor man's plea will be heard with as much attention as that of his rich neighbour; 'Poverty on this occasion pleads her cause very notably, and represents to her old landlord that should she be driven out of the country, all their trades, arts, and sciences would be driven out with her.'—ADDISON.

TO EXCUSE, PARDON.

We excuse (v. To apologize) a person or thing by exempting him from blame; we pardon (from the prepositive par or per and dono to give) by giving up or not insisting on the punishment of another for his offence.

We excuse a small fault, we pardon a great fault: we excuse that which personally affects ourselves; we pardon that which offends against morals: we may excuse as equals; we can pardon only as superiours. We exercise good nature in excusing; we exercise generosity or mercy in pardoning. Friends excuse each other for the unintentional omission of formalities:

I will not quarrel with a slight mistake
Such as our nature's frailty may excuse.

ROSCOMMON.

It is the privilege of the prince to pardon criminals whose offences will admit of pardon;

But infinite in pardon is my judge.—MILTON.

The violation of good manners is inexcusable in those who are cultivated; falsehood is unpardonable even in a child.

VENIAL, PARDONABLE.

Venial, from the Latin venia pardon or indulgence, is applied to what may be tolerated without express disparagement to the individual, or direct censure; but the pardonable is that which may only escape severe censure, but cannot be allowed; garrulity is a venial offence in old age; 'While the clergy are employed in extirpating mortal sins, I should be glad to rally the world out of indecencies and venial transgressions.'—CUMBERLAND. Levity in youth is pardonable in single instances; 'The weaknesses of Elizabeth were not confined to that period of life when they are more pardonable.'—ROBERTSON.

TO EXONERATE, EXCULPATE.

Exonerate, from onus a burthen, signifies literally to take off a burthen, either physically, as in the sense of relieving the body from a burthen;

This tyrant God, the belly! Take that from us
With all its bestial appetites, and man,
Exonerated man, shall be all soul.—CUMBERLAND.

Or in the moral application of relieving from the burthen of a charge or of guilt; to exculpate, from culpa a fault or blame, is to throw off the blame: the first is the act of another; the second is one's own act: we exonerate him upon whom a charge has lain, or who has the load of guilt; we exculpate ourselves when there is any danger of being blamed: circumstances may sometimes tend to exonerate; the explanation of some person is requisite to exculpate: in a case of dishonesty the absence of an individual at the moment when the act was committed will altogether exonerate him from suspicion; it is fruitless for any one to attempt to exculpate himself from the charge of faithlessness who is detected in conniving at the dishonesty of others; 'By this fond and easy acceptance of exculpatory comment, Pope testified that he had not intentionally attacked religion.'—JOHNSON.

TO EXTENUATE, PALLIATE.

Extenuate, from the Latin tenuis thin, small, signifies literally to make small; palliate, in Latin *palliatu*s, participle of pallio, from pallium a cloak, signifies to throw a cloak over a thing so that it may not be seen.

These terms are both applicable to the moral conduct, and express the act of lessening the guilt of any impropriety. To extenuate is simply to lessen guilt without reference to the means: to palliate is to lessen it by means of art. To extenuate is rather the effect of circumstances: to palliate is the direct effort of an individual. Ignorance in the offender may serve as an extenuation of his guilt, although not of his offence: 'Savage endeavoured to extenuate the fact (of having killed Sinclair), by urging the suddenness of the whole action.'—JOHNSON. It is but a poor palliation of a man's guilt, to say that his crimes have not been attended with the mischief which they were calculated to produce; 'Mons. St. Evremont had endeavoured to palliate the superstitions of the Roman Catholic religion.'—ADDISON.

TO ABSOLVE, ACQUIT, CLEAR.

Absolve, in Latin absolvere, is compounded of ab from and solvere to loose, signifying to loose from that with which one is bound; acquit, in French acquitter, is compounded of the intensive syllable ac or ad, and quit, quitter, in Latin quietus quiet, signifying to make easy by the removal of a charge; to clear is to make clear.

These three words convey an important distinction between the act of the Creator and the creature.

To absolve is the free act of an omnipotent and merciful being towards sinners; to acquit is the act of an earthly tribunal towards supposed offenders; by absolution we are released from the bondage of sin, and placed in a state of favour with God; by an acquittal we are released from the charge of guilt, and reinstated in the good estimation of our fellow-creatures.

Absolution is obtained not from our own merits, but the atoning merits of a Redeemer; acquittal is an act of justice due to the innocence of the individual. Absolution is the work of God only; by him alone it can be made known to the penitent offender;

Yet to be secret makes not sin the less;

'Tis only hidden from the vulgar view,

Maintains indeed the reverence due to princes,
But not absolves the conscience from the crime.

DRYDEN

Acquittal is the work of man only; by him alone it is pronounced; 'The fault of Mr. Savage was rather negligence than ingratitude; but Sir Richard Steele must likewise be acquitted of severity; for who is there that can patiently bear contempt from one whom he has relieved and supported?'—JOHNSON

Although but few individuals may have occasion for acquittal; yet we all stand in daily and hourly need of absolution at the hands of our Creator and Redeemer

One is absolved (v. To absolve) from an oath, acquitted of a charge, and cleared from actual guilt, that is, made clearly free.

No one can absolve from an oath but he to whom the oath is made; no one can acquit another of a charge but he who has the right of substantiating the charge; yet any one may clear himself or another from guilt, or the suspicion of guilt, who has adequate proofs of innocence to allege.

The Pope has assumed to himself the right of absolving subjects at pleasure from their oath of allegiance to their sovereign; but as an oath is made to God only, it must be his immediate act to cancel the obligation which binds men's consciences;

Compell'd by threats to take that bloody oath,
And the act ill, I am absolv'd by both.—WALLER.

It is but justice to acquit a man of blame, who is enabled to clear himself from the appearance of guilt; 'Those who are truly learned will acquit me in this point, in which I have been so far from offending, that I have been scrupulous perhaps to a fault in quoting the authors of several passages which I have made my own.'—ADDISON. 'In vain we attempt to clear our conscience by affecting to compensate for fraud or cruelty by acts of strict religious homage towards God.'—BLAIR.

TO GUARANTEE, BE SECURITY, BE RESPONSIBLE, WARRANT.

Guarantee and warrant are both derived from the Teutonic wahren to look to; to be security is to be that which makes secure; and to be responsible, from the Latin respondere to answer, is to take upon one's self to answer for another.

Guarantee is a term of higher import than the others: one guarantees for others in matters of contract and stipulation: security is employed in matters of right and justice; one may be security for another, or give security for one's self: responsibility is employed in moral concerns; we take the responsibility upon ourselves: warrant is employed in civil and commercial concerns; we warrant for that which concerns ourselves.

We guarantee by virtue of our power and the confidence of those who accept the guarantee; it is given by means of a word, which is accepted as a pledge for the future performance of a contract; governments, in order to make peace, frequently guarantee for the performance of certain stipulations by powers of minor importance; 'The people of England, then, are willing to trust to the sympathy of regicides, the guarantee of the British monarchy.'—BURKE. We are security by virtue of our wealth and credit; the security is not confined to a simple word, it is always accompanied with some legitimate act that binds, it regards the payment of money for another; tradesmen are frequently security for others who are not supposed sufficiently wealthy to answer for themselves; 'Richard Cromwell desired only security for the debts he had contracted.'

—BURNET. We are responsible by virtue of one's office and relation; the responsibility binds for the reparation of injuries; teachers are responsible for the good conduct of the children intrusted to their care: one warrants by virtue of one's knowledge and situation: 'What a dreadful thing is a standing army, for the conduct of the whole or of any part of which no one is responsible.'—BURKE. The warrant binds to make restitution; the seller warrants his articles on sale to be such as are worth the purchase, or in case of defectiveness to be returned; and in a moral application things are said to warrant or justify a person in forming conclusions or pursuing a line of conduct; 'No man's mistake will be able to warrant an unjust surmise, much less justify a false censure.'—SOUTH. A king guarantees for the transfer of the lands of one prince, on his decease, into the possession of another; when men have neither honour nor money, they must get others to be security for them, if any can be found sufficiently credulous; in England masters are responsible for all the mischiefs done by their servants; a tradesman who stands upon his reputation will be careful not to warrant any thing which he is not assured will stand the trial.

ANSWERABLE, RESPONSIBLE, ACCOUNTABLE, AMENABLE.

Answerable signifies ready or able to answer for; responsible, from respondere to answer, has a similar meaning in its original sense; accountable, from account, signifies able or ready to give an account; amenable, from the French amener to lead, signifies liable to be led.

We are answerable for a demand; responsible for a trust; accountable for our proceedings; and amenable to the laws. When a man's credit is firmly established he will have occasions to be answerable for those in less flourishing circumstances: every one becomes responsible more or less in proportion to the confidence which is reposed in his judgement and integrity: we are all accountable beings, either to one another, or at least to the great Judge of all; when a man sincerely wishes to do right, he will have no objection to be amenable to the laws of his country.

An honest man will not make himself answerable for any thing which it is above his ability to fulfil; 'That he might render the execution of justice strict and regular, Alfred divided all England into counties, these counties he subdivided into hundreds, and the hundreds into tithings. Every householder was answerable for the behaviour of his family and his slaves, and even of his guests if they lived above three days in his house.'—HUME. A prudent man will avoid a too heavy responsibility; 'As a person's responsibility bears respect to his reason, so do human punishments bear respect to his responsibility; infants and boys are chastised by the hand of the parent or the master; rational adults are amenable to the laws.'—CUMBERLAND. An upright man never refuses to be accountable to any who are invested with proper authority. 'We know that we are the subjects of a Supreme Righteous Governour, to whom we are accountable for our conduct.'—BLAIR. A conscientious man makes himself amenable to the wise regulations of society.

FENCE, GUARD, SECURITY

Fence, from the Latin fendo to fend or keep off, serves to prevent the attack of an external enemy; guard, which is but a variety of ward, from the old German wahren to look to, and wachen to watch, signifies that which keeps from any danger; security implies that which secures or prevents injury, mischief, and loss.

The fence in the proper sense is an inanimate object; the guard is a living agent; the former is of permanent utility, the latter acts to a partial extent: in the figurative sense they retain the same distinction. Modesty is a fence to a woman's virtue; the love of the subject is the monarch's greatest safeguard. There are prejudices which favour religion and subordination, that act as fences against the introduction of licentious principles into the juvenile or enlightened mind; 'Whatever disregard certain modern refiners of morality may attempt to throw on all the instituted means of public religion, they must in their lowest view be considered as the out-guards and fences of virtuous conduct.'—BLAIR. A proper sense of an overruling providence will serve as a guard to prevent the admission of improper thoughts; 'Let the heart be either wounded by sore distress, or agitated by violent emotions: and you shall presently see that virtue without religion is inadequate to the government of life. It is destitute of its proper guard, of its firmest support, of its chief encouragement.'—BLAIR. The guard only stands at the entrance, to prevent the ingress of evil: the security stops up all the avenues, it locks up with firmness. A guard serves to prevent the ingress of every thing that may have an evil intention or tendency: the security rather secures the possession of what one has, and prevents a loss. A king has a guard about his person to keep off all violence. The security may either secure against the loss of property or against the loss of any external advantage or moral benefit; 'The Romans do not seem to have known the secret of paper money or securities upon mortgages.'—ARBUCHNOT.

DEPOSITE, PLEDGE, SECURITY.

Deposite is a general term from the Latin deponitus, participle of depono to lay down, or put into the hands of another, signifying that which is laid down or given in charge, as a guarantee for the performance of an engagement; pledge, comes probably from plico, signifying what engages by a tie or envelope; security signifies that which makes secure.

The deposite has most regard to the confidence we place in another; the pledge has most regard to the security we give for ourselves; security is a species of pledge. A deposite is always voluntarily placed in the hands of an indifferent person; a pledge and security are required from the parties who are interested. A person may make a deposite for purposes of charity or convenience; he gives a pledge or security for a temporary accommodation, or the relief of a necessity. Money is deposited in the hands of a friend in order to execute a commission: a pledge is given as an equivalent for that which has been received: a security is given by way of security for the performance.

A deposite may often serve the purpose of a security; but it need not contain any thing so binding as either a pledge or a security; both of which involve a loss on the non-fulfilment of a certain contract. A pledge is given for matters purely personal; a security is given in behalf of another.

Deposites are always transportable articles, consisting either of money, papers, jewels, or other valuables: a pledge is seldom pecuniary, but it is always some article of positive value, as estates, furniture, and the like, given at the moment of forming the contra security is always pecuniary, but it often consists of a promise, and not of any immediate resignation of one's property. Deposites are made and securities given by the wealthy; pledges are commonly given by those who are in distress.

These words bear a similar distinction in the figurative application; 'It is without reason we praise the wisdom of our constitution, in putting under the discretion of the crown the awful trust of war and peace, if the ministers of the crown virtually return it again into our hands. The trust was placed there as a sacred deposit, to secure us against popular rashness in plunging into wars.'—BURKE.

These garments once were his, and left to me,
The pledges of his promised loyalty.—DRYDEN.

'It is possible for a man, who hath the appearance of religion, to be wicked and a hypocrite; but it is impossible for a man who openly declares against religion, to give any reasonable security that he will not be false and cruel.'—SWIFT.

EARNEST, PLEDGE.

In the proper sense, the earnest (v. Eager) is given as a token of our being in earnest in the promise we have made; the pledge, in all probability from plico to fold or implicate, signifies a security by which we are engaged to indemnify for a loss.

The earnest has regard to the confidence inspired; the pledge has regard to the bond or tie produced: when a contract is only verbally formed, it is usual to give earnest; whenever money is advanced, it is common to give a pledge.

In the figurative application the terms bear the same analogy: a man of genius sometimes, though not always, gives an earnest in youth of his future greatness;

Nature has wove into the human mind
This anxious care for names we leave behind,
'T' extend our narrow views beyond the tomb,
And give an earnest of a life to come.—JENYNS.

Children are the dearest pledges of affection between parents;

Fairest of stars, last in the train of night,
If better thou belong not to the dawn,
Sure pledge of day that crown'st the smiling morn,
With thy bright circlet praise him in thy sphere.
MILTON.

TO APPOINT, ORDER, PRESCRIBE, ORDAIN.

To appoint (v. Allot) is either the act of an equal or superior: we appoint a meeting with any one at a given time and place; a king appoints his ministers. To order, in French ordre, Latin ordino to arrange, dispose, ordo order, Greek ὄρος a row of trees, which is the symbol of order, is the act of one invested with a partial authority: a customer orders a commodity from his tradesman: a master gives his orders to his servant. To prescribe, in Latin prescribo, compounded of pre before, and scribo to write, signifying to draw a line for a person, is the act of one who is superior by virtue of his knowledge: a physician prescribes to his patient. To ordain, which is a variation of order, is an act emanating from the highest authority: kings and councils ordain; but their ordinances must be conformable to what is ordained by the Divine Being.

Appointments are made for the convenience of individuals or communities; but they may be altered or annulled at the pleasure of the contracting parties;

Majestic month's

Set out with him to their appointed race.—DRYDEN.

Orders are dictated by the superior only, but they presuppose a discretionary obligation on the part of the individual to whom they are given; 'Upon this new fright an order was made by both Houses for disarming all papists.'—CLARENDON. Prescriptions are binding on none but such as voluntarily admit their authority; 'It will be found a work of no small difficulty, to dispossess a vice from that heart, where long possession begins to plead prescription.'—SOUTH. Ordinances leave no choice to those on whom they are imposed to accept or reject them: the ordinances of man are not less binding than those of God, so long as they do not expressly contradict the Divine law; 'It seemeth hard to plant any sound ordinance, or reduce them (the Irish) to a civil government; since all their ill customs are permitted unto them.'—SPENSER.

Appointments are kept, orders executed or obeyed, prescriptions followed, ordinances submitted to. It is a point of politeness or honour, if not of direct moral obligation, to keep the appointments which we have made. Interest will lead men to execute the orders which they receive in the course of business: duty obliges them to obey the orders of their superiors. It is a nice matter to prescribe to another without hurting his pride: this principle leads men often to regard the counsels of their best friends as prescriptions: with children it is an unquestionable duty to follow the prescriptions of those whose age, station, or experience, authorize them to prescribe; 'Sir Francis Bacon, in his Essay upon Health, has not thought it improper to prescribe to his reader a poem or a prospect, where he particularly dissuades him from knotty or subtle disquisitions.'—ADDISON. God has ordained all things for our good; it rests with ourselves to submit to his ordinances and be happy; 'It was perhaps ordained by Providence to hinder us from tyrannizing over one another, that no individual should be of such importance as to cause by his retirement or death any chasm in the world.'—JOHNSON. Sometimes the word order is taken in the sense of direct and regulate, which brings it still nearer to the word ordain. God is said to ordain, as an act of power; he is said to order, as an act of wisdom; 'The whole course of things is so ordered, that we neither by an irregular and precipitate education become men too soon; nor by a fond and trifling indulgence be suffered to continue children for ever.'—BLAIR.

TO DICTATE, PRESCRIBE.

Dictate, from the Latin dictatus and dictum, a word, signifies to make a word for another; and prescribe literally signifies to write down for another (v. To appoint), in which sense the former of these terms is used technically for a principal who gets his secretary to write down his words as he utters them; and the latter for a physician who writes down for his patient what he wishes him to take as a remedy. They are used figuratively for a species of counsel given by a superior: to dictate is however a greater exercise of authority than to prescribe.

To dictate amounts even to more than to command; it signifies commanding with a tone of unwarrantable authority, or still oftener a species of commanding by those who have no right to command; 'it is therefore mostly taken in a bad sense. To prescribe partakes altogether of the nature of counsel, and nothing of command; it serves as a rule to the person prescribed, and is justified by the superior wisdom and knowledge of the person prescribing; it is therefore always taken in an indifferent or a good sense. He who dictates speaks with an adventitious authority; he who prescribes has the sanction of reason.

To dictate implies an entire subservency in the person dictated to: to prescribe carries its own weight with it in the nature of the thing prescribed. Upstarts are ready to dictate even to their superiors on every occasion that offers. 'The physician and divine are often heard to dictate in private company with the same authority which they exercise over their patients and disciples.'—BUTLER. Modest people are often fearful of giving advice lest they should be suspected of prescribing; 'In the form which is prescribed to us (the Lord's Prayer), we only pray for that happiness which is our chief good, and the great end of our existence, when we petition the Supreme for the coming of his kingdom.'—ADDISON.

DICTATE, SUGGESTION.

Dictate signifies the thing dictated, and has an imperative sense as in the former case (v. To dictate) suggestion signifies the thing suggested, and conveys the idea of being secretly or in a gentle manner proposed.

The dictate comes from the conscience, the reason, or the passion; suggestions spring from the mind, the will, or the desire. Dictate is taken either in a good or bad sense; suggestion mostly in a bad sense. It is the part of a Christian at all times to listen to the dictates of conscience; it is the characteristic of a weak mind to follow the suggestions of envy. A man renounces the character of a rational being who yields to the dictates of passion; 'When the dictates of honour are contrary to those of religion and equity, they are the greatest deprivations of human nature.'—ADPSON. Whoever does not resist the suggestions of his own evil mind is very far gone in corruption, and will never be able to bear up long against temptation; 'Did not conscience suggest this natural relation between guilt and punishment; the mere principle of approbation or disapprobation, with respect to moral conduct, would prove of small efficacy.'—BLAIR.

Dictate is employed only for what passes inwardly; suggestion may be used for any action on the mind by external objects. No man will err essentially in the ordinary affairs of life who is guided by the dictates of plain sense. It is the lot of sinful mortals to be drawn to evil by the suggestions of Satan as well as their own evil inclinations.

COMMAND, ORDER, INJUNCTION, PRECEPT, MANDATE.

Command, compounded of com and mando, manudo, or dare in manus to give into the hand, signifies giving or appointing as a task; a command is imperative; it is the strongest exercise of authority; order, which in the extended sense of regularity, implies what is done in the way of order, or for the sake of regularity; an order is instructive; it is an expression of the wishes; injunction, in French injunction, from in and jungo, signifies literally to join or bring close to; figuratively to impress on the mind; an injunction is decisive; it is a greater exercise of authority than order, and less than command; precept, in French précepte, Latin præceptum, participle of præcipio, compounded of præ and capio to put or lay before, signifies the thing proposed to the mind; a precept is a moral law; it is binding on the conscience. The three former of these are personal in their application; the latter is general: a command, an order, and an injunction, must be addressed to some particular individual; a precept is addressed to all.

Command and order exclusively flow from the will of the speaker in the ordinary concerns of life; injunction has more regard to the conduct of the person addressed; precept is altogether founded on the moral obligations of men to each other. A command is just or unjust; an order is prudent or imprudent; an injunction is mild or severe; a precept is general or particular.

Command and order are affirmative; injunction or precept are either affirmative or negative: the command and the order oblige us to do a thing; the injunction and precept oblige us to do it, or leave it undone. A sovereign issues his commands, which the well-being of society requires to be instantly obeyed;

'Tis Heav'n commands me, and you urge in vain:

Had any mortal voice the injunction laid,

Nor augur, seer, or priest, had been obey'd.—POPE.

A master gives his orders, which it is the duty of the servant to execute;

A stepdame too I have, a curs'd she,
Who rules my henpeck'd sire, and orders me.

DRYDEN.

This done, Aeneas orders for the close,
The strife of archers with contending bows.

DRYDEN.

A father lays an injunction on his children, which they with filial regard ought to endeavour to follow; 'The duties which religion enjoins us to perform towards God are those which have oftenest furnished matter to the scoffs of the licentious.'—BLAIR. The moralist lays down his precepts, which every rational creature is called upon to practise;

We say not that these ills from virtue flow;
Did her wise precepts rule the world, we know
The golden ages would again begin.—JENYNS.

Mandate, in Latin mandatum, participle of mando, has the same original meaning as command, but is employed to denote a command given by public authority; whence the commands of princes, or the commands of the church, are properly denominated mandates;

'The necessities of the times cast the power of the three estates upon himself, that his mandates should pass for laws, whereby he laid what taxes he pleased'—HOWELL.

COMMANDING, IMPERATIVE, IMPERIOUS, AUTHORITATIVE.

Commanding, which signifies having the force of a command (v. To command), is either good or bad according to circumstances; a commanding voice is necessary for one who has to command; but a commanding air is offensive when it is affected;

Oh! that my tongue had every grace of speech,
Great and commanding as the breath of kings.

ROWE.

Imperative from impero, to command, signifying simply in the imperative mood, is applied to things, and used in an indifferent sense; imperious, which signifies literally in the tone or way of command, is used for persons or things in the bad sense: any direction is imperative which comes in the shape of a command, and circumstances are likewise imperative, which act with the force of a command; 'Quitting the dry imperative style of an act of Parliament he (Lord Somers) makes the Lords and Commons fall to a pious legislative ejaculation.'—BURKE. Persons are imperious who exercise their power oppressively;

Fear not, that I shall watch, with servile shame,
Th' imperious looks of some proud Grecian dame.

DRYDEN.

In this manner underlings in office are imperious: necessity is imperious when it leaves us no choice in our conduct. Authoritative, which signifies having authority, or in the way of authority, is mostly applied to persons or things personal in the good sense only; magistrates are called upon to assume an authoritative air when they meet with any resistance; 'Authoritative instructions, mandates issued, which the member (of Parliament) is bound blindly and implicitly to vote and argue for, though contrary to the clearest conviction of his judgement and conscience; these are things utterly unknown to the laws of this land.'—BURKE.

IMPERIOUS, LORDLY, DOMINEERING, OVERBEARING.

All these epithets imply an unseemly exercise or affectation of power or superiority. Imperious, from impero to command, characterizes either the disposition to command without adequate authority, or to convey one's commands in an offensive manner: lordly, signifying like a lord, characterizes the manner of acting the lord: and domineering, from dominus a lord, denotes the manner of ruling like a lord, or rather of attempting to rule: hence a person's temper or his tone is denominated imperious; his air or deportment is lordly; his tone is domineering. A woman of an imperious temper commands in order to be obeyed: she commands with an imperious tone in order to enforce obedience; 'He is an imperious dictator of the principles of vice, and impatient of all contradiction.'—MORE. A person assumes a lordly air in order to display his own importance: he gives orders in a domineering tone in order to make others feel their inferiority. There is always something offensive in imperiousness; there is frequently something ludicrous in that which is lordly; and a mixture of the ludicrous and offensive in that which is domineering: the lordly is an affectation of grandeur where there are the fewest pretensions;

Lords are lordliest in their wine.—MILTON.

The domineering is an affectation of authority where it least exists; 'He who has sunk so far below himself as to have given up his assent to a domineering error is fit for nothing but to be trampled on.'—SOUTHWELL. Lordly is applied even to the brutes who set themselves up above those of their kind; domineering is applied to servants and ignorant people, who have the opportunity of commanding without knowing how to command. A turkey-cock struts about the yard in a lordly style; an upper servant domineers over all that are under him.

The first three of these terms are employed for such as are invested with some sort of power, or endowed with some sort of superiority, however trifling; but overbearing is employed for men in the general relations of society, whether superiors or equals. A man of an imperious temper and some talent will frequently be so overbearing in the assemblies of his equals as to awe the rest into silence, and carry every measure of his own without contradiction; 'I reflected within myself how much society would suffer if such insolent overbearing characters as Leontine were not held in restraint.'—CUMBERLAND. As the petty airs of superiority here described are most common among the uncultivated part of mankind, we may say that the imperious temper shows itself peculiarly in the domestic circle; that the lordly air shows itself in publick; that the domineering tone is most remarkable in the kitchen; and the overbearing behaviour in villages.

TO COMMISSION, AUTHORIZE, EMPOWER.

Commission, from commit, signifies the act of committing, or putting into the hands of another; to authorize signifies to give authority; to empower, to put in possession of the power to do any thing.

The idea of transferring some business to another is common to these terms; the circumstances under which this is performed constitute the difference. We commission in ordinary cases; we authorize and empower in extraordinary cases. We commission in matters where our own will and convenience are concerned; we authorize in matters where our personal authority is requisite; and we empower in matters where the authority of the law is required. A commission is given by the bare communication of one's wishes; we authorize by a positive and formal declaration to that intent; we empower by the transfer of some legal document. A person is commissioned to make a purchase;

*Commission'd in alternate watch they stand,
The sun's bright portals and the skies command.*

POPE.

One is authorized to communicate what has been intrusted to him as a secret, or people are authorized to act any given part; 'A more decisive proof cannot be given of the full conviction of the British nation that the principles of the Revolution did not authorize them to elect kings at pleasure, than their continuing to adopt a plan of hereditary Protestant succession in the old line.'—BURKE. One is empowered to receive money;

*Empower'd the wrath of gods and men to tame,
E'en Jove rever'd the venerable dame.*—POPE.

When commissions pass between equals, the performance of them is an act of civility; but they are frequently given by sovereigns to their subjects; authorizing and empowering are as often directed to inferiours, they are frequently acts of justice and necessity. Judges and ambassadors receive commissions from their prince; 'Princes do not use to send their viceroys unfurnished with patents clearly signifying their commission.'—SOUTH. Servants and subordinate persons are sometimes authorized to act in the name of their employers; magistrates empower the officers of justice to apprehend individuals or enter houses. We are commissioned by persons only; we are authorized sometimes by circumstances; we are empowered by law.

INFLUENCE, AUTHORITY, ASCENDANCY OR ASCENDANT, SWAY.

Influence, from the Latin influo to flow in upon or cause to flow in upon, signifies the power of acting on an object so as to direct or move it; authority, in Latin auctoritas, from auctor the author or prime mover of a thing, signifies that power which is vested in the prime mover; ascendancy or ascendant, from ascend, signifies having the upper hand; sway, like our word swing and the German schweben, comes in all probability from the Hebrew נָחַץ to move, signifying also the power to move an object.

These terms imply power, under different circumstances: influence is altogether unconnected with any right to direct; authority includes the idea of right necessarily: superiority of rank, talent, or property, personal attachment, and a variety of circumstances give influence; it commonly acts by persuasion, and employs engaging manners, so as to determine in favour of what is proposed: superiour wisdom, age, office, and relation, give authority; it determines of itself, and requires no collateral aid: ascendancy and sway are modes of influence, differing only in degree; they both imply an excessive and improper degree of influence over the mind, independent of reason; the former is, however, more gradual in its process, and consequently more confirmed in its nature; the latter may be only temporary, but may be more violent. A person employs many arts, and for a length of time, to gain the ascendancy; but he exerts a sway by a violent stretch of power. It is of great importance for those who have influence, to conduct themselves consistently with their rank and station; 'The influence of France as a republic is equal to a war.'—BURKE. Men are apt to regard the warnings and admonitions of a true friend as an odious assumption of authority; 'Without the force of authority the power of soldiers grows pernicious to their master.'—TEMPLE. Some men voluntarily give themselves up to the ascendancy which a valet or a mistress has gained over them, while the latter exert the most unwarrantable sway to serve their own interested and vicious purposes; 'By the ascendant he had in his understanding, and the dexterity of his nature, he could persuade him very much.'—CLARENDON. 'France, since her revolution, is under the sway of a sect whose leaders, at one stroke, have demolished the whole body of jurisprudence.'—BURKE.

Influence and ascendancy are said likewise of things as well as persons: true religion will have an influence not only on the outward conduct of a man, but the inward affections of his heart; 'Religion hath so great an influence upon the felicity of man, that it ought to be upheld, not only out of a dread of divine vengeance in another world, but out of regard to temporal prosperity.'—TILLOTSON. That man is truly happy in whose mind religion has the ascendancy over every other principle; 'If you allow any passion, even though it be esteemed innocent, to acquire an absolute ascendant, your inward peace will be impaired.'—BLAIR.

POWER, STRENGTH, FORCE, AUTHORITY, DOMINION.

Power, in French pouvoir, comes from the Latin possum to be able; strength denotes the abstract quality of strong; authority signifies the same as in the preceding article; dominion, from dominus a lord, signifies the power of a lord or the exercise of that power; force, from the Latin fortis strong, signifies the abstract quality of strength.

Power is the generic and universal term, comprehending in it that simple principle of nature which exists in all subjects. Strength and force are modes of power. These terms are all used either in a physical or moral application. Power in the physical sense respects whatever causes motion; 'Observing in ourselves that we can at pleasure move several parts of our bodies which were at rest; the effects also that natural bodies are able to produce in one another, occurring every moment to our senses, we both these ways get the idea of power.'—LOCKE. Strength respects that species of power that lies in the vital and muscular parts of the body;

Not founded on the brittle strength of bones.

MILTON

Strength, therefore, is internal, and depends upon the internal organization of the frame; power, on the external circumstances. A man may have strength to move, but not the power if he be bound with cords. Our strength is proportioned to the health of the body, and the firmness of its make; our power may be increased by the help of instruments.

Power may be exerted or otherwise; force is power exerted, or active; bodies have a power of resistance while in a state of rest, but they are moved by a certain force from other bodies;

A ship which hath struck sail, doth run,
By force of that force which before it won.

DONNE

The word power is used technically for the moving force; 'By understanding the true difference between the weight and the power, a man may add such a fitting supplement to the strength of the power, that it shall move any conceivable weight, though it should never so much exceed that force which the power is naturally endowed with.'—WILKINS.

In a moral acceptation power, strength, and force, may be applied to the same objects with a similar distinction, thus we may speak of the power of language generally, the strength of a person's expressions to convey the state of his own mind; and the force of terms as to their extent of meaning and fitness to convey the ideas of those who use them. In this case it is evident that strength and force are here employed as particular properties, but strength is the power actually exerted, and force the power which may be exerted.

Power is either publick or private, which brings it in alliance with authority. Civil power includes in it all that which enables us to have any influence or control over the actions, persons, property, &c. of others;

Hence thou shalt prove my might, and curse the hour,
Thou stoodst a rival of imperial power.—POPE.

Authority is confined to that species of power which is derived from some legitimate source; 'Power arising from strength is always in those who are governed, who are many; but authority arising from opinion is in those who govern, who are few.'—TEMPLE. Power exists independently of all right; authority is founded only on right. A king has often the power to be cruel, but he has never the authority to be so. Subjects have sometimes the power of overturning the government, but they can in no case have the authority. Power may be abused; authority may be exceeded. A sovereign abuses his power, who exercises it for the misery of his subjects; he exceeds his authority, if he deprive them of any right from mere caprice or humour.

Power may be seized either by fraud or force; authority is derived from some present law, or delegated by a higher power. Despotism is an assumed power, it acknowledges no law but the will of the individual; it is, therefore, exercised by no authority; the sovereign holds his power by the law of God; for God is the source of all authority, which is commensurate with his goodness, his power, and his wisdom: man, therefore, exercises the supreme authority over man, as the minister of God's authority; he exceeds that authority if he do any thing contrary to God's will. Subjects have a delegated authority which they receive from a superiour; if they act for themselves, without respect to the will of that superiour, they exert a power without authority. In this manner a prime minister acts by the authority of the king, to whom he is responsible. A minister of the gospel performs his functions by the authority of the gospel, as it is interpreted and administered by the church; but when he acts by an individual or particular interpretation, it is a self-assumed power, but not authority. Social beings, in order to act in concert, must act by laws and the subordination of ranks, whether in religion or politics; and he who acts solely by his own will, in opposition to the general consent of competent judges, exerts a power, but is without authority. Hence those who officiate in England as ministers of the gospel, otherwise than according to the form and discipline of the Established Church, act by an assumed power, which, though not punishable by the laws of man, must, like other sins, be answered for at the bar of God.

It lies properly with the supreme power to grant privileges, or take them away; but the same may be done by one in whom the authority is invested. Authority in this sense is applied to the ordinary concerns of life, where the line of distinction is always drawn, between what we can and what we ought to do. There is power where we can or may act; there is authority only where we ought to act. In all our dealings with others, it is necessary to consider in every thing, not what we have the power of doing, but what we have the authority to do. In matters of indifference, and in what concerns ourselves only, it is sufficient to have the power to act, but in all important matters we must have the authority of the divine law: a man may have the power to read or leave it alone; but he cannot dispose of his person in all respects, without authority. In what concerns others, we must act by their authority, if we wish to act conscientiously; when the secrets of another are confided to us, we have the power to divulge them, but not the authority, unless it be given by him who intrusted them.

Instructors are invested by parents with authority over their children; and parents receive their authority from nature, that is, the law of God; this paternal authority, according to the Christian system, extends to the education, but not to the destruction, of their offspring. The heathens, however, claimed and exerted a power over the lives of their children. By my superiour strength I may be enabled to exert a power over a man, so as to control his action; of his own accord he gives me authority to dispose of his property; so in literature, men of established reputation, of classical merit, and known veracity, are quoted as authorities in support of any position.

Power is indefinite as to degree; one may have little or much power: dominion is a positive degree of power. A monarch's power may be limited by various circumstances; a despot exercises dominion over all his subjects, high and low. One is not said to get a power over any object, but to get an object into one's power: on the other hand, we get a dominion over an object; thus some men have a dominion over the sciences of others;

And each of these must will, perceive, design,
And draw confus'dly in a different line,
Which then can claim dominion o'er the rest,
Or stamp the ruling passion in the breast.

JENYNS

POWERFUL, POTENT, MIGHTY.

Powerful, or full of power, is also the original meaning of potent; but mighty signifies having might. Powerful is applicable to strength as well as power: a powerful man is one who by his size and make can easily overpower another: and a powerful person is one who has much in his power; 'It is certain that the senses are more powerful as the reason is weaker.'—JOHNSON. Potent is used only in this latter sense, in which it expresses a larger extent of power;

Now, flaming up the heavens, the potent sun
Melts into limpid air the high-raised clouds.

THOMSON.

A potent monarch is much more than a powerful prince; mighty expresses a still higher degree of power; might is power unlimited by any consideration or circumstance; 'He who lives by a mighty principle within, which the world about him neither sees nor understands, he only ought to pass for godly.'—SOUTH. A giant is called mighty in the physical sense, and that genius is said to be mighty which takes every thing within its grasp; the Supreme Being is entitled either Omnipotent or Almighty; but the latter term seems to convey the idea of boundless extent more forcibly than the former.

EMPIRE, REIGN, DOMINION.

Empire in this case conveys the idea of power,* or an exercise of sovereignty; in this sense it is allied to the word reign, which, from the verb to reign, signifies the act of reigning; and to the word dominion, which signifies the same as in the preceding article.

Empire is used more properly for people or nations; reign for the individuals who hold the power: hence we say the empire of the Assyrians, or of the Turks; the reign of the Cæsars or the Paleologi. The most glorious epoch of the empire of the Babylonians is the reign of Nebuchadnezzar; that of the empire of the Persians is the reign of Cyrus; that of the empire of the Greeks is the reign of Alexander; that of the Romans is the reign of Augustus; these are the four great empires foretold by the prophet Daniel.

All the epithets applied to the word empire, in this sense, belong equally to reign; but all which are applied to reign are not suitable in application to empire. We may speak of a reign as long and glorious; but not of an empire as long and glorious, unless the idea be expressed paraphrastically. The empire of the Romans was of longer duration than that of the Greeks; but the glory of the latter was more brilliant, from the rapidity of its conquests; the reign of King George III. was one of the longest and most eventful recorded in history.

Empire and reign are both applied in the proper sense to the exercise of publick authority;

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Empire, règne."

The sage historic muse

Should next conduct us through the deeps of time,
Show us how empire grew, declin'd, and fell.

THOMSON.

Dominion applies to the personal act, whether of a sovereign or a private individual: a sovereign may have dominion over many nations by the force of arms, but he holds his reign over one nation by the force of law;

He who, like a father, held his reign,
So soon forgot, was wise and just in vain.—POPE.

Hence the word dominion may, in the proper sense, be applied to the power which man exercises over the brutes, over inanimate objects, or over himself: but if empire and reign be applied to any thing but civil government, or to nations, it is only in the improper sense: thus a female may be said to hold her empire among her admirers; or fashions may be said to have their reign. In this application of the terms, empire is something wider and all-commanding;

Let great Achilles, to the gods resign'd,
To reason yield the empire of his mind.—POPE.

Reign is that which is steady and settled;

The frigid zone,
Where for relentless months continual night
Holds o'er the glittering waste her starry reign.
THOMSON.

Dominion is full of control and force; 'By timely caution those desires may be repressed to which indulgence would give absolute dominion.'—JOHNSON.

PRINCE, MONARCH, SOVEREIGN, POTENTATE.

Prince, in French prince, Latin princeps, from primus, signifies the chief or the first person in the nation; monarch, from the Greek μόνος alone, and ἀρχή government, signifies one having sole authority; sovereign is probably changed from superregnum; potentate, from potens powerful, signifies one having supreme power.

Prince is the generic term, the rest are specific terms; every monarch, sovereign, and potentate, is a prince, but not vice versa. The term prince is indefinite as to the degree of power: a prince may have a limited or despotick power; but in its restricted sense this title denotes a smaller degree of power than any of the other terms: the term monarch does not define the extent of the power, but simply that it is undivided as opposed to that species of power which is lodged in the hands of many: sovereign and potentate indicate the highest degree of power; but the former is employed only as respects the nation that is governed, the latter respects other nations: a sovereign is supreme over his subjects; a potentate is powerful by means of his subjects. Every man having independent power is a prince, let his territory be ever so inconsiderable; Germany is divided into a number of small states, which are governed by petty princes;

Of all the princes who had sway'd the Mexican sceptre, Montezuma was the most haughty.—ROBERTSON. Every one reigning by himself in a state of some considerable magnitude, and having an independent authority over his subjects is a monarch; kings and emperors therefore are all monarchs; 'The Mexican people were warlike and enterprising, the authority of the monarch unbounded.'—ROBERTSON. Every monarch is a sovereign, whose extent of dominion and number of subjects rises above the ordinary level; 'The Peruvians yielded a blind submission to their sovereigns.'—ROBERTSON. He is a potentate if his influence either in the cabinet or the field extends very considerably over the affairs of other nations; 'How mean must the most exalted potentate upon earth appear to that eye which takes in innumerable orders of spirits.'—ADDISON. Although we know that princes are but men, yet in estimating their characters we are apt to expect more of them than what is human. It is the great concern of every monarch who wishes for the welfare of his subjects to choose good counsellors' whoever has approved himself a faithful subject may approach his sovereign with a steady confidence in having done his duty: the potentates of the earth may sometimes be intoxicated with their power and their triumphs' but in general they have too many mementoes of their common infirmity, to forget that they are but mortal men.

ABSOLUTE, DESPOTICK, ARBITRARY, TYRANNICAL.

Absolute in Latin absolutus, participle of absolvere, signifies absolved or set at liberty from all restraint as it regards persons; unconditional, unlimited, as it regards things; despotick, from despot, in Greek δεσπότης a master or lord, implies being like a lord, uncontrolled; arbitrary, in French arbitraire, from the Latin arbitrium will, implies belonging to the will of one independent of that of others; tyrannical signifies being like a tyrant.

Absolute power is independent of and superiour to all other power: an absolute monarch is uncontrolled not only by men but things; he is above all law except what emanates from himself;

Unerring power!

Supreme and absolute, of these your ways

You render no account.—LYLLO.

When absolute power is assigned to any one according to the constitution of a government, it is despotick. Despotick power is therefore something less than absolute power: a prince is absolute of himself: he is despotick by the consent of others.

In the early ages of society monarchs were absolute, and among the Eastern nations they still retain the absolute form of government, though much limited by established usage. In the more civilized stages of society the power of despots has been considerably restricted by prescribed laws, in so much that despotism is now classed among the regular forms of government; 'Such a history as that of Suetonius is to me an unanswerable argument against despotick power.'—ADDISON. This term may also be applied figuratively; 'Whatever the will commands, the whole man must do; the empire of the will over all the faculties being absolutely overruling and despotick.'—SOUTH.

Arbitrary and tyrannical do not respect the power itself, so much as the exercise of power: the latter is always taken in a bad sense, the former sometimes in an indifferent sense. With arbitrariness is associated the idea of caprice and selfishness; for where is the individual whose uncontrolled will may not often be capricious than otherwise? With tyranny is associated the idea of oppression and injustice. Among the Greeks the word τύραννος a tyrant, implied no more than what we now understand by despot, namely, a possessor of unlimited power: but from the natural abuse of such power, it has acquired the signification now attached to it, namely, of exercising power to the injury of another;

Our sects a more tyrannick power assume,
And would for scorpions change the rod of Rome.

ROSCOMMON.

Absolute power should be granted to no one man or body of men; since there is no security that it will not be exercised arbitrarily; 'An honest private man often grows cruel and abandoned, when converted into an absolute prince.'—ADDISON. In despotick governments the tyrannical proceedings of the subordinate officers are often more intolerable than those of the Prince

POSITIVE, ABSOLUTE, PEREMPTORY.

Positive, in Latin positivus, from pono to put or place, signifies placed or fixed, that is, fixed or established in the mind; absolute (v. Absolute) signifies uncontrolled by any external circumstances; peremptory, in Latin peremptorius, from perire to take away, signifies removing all further question.

Positive is said either of a man's convictions or temper of mind, or of his proceedings; absolute is said of his mode of proceeding, or his relative circumstances, peremptory is said of his proceeding. Positive, as respects a man's conviction, has been spoken of under the article of confident (v. Confident); in the latter sense it bears the closest analogy to absolute or peremptory: a positive mode of speech depends upon a positive state of mind; 'The diminution or ceasing of pain does not operate like positive pleasure.'—BURKE. An absolute mode of speech depends upon the uncontrollable authority of the speaker; 'Those parts of the moral world which have not an absolute, may yet have a relative beauty, in respect of some other parts concealed from us."—ADDISON. A peremptory mode of speech depends upon the disposition and relative circumstances of the speaker; 'The Highlander gives to every question an answer so prompt and peremptory, that skepticism is dared into silence.'—JOHNSON. A decision is positive; a command absolute or peremptory: what is positive excludes all question; what is absolute bars all resistance; what is peremptory removes all hesitation: a positive answer can be given only by one who has positive information; an absolute decree can issue only from one vested with absolute authority; a peremptory refusal can be given only by one who has the will and the power of deciding it without any controversy.

As adverbs, positively, absolutely, and peremptorily, have an equally close connexion: a thing is said to be positively known, or positively determined upon, or positively agreed to; it is said to be absolutely necessary, absolutely true or false, absolutely required; it is not to be peremptorily decided, peremptorily declared, peremptorily refused.

Positive and absolute are likewise applied to moral objects with the same distinction as before: the positive expresses what is fixed in distinction from the relative that may vary; the absolute is that which is independent of every thing: thus, pleasure and pains are positive; names in logic are absolute; cases in grammar are absolute.

ROYAL, REGAL, KINGLY.

Royal and regal from the Latin rex a king, though of foreign origin, have obtained more general application than the corresponding English term kingly. Royal signifies belonging to a king, in its most general sense; regal in Latin regalis, signifies appertaining to a king, in its particular application; kingly signifies properly like a king. A royal carriage, a royal residence, a royal couple, a royal salute, royal authority, all designate the general and ordinary appurtenances to a king.

He died, and oh! may no reflection shed
Its poisonous venom on the royal dead.—PRIOR.

Regal government, regal state, regal power, regal dignity, denote the peculiar properties of a king;

Jerusalem combined must see

My open fault and regal infamy.—PRIOR.

Kingly always implies what is becoming a king, or after the manner of a king; a kingly crown is such as a king ought to wear; a kingly mien, that which is after the manner of a king;

Scipio, you know how Massanissa bears
His kingly post at more than ninety years.

DENHAM.

EMPIRE, KINGDOM.

Although these two words obviously refer to two species of states, where the princes assume the title of either emperor or king, yet the difference between them is not limited to this distinction.

* The word empire carries with it the idea of a state that is vast, and composed of many different people; that of kingdom marks a state more limited in extent, and united in its composition. In kingdoms there is a uniformity of fundamental laws; the difference in regard to particular laws or modes of jurisprudence being merely variations from custom, which do not affect the unity of political administration. From this uniformity, indeed, in the functions of government, we may trace the origin of the words king and kingdom: since there is but one prince or sovereign ruler, although there may be many employed in the administration. With empires it is different: one part is sometimes governed by fundamental laws, very different from those by which another part of the same empire is governed; which diversity destroys the unity of government, and makes the union of the state to consist in the submission of certain chiefs to the commands of a superior general or chief. From this very right of commanding, then, it is evident that the words empire and emperour derive their origin; and hence it is that there may be many princes or sovereigns, and kingdoms, in the same empire.

As a farther illustration of these terms, we need only look to their application from the earliest ages in which they were used, down to the present period. The word king had its existence long prior to that of emperour, being doubtless derived, through the channel of the northern languages, from the Hebrew כֶּהֱנִי (kohen), a priest, since in those ages of primitive simplicity, before the lust of dominion had led to the extension of power and conquest, he who performed the sacerdotal office was unanimously regarded as the fittest person to discharge the civil functions for the community. So in like manner among the Romans the corresponding word rex, which comes from rego, and the Hebrew רֶעָה (reah) to feed signifies a pastor or shepherd, because he who filled the office of king acted both spiritually and civilly as their guide. Rome therefore was first a kingdom, while it was formed of only one people: it acquired the name of empire as soon as other nations were brought into subjection to it, and became members of it; not by losing their distinctive character as nations, but by submitting themselves to the supreme command of their conquerors.

For the same reason the German empire was so denominated, because it consisted of several states independent of each other, yet all subject to one ruler or emperor; so likewise the Russian empire, the Ottoman empire, and the Mogul empire, which are composed of different nations: and on the other hand the kingdom of Spain, of Portugal, of France, and of England, all of which, though divided into different provinces, were nevertheless, one people, having but one ruler. While France, however, included many distinct countries within its jurisdiction, it properly assumed the name of an empire; and England having by a legislative act united to itself a country distinct both in its laws and customs, has likewise, with equal propriety, been denominated the British empire.

A kingdom can never reach to the extent of an empire, for the unity of government and administration which constitutes its leading feature cannot reach so far, and at the same time requires more time than the simple exercise of superiority, and the right of receiving certain marks of homage, which suffice to form an empire. Although a kingdom may not be free, yet an empire can scarcely be otherwise than despotic in its form of government. Power, when extended and ramified, as it must unavoidably be in an empire, derives no aid from the personal influence of the sovereign, and requires therefore to be dealt out in portions far too great to be consistent with the happiness of the subject.

TERRITORY, DOMINION.

Both these terms respect a portion of country under a particular government; but the word territory brings to our minds the land which is included; dominion conveys to our minds the power which is exercised: territory refers to that which is in its nature bounded; dominion may be said of that which is boundless. A petty prince has his territory; the monarch of a great empire has dominions.

It is the object of every ruler to guard his territory against the irruptions of an enemy; 'The conquered territory was divided among the Spanish invaders, according to rules which custom had introduced.'

—ROBERTSON. Ambitious monarchs are always aiming to extend their dominions;

And while the heroic Pyrrhus shines in arms,
Our wide dominions shall the world o'erturn.

TRAPP.

STATE, REALM, COMMONWEALTH.

The state is that consolidated part of a nation in which lies its power and greatness; the realm, from royaume a kingdom, is any state whose government is monarchical; the commonwealth is the grand body of a nation, consisting both of the government and people, which forms the commonwealth or commonweal of a nation.

The ruling idea in the sense and application of the word state is that of government in its most abstract sense; affairs of state may either respect the internal regulations of a country, or it may respect the arrangements of different states with each other. The term realm is employed for the nation at large, but confined to such nations as are monarchical and aristocratical; peers of the realm sit in the English Parliament by their own right. The term commonwealth refers rather to the aggregate body of men, and their possessions, rather than to the government of a country: it is the business of the minister to consult the interests of the commonwealth.

The term state is indefinitely applied to all communities, large or small, living under any form of government: a petty principality in Germany, and the whole German or Russian empire, are alike termed states; 'No man that understands the state of Poland, and the United Provinces, will be able to range them under any particular names of government that have been invented.'—TEMPLE. Realm is a term of dignity in regard to a nation; France, Germany, England, Russia, are, therefore, with most propriety termed realms, when spoken of either in regard to themselves or in general connexions;

Then Saturn came, who fled the power of Jove,
Robb'd of his realms, and banish'd from above.

DRYDEN.

Commonwealth, although not appropriately applied to any nation, is most fitted for republics, which have hardly fixedness enough in themselves to deserve the name of state;

Civil dissension is a viperous worm,
That gnaws the bowels of the commonwealth.

SHAKESPEARE.

CREDIT, FAVOUR, INFLUENCE

Credit, from the Latin creditus, participle of credo to believe or trust, marks the state of being believed or trusted; favour, from the Latin favere, and probably favus a honey comb, marks an agreeable or pleasant state of feeling; influence signifies the same as in the preceding article.

These terms denote the state we stand in with regard to others as flowing out of their sentiments towards ourselves: credit arises out of esteem; favour out of good-will or affection; influence out of either credit or favour: credit depends most on personal merit; favour may depend on the caprice of him who bestows it.

The credit which we have with others is marked by their confidence in our judgement; by their disposition to submit to our decisions; by their reliance in our veracity, or assent to our opinions: the favour we have with others is marked by their readiness to comply with our wishes; their subserviency to our views; attachment to our society: men of talent are ambitious to gain credit with their sovereigns, by the superiority of their counsel; weak men or men of ordinary powers are contented with being the favourites of princes, and enjoying their patronage and protection. Credit redounds to the honour of the individual, and stimulates him to noble exertions; it is beneficial in its results to all mankind, individually or collectively; 'Truth itself shall lose its credit, if delivered by a person that has none.'—SOUTH. Favour redounds to the personal advantage, the selfish gratification of the individual; it is apt to inflame pride, and provoke jealousy; 'Halifax, thinking this a lucky opportunity of securing immortality, made some advances of favour, and some overtures of advantage to Pope, which he seems to have received with sullen coldness.'—JOHNSON. The honest exertion of our abilities is all that is necessary to gain credit; there will always be found those who are just enough to give credit where credit is due: favour, whether in the gaining or maintaining, requires much finesse and trick; much management of the humours of others; much control of one's own humours; what is thus gained with difficulty is often lost in a moment, and for a trifle. Credit, though sometimes obtained by falsehood, is never got without exertion; but favour, whether justly or unjustly bestowed, often comes by little or no effort on the part of the receiver: a clergyman gains credit with his parishioners by the consistency of his conduct, the gravity of his demeanour, and the strictness of his life; the favour of the populace is gained by arts which men of upright minds would disdain to employ.

Credit and favour are the gifts of others; influence is a possession which we derive from circumstances: there will always be influence where there is credit or favour, but it may exist independently of either: we have credit and favour for ourselves; we exert influence over others: credit and favour serve one's own purposes; influence is employed in directing others: weak people easily give credit, or bestow their favour, by which an influence is gained over them to bend them to the will of others; the influence itself may be good or bad, according to the views of the person by whom it is exerted; 'What motive could induce Murray to murder a prince without capacity, without followers, without influence over the nobles, whom the queen, by her neglect, had reduced to the lowest state of contempt.'—ROBERTSON.

GRACE, FAVOUR.

Grace, in French grace, Latin gratia, comes from gratus kind, because a grace results from pure kindness independently of the merit of the receiver; but favour is that which is granted voluntarily and without hope of recompense independently of all obligation.

Grace is never used but in regard to those who have offended and made themselves liable to punishment; favour is employed for actual good. An act of grace is a term employed to denote that act of the government by which insolvent debtors are released; but otherwise the term is in most frequent use among Christians to denote that merciful influence which God exerts over his most unworthy creatures from the infinite goodness of his Divine nature; it is to his special grace that we attribute every good feeling by which we are prevented from committing sin;

But say I could repent and could obtain,
By act of grace, my former state, how soon
Would height recall high thoughts.—MILTON.

The term favour is employed indiscriminately with regard to man or his Maker; those who are in power have the greatest opportunity of conferring favours; 'A bad man is wholly the creature of the world. He hangs upon its favour.'—BLAIR. But all we receive at the hands of our Maker must be acknowledged as a favour. The Divine grace is absolutely indispensable for men as sinners; the Divine favour is perpetually necessary for men as his creatures dependent upon him for every thing.

FAVOURABLE, PROPITIUS, AUSPICIOUS.

Favourable, disposed to favour, or after the manner of favour, is the general term; propitious and auspicious are species of the favourable; propitious, in Latin propitius, comes from prope near, because the heathens solicited their deities to be near or present to give them aid in favour of their designs; whence propitious signifies favourable as it springs from the design of an agent: auspicious, in French auspice, Latin auspicium and auspex, compounded of avis and spicio to behold, signifies favourable according to the auspices; what is propitious or auspicious, therefore, is always favourable, but not vice versâ: the favourable properly characterizes both persons and things; the propitious, in the proper sense, characterizes the person only; auspicious is said of things only: as applied to persons, an equal may be favourable: a superior only is propitious: the one may be favourable only in inclination; the latter is favourable also in granting timely assistance. Cato was favourable to Pompey; the gods were propitious to the Greeks: we may all wish to have our friends favourable to our projects;

Famous Plantagenet! most gracious prince,
Lend favourable ear to our requests.—SHAKESPEARE.

None but heathens expect to have a blind destiny propitious. In the improper sense, propitious may be applied to things with a similar distinction: whatever is well disposed to us, and seconds our endeavours, or serves our purpose, is favourable; 'You have indeed every favourable circumstance for your advancement that can be wished.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero).

Whatever efficaciously protects us, speeds our exertions, and decides our success, is propitious to us;

But ah! what use of valour can be made,
When Heaven's propitious powers refuse their aid.
DRYDEN.

On ordinary occasions, a wind is said to be favourable which carries us to the end of our voyage; but it is said to be propitious if the rapidity of our passage forwards any great purpose of our own. Those things are auspicious which are casual, or only indicative of good; persons are propitious to the wishes of another who listen to their requests and contribute to their satisfaction. A journey is undertaken under auspicious circumstances, where every thing incidental, as weather, society, and the like, bid fair to afford pleasure;

Still follow where auspicious fates invite,
Caress the happy, and the wretched slight
Sooner shall jarring elements unite,
Than truth with gain, than interest with right.
LEWIS.

A journey is undertaken under propitious circumstances when every thing favours the attainment of the object for which it was begun;

Who loves a garden love a greenhouse too:
Unconscious of a less propitious clime,
There blooms exotic beauty.—COWPER.

Whoever has any request to make ought to seize the auspicious moment when the person of whom it is asked is in a pleasant frame of mind; a poet in his invocation requests the muse to be propitious to him, or the lover conjures his beloved to be propitious to his vows.

TO LEAD, CONDUCT, GUIDE.

Lead, in Saxon læddan, læden, Danish lede, Swedish leda, low German leiden, high German leiten, is most probably connected with the obsolete German leit, leige, a way or road, Swedish led, Saxon late, &c. signifying properly to show or direct in the way; conduct, in Latin conductus, participle of conduco, signifies to carry a person with one, or to make a thing go according to one's will; guide, in French guider, Saxon witian or wisan, German, &c. weisen to show, Latin video to see or show, signifies properly to point out the way.

These terms are all employed to denote the influence which one person has over the movements or actions of another; but the first implies nothing more than personal presence and direction or going before, the last two convey also the idea of superior intelligence; those are led who either cannot or will not go alone, those are conducted and guided who do not know the road; in the literal sense it is the hand that leads, the head that conducts, and the eye that guides; one leads an infant; conducts a person to a given spot; and guides a traveller,

His guide, as faithful from that day
As Hesperus that leads the sun his way.

FAIRFAX.

'We waited some time in expectation of the next worthy, who came in with a great retinue of historians, whose names I could not learn, most of them being natives of Carthage. The person thus conducted, who was Hannibal, seemed much disturbed.'

ADDISON.

Can knowledge have no bound, but must advance
So far to make us wish for ignorance?
And rather in the dark to grope our way
Than led by a false guide to err by day?—DENHAM.

A general leads an army, inasmuch as he goes before it into the field of battle; he conducts an army, inasmuch as he directs its movements by his judgement and skill; he is himself guided, inasmuch as he follows the guide who points out the road. The coachman leads his horses in or out of the stable; he guides them when they are in a carriage; the pilot conducts a vessel; the steersman guides it.

These words bear the same analogy in the moral or figurative application; the personal influence of another leads; the understanding conducts; authority or law guides. Men are led into mistakes by listening to evil counsellors. The word is also applied in the same sense to circumstances; 'Human testimony is not so proper to lead us into the knowledge of the essence of things, as to acquaint us with the existence of things.'

—WATTS. But sometimes the word lead is taken in the sense of draw or move into action, as men are said to be led by their passions into errors; 'What I say will have little influence on those whose ends lead them to wish the continuance of the war.'—SWIFT. Conducting in the moral sense is applied mostly to things; one conducts a lawsuit or a business; 'He so conducted the affairs of the kingdom, that he made the reign of a prince most happy to the English.'—LORD LYTTELTON. Guiding, which comes nearest to leading in this application, conveys the idea of serving as a rule; an attentive perusal of the Scriptures is sufficient to guide us in the way of salvation; 'The brutes are guided by instinct and know no sorrow; the angels have knowledge and they are happy.'—STEELE. 'Upon those, or such like secular maxims, when nothing but interest guides men, they many times conclude that the slightest wrongs are not to be put up with.'—KETTLEWELL.

TO CONDUCT, MANAGE, DIRECT.

Conducting, as in the preceding article, requires most wisdom and knowledge; managing, from the French manager and mener, and the Latin manus a hand, supposes most action; direction, from the Latin directus, participle of dirigo or di and rego, signifies to regulate distinctly, which supposes most authority. A lawyer conducts the cause intrusted to him; a steward manages the mercantile concerns for his employer; a superintendent directs the movements of all the subordinate agents.

Conducting is always applied to affairs of the first importance; 'The general purposes of men in the conduct of their lives, I mean with relation to this life only end in gaining either the affection or esteem of those with whom they converse.'—STEELE. Management is a term of familiar use to characterize a familiar employment; 'Good delivery is a graceful management of the voice, countenance, and gesture.'—STEELE. 'I have sometimes amused myself with considering the several methods of managing a debate, which have obtained in the world.'—ADDISON. Direction makes up in authority what it wants in importance; it falls but little short of the word conduct; 'To direct a wanderer in the right way is to light another man's candle by one's own, which loses none of its light by what the other gains.'—GROVE. A conductor conceives and plans as well as executes; 'If he did not entirely project the union and regency, none will deny him to have been the chief conductor in both.'—ADDISON. A manager, for the most part simply acts or executes, except in a subordinate capacity, or in mean concerns; 'A skillful manager of the rabble, so long as they have but ears to hear, need never inquire whether they have understanding.'—SOUTH. A director commands; 'Himself stood director over them, with nodding or stamping, showing he did like or dislike those things he did not understand.'—SIDNEY. It is necessary to conduct with wisdom; to manage with diligence and attention; to direct with promptitude, precision, and clearness. A minister of state requires peculiar talents to conduct, with success, the various and complicated concerns which are connected with his office: he must exercise much skill in managing the various characters and clashing interests with which he becomes connected: and possess much influence to direct the multiplied operations by which the grand machine of government is kept in motion.

When a general undertakes to conduct a campaign he will intrust the management of minor concerns to persons on whom he can rely; but he will direct in person whatever is likely to have any serious influence on his success.

TO DIRECT, DISPOSE, REGULATE

We direct for the instruction of individuals We regulate for the good order or convenience of many We dispose for the benefit of one or many

To direct (v. To conduct) is personal, it supposes authority; to regulate, from the Latin regula a rule, signifying to settle according to a rule, is general, it supposes superior information. An officer directs the movements of his men in military operations;

Canst thou with all a monarch's cares oppress !
Oh Atreus' son ! canst thou indulge thy rest ?
Ill fits a chief, who mighty nations guides,
Directs in council, and in war presides.—POPE.

The steward or master of the ceremonies regulates the whole concerns of an entertainment;

Ev'n goddesses are women : and no wife
Has power to regulate her husband's life.

DRYDEN.

The director is often a man in power; the regulator is always the man of business; the latter is frequently employed to act under the former. The Bank of England has its directors, who only take part in the administration of the whole; the regulation of the subordinate part, and of the details of business, is intrusted to the superior clerks.

To direct is mostly used with regard to others; to regulate, frequently with regard to ourselves. One person directs another according to his better judgement; he regulates his own conduct by principles or circumstances; 'Strange disorders are bred in the minds of those men whose passions are not regulated by reason.'—ADDISON. But sometimes the word direct is taken in the sense of giving a direction towards an object, and it is then distinguished from regulate, which signifies to determine the measure and other circumstances; 'It is the business of religion and philosophy not so much to extinguish our passions, as to regulate and direct them to valuable, well-chosen objects.'—ADDISON.

To dispose, from dispono, or dis and pono, signifying to put part for a particular use, supposes superior power, like the word direct, and superior wisdom, like that of regulate; whence the term has been applied to the Supreme Being, who is styled the 'Disposer of all events'; and in the same sense, it is used by the poets in reference to the heathen gods;

Endure, and conquer; Jove will soon dispose
To future good, our past and present woes.

DRYDEN.

BEHAVIOUR, CONDUCT, CARRIAGE, DEPARTMENT, DEMEANOUR.

Behaviour comes from behave, compounded of be and have, signifying to have one's self, or have self-possession; conduct, in Latin conductus, participle of conduco, compounded of con or cum and duco to lead along, signifies leading one's self along; carriage, the abstract of carry (v. To bear, carry), signifies the act of carrying one's body, or one's self; department, from the Latin deporto to carry; and demeanour, from the French demenier to lead, have the same original sense as the preceding.

Behaviour respects corporeal or mental actions; conduct, mental actions; carriage, department, and demeanour, are different species of behaviour. Behaviour respects all actions exposed to the notice of others; conduct the general line of a person's moral proceedings; we speak of a person's behaviour at table, or in company, in a ball room, in the street, or in public; of his conduct in the management of his private concerns, in the direction of his family, or in his different relations with his fellow-creatures. Behaviour applies to the minor morals of society; conduct to those of the first moment: in our intercourse with others we may adopt a civil or polite, a rude or boisterous behaviour; in our serious transactions we may adopt a peaceable, discreet, or prudent, a rash, dangerous, or mischievous conduct. Our behaviour is good or bad; our conduct is wise or foolish: by our behaviour we may render ourselves agreeable, or otherwise; by our conduct we may command esteem, or provoke contempt: the behaviour of young people in society is of particular importance; it should, above all things, be marked with propriety in the presence of superiors and elders; 'The circumstance of life is not that which gives us place, but our behaviour in that circumstance is what should be our solid distinction.'—STEELE. The youth who does not learn betimes a seemly behaviour in company, will scarcely know how to conduct himself judiciously on any future occasion; 'Wisdom is no less necessary in religious and moral than in civil conduct.'—BLAIR.

Carriage respects simply the manner of carrying the body; department includes both the action and the carriage of the body in performing the action; demeanour respects only the moral character or tendency of the action; department is said only of those exterior actions that have an immediate reference to others; demeanour, of the general behaviour as it relates to the circumstances and situation of the individual: the carriage is that part of behaviour, which is of the first importance to attend to in young persons. The carriage should neither be haughty nor servile; to be graceful, it ought to have a due mixture of dignity and condescension; the department of a man should be suited to his station; an humble department is becoming in inferiors; a stately and forbidding department is very unbecoming in superiors; the demeanour of a man should be suited to his situation; the suitable demeanour of a judge on the bench, or of a clergyman in the pulpit, or when performing his clerical functions, adds much to the dignity and solemnity of the office itself.

The carriage marks the birth and education: an awkward carriage stamps a man as vulgar; a graceful carriage evinces refinement and culture; 'He that will look back upon all the acquaintances he has had in his whole life, will find he has seen more men capable of the greatest employments and performances, than such as could in the general bent of their carriage act otherwise than according to their own complexion and humour.'—STEELE. The department marks the existing temper of the mind; whoever is really impressed with the solemnity and importance of public worship will evince his impressions by a gravity of department; females should guard against a light department, as highly prejudicial to their reputation; 'The mild demeanour, the modest department, are valued not only as they denote internal purity and innocence, but as forming in themselves the most amiable and engaging part of the female character.'—MACKENZIE. The demeanour marks the habitual temper of the mind, or in fact the real character; we are often led to judge favourably of an individual from the first glance, whose demeanour on close examination does not leave such favourable impressions; 'I have been told the same even of Mahometans, with relation to the propriety of their demeanour in the conventions of their erroneous worship.'—STEELE.

CARRIAGE, GAIT, WALK.

Carriage, from the verb to carry (v. To bear, carry), signifies the act of carrying in general, but here that of carrying the body; gait, from go, signifies the manner of going with the body; walk signifies the manner of walking.

Carriage is here the most general term; it respects the manner of carrying the body, whether in a state of motion or rest; gait is the mode of carrying the limbs and body whenever we move; walk is the manner of carrying the body when we move forward to walk.

A person's carriage is somewhat natural to him; it is often an indication of character, but admits of great change by education; we may always distinguish a man as high or low, either in mind or station, by his carriage; 'Upon her nearer approach to Hercules, she stepped before the other lady, who came forward with a regular composed carriage.'—ADDISON. Gait is artificial; we may contract a certain gait by habit; the gait is therefore often taken for a bad habit of going, as when a person has a limping gait, or an unsteady gait;

Lifeless her gait, and slow, with seeming pain,
She dragg'd her loit'ring limbs along the plain.

SHENSTONE.

Walk is less definite than either, as it is applicable to the ordinary movements of men: there is a good, a bad, on an indifferent walk; but it is not a matter of indifference which of these kinds of walk we have; it is the great art of the dancing-master to give a good walk;

In length of train descends her sweeping gown,
And by her graceful walk, the queen of love is known.

DRYDEN.

MANNERS, MORALS.

Manners (v. Air, manner) respect the minor forms of acting with others and towards others; morals include the important duties of life: manners have, therefore, been denominated minor morals. By an attention to good manners we render ourselves good companions; by an observance of good morals we become good members of society: the former gains the good will of others, the latter their esteem. The manners of a child are of more or less importance, according to his station in life; his morals cannot be attended to too early, let his station be what it may; 'In the present corrupted state of human manners, always to assent and to comply, is the very worst maxim we can adopt. It is impossible to support the purity and dignity of Christian morals, without opposing the world on various occasions.'—BLAIR.

AIR, MANNER.

Air, in Latin aer, Greek ἀήρ, comes from the Hebrew אֵר, because it is the vehicle of light; hence in the figurative sense, in which it is here taken, it denotes an appearance: manner, in French manière, comes probably from mener to lead or direct, signifying the direction of one's movements.

An air is inherent in the whole person; a manner is confined to the action or the movement of a single limb. A man has the air of a common person; it discovers itself in all his manners. An air has something superficial in its nature; it strikes at the first glance; 'The air she gave herself was that of a romping girl.'—STEELE. Manner has something more solid in it; it develops itself on closer observation; 'The boy is well fashioned, and will easily fall into a graceful manner.'—STEELE. Some people have an air about them which displeases; but their manners afterward win upon those who have a farther intercourse with them. Nothing is more common than to suffer ourselves to be prejudiced by a person's air, either in his favour or otherwise: the manners of a man will often contribute to his advancement in life, more than his real merits.

An air is indicative of a state of mind; it may result either from a natural or habitual mode of thinking: a manner is indicative of the education; it is produced by external circumstances. An air is noble or simple, it marks an elevation or simplicity of character: a manner is rude, rustic, or awkward, for want of culture, good society, and good example. We assume an air, and affect a manner. An assumed air of importance exposes the littleness of the assumer, which might otherwise pass unnoticed: the same manners which are becoming when natural, render a person ridiculous when they are affected. A prepossessing air and engaging manners have more influence on the heart than the solid qualities of the mind.

AIR, MIEN, LOOK.

Air signifies the same as in the preceding article; mien, in German miene, comes, as Adelung supposes, from mahnen to move or draw, because the lines of the face, which constitute the mien in the German sense, are drawn together: look signifies properly a mode of looking or appearing.

The exterior of a person is comprehended in the sense of all these words. Air depends not only on the countenance, but the stature, carriage, and action: mien respects the whole outward appearance, not excluding the dress: look depends altogether on the face and its changes. Air marks any particular state of the mind; 'The truth of it is, the air is generally nothing else but the inward disposition of the mind made visible.'—ADDISON. Mien denotes any state of the outward circumstances;

How sleek their looks, how goodly is their mien,
When big they strut behind a double chin.

DRYDEN.

Look denotes any individual movement of the mind;

How in the looks does conscious guilt appear

ADDISON

We may judge by a person's air, that he has a confident and fearless mind: we may judge by his sorrowful mien, that he has substantial cause for sorrow; and by sorrowful looks, that he has some partial or temporary cause for sorrow.

We talk of doing any thing with a particular air; of having a mien; of giving a look. An innocent man will answer his accusers with an air of composure; a person's whole mien sometimes bespeaks his wretched condition; a look is sometimes given to one who acts in concert, by way of intimation.

TO ADMONISH, ADVISE.

Admonish, in Latin admoneo, is compounded of the intensive ad and moneo to advise, signifying to put seriously in mind; advise compounded of the Latin ad and visus, participle of video to see, signifies to make to see, or to show.

Admonish mostly regards the past; advise respects the future. We admonish a person on the errors he has committed, by representing to him the extent and consequences of his offence; we advise a person as to his future conduct, by giving him rules and instructions. Those who are most liable to transgress require to be admonished;

He of their wicked ways

Shall them admonish, and before them set

The paths of righteousness.—MILTON.

Those who are most inexperienced require to be advised; 'My worthy friend, the clergyman, told us, that he wondered any order of persons should think themselves too considerable to be advised.'—ADDISON. Admonition serves to put people on their guard against evil; advice to direct them in the choice of good.

ADMONITION, WARNING, CAUTION.

Admonition signifies the act of admonishing, or that by which one admonishes: warning, in Saxon warnien, German warnen, probably from währen to perceive, signifies making to see; caution, from caveo to beware, signifies the making beware.

A guarding against evil is common to these terms; but admonition expresses more than warning, and that more than caution.

An admonition respects the moral conduct; it comprehends reasoning and remonstrance: warning and caution respect the personal interest or safety; the former comprehends a strong forcible representation of the evil to be deaded; the latter a simple appraisal of a future contingency. Admonition may therefore frequently comprehend warning; and warning may comprehend caution, though not vice versa. We admonish a person against the commission of any offence; we warn him against danger; we caution him against any misfortune.

Admonitions and warnings are given by those who are superiour in age and station; cautions by any who are previously in possession of information. Parents give admonitions; ministers of the gospel give warnings; indifferent persons give cautions. It is necessary to admonish those who have once offended to abstain from a similar offence; 'At the same time that I am talking of the cruelty of urging people's faults with severity, I cannot but bewail some which men are guilty of for want of admonition.'—STEELE. It is necessary to warn those of the consequences of sin who seem determined to persevere in a wicked course;

Not e'en Philander had bespoke his shroud,
Nor had he cause—a warning was denied.

YOU &c.

It is necessary to caution those against any false step who are going in a strange path;

You caution'd me against their charms,
But never gave me equal arms;

Your lessons found the weakest part,
Aim'd at the head, but reach'd the heart.—SWIFT.

Admonitions are given by persons only; warnings and cautions are given by things. The young are admonished by the old: the death of friends or relatives serves as a warning to the survivors; the unfortunate accidents of the careless serve as a caution to others to avoid the like error. Admonitions should be given with mildness and gravity; warnings with impressive force and warmth; cautions with clearness and precision. The young require frequent admonitions; the ignorant and self-deluded solemn warnings; the inexperienced timely cautions.

Admonitions ought to be listened to with sorrowful attention; warnings should make a deep and lasting impression; cautions should be borne in mind; but admonitions are too often rejected, warnings despised, and cautions slighted.

ADVICE, COUNSEL, INSTRUCTION.

Advice signifies that which is advised (v. Advice); counsel, in French conseil, Latin consilium, comes from consilio, compounded of con and salio to leap together, signifying to run or act in accordance; and in an extended sense implies deliberation, or the thing deliberated upon, determined, and prescribed; instruction, in French instruction, Latin instructio, comes from instruo to dispose or regulate, signifying the thing laid down.

The end of all the actions implied by these words is the communication of knowledge, and all of them include the accessory idea of superiority, either of age, station, knowledge, or talent. Advice flows from superior professional knowledge, or an acquaintance with things in general; counsel regards superior wisdom, or a superior acquaintance with moral principles and practice; instruction respects superior local knowledge in particular transactions. A medical man gives advice to his patient; a father gives counsel to his children; a counsellor gives advice to his client in points of law; he receives instructions from him in matters of fact.

Advice should be prudent and cautious; counsel, sage and deliberative; instructions, clear and positive. Advice is given on all the concerns of life, important or otherwise; 'In what manner can one give advice to a youth in the pursuit and possession of pleasure?'—STEELE. Counsel is employed for grave and weighty matters; 'Young persons are commonly inclined to slight the remarks and counsels of their elders.'—JOHNSON. Instruction is used on official occasions;

To serve by way of guide or direction
See this despatch'd with all the haste thou canst;
Anon I'll give thee more instruction.

SHAKESPEARE.

Men of business are best able to give advice in mercantile transactions. In all measures that involve our future happiness, it is prudent to take the counsel of those who are more experienced than ourselves. An ambassador must not act without instructions from his court.

A wise king will not act without the advice of his ministers. A considerate youth will not take any serious step without the counsel of his better informed friends. All diplomatick persons are guided by particular instructions in carrying on negotiations.

Advice and counsel are often given unasked and undesired, but instructions are always required for the regulation of a person's conduct in an official capacity. The term instruction may however be also applied morally and figuratively for that which serves to guide one in his course of life;

On ev'ry thorn delightful wisdom grows,
In ev'ry stream a sweet instruction flows.—YOUNG.

TO INFORM, INSTRUCT, TEACH.

The communication of knowledge in general is the common idea by which these words are connected with each other. Inform is the general term; the other two are specific. To inform is the act of persons in all conditions; to instruct and teach are the acts of superiors, either on one ground or another: one informs by virtue of an accidental superiority or priority of knowledge; one instructs by virtue of superior knowledge or superior station: one teaches by virtue of superior knowledge, rather than of station: diplomatick agents inform their governments of the political transactions in which they have been concerned; government instructs its different functionaries and officers in regard to their mode of proceeding; professors and preceptors teach those who attend a publick school to learn.

To inform is applicable to matters of general interest; we may inform ourselves or others on every thing which is a subject of inquiry or curiosity; and the information serves either to amuse or to improve the mind; 'While we only desire to have our ignorance informed, we are most delighted with the plainest diction.'—JOHNSON. To instruct is applicable to matters of serious concern, or that which is practically useful; it serves to set us right in the path of life. A parent instructs his child in the course of conduct he should pursue; a good child profits by the instruction of a good parent to make him wiser and better for the time to come;

Not Thracian Orpheus should transcend my lays,
Nor Linus, crown'd with never fading bays;
Though each his heav'nly parent should inspire,
The Muse instruct the voice, and Phœbus tune the lyre.
DRYDEN.

To teach respects matters of art and science; the learner depends upon the teacher for the formation of his mind, and the establishment of his principles; 'He that teaches us any thing which we knew not before is undoubtedly to be revered as a master.'—JOHNSON. Every one ought to be properly informed before he pretends to give an opinion; the young and inexperienced must be instructed before they can act; the ignorant must be taught, in order to guard them against error. Truth and sincerity are all that is necessary for an informant; general experience and a perfect knowledge of the subject in question are requisite for the instructor; fundamental knowledge is requisite for a teacher. Those who give information upon the authority of others are liable to mislead; those who instruct others in doing that which is bad, scandalously abuse the authority that is reposed in them; those who pretend to teach what they themselves do not understand, mostly betray their ignorance sooner or later.

To inform and to teach are employed for things as well as persons; to instruct only for persons: books and reading inform the mind; history or experience teaches mankind; 'The long speeches rather confounded than informed his understanding.'—CLARENDON. 'Nature is no sufficient teacher what we should do that we may attain unto life everlasting.'—HOOKER.

TO INFORM, MAKE KNOWN, ACQUAINT, APPRISE.

The idea of bringing to the knowledge of one or more persons is common to all these terms. Inform, from the Latin informo to fashion the mind, comprehends this general idea only, without the addition of any collateral idea; it is therefore the generic term, and the rest specific; to inform is to communicate what has lately happened, or the contrary; but to make known is to bring to light what has long been known and purposely concealed; to inform is to communicate directly or indirectly to one or many;

Our ruin, by thee inform'd, I learn.—MILTON.

To make known is mostly to communicate indirectly to many: one informs the publick of one's intentions by means of an advertisement in one's own name; one makes known a fact through a circuitous channel, and without any name;

But fools, to talking ever prone,
Are sure to make their follies known.—GAY.

To inform may be either a personal address or otherwise; to acquaint and apprize are immediate and personal communications. One informs the government, or any publick body, or one informs one's friends; one acquaints or apprizes only one's friends, or particular individuals: one is informed of that which either concerns the informant, or the person informed; one acquaints a person with, or apprizes him of such things as peculiarly concern himself, but the latter in more specific circumstances than the former: one informs a correspondent by letter of the day on which he max expect to receive his order, or of one's own wishes with regard to an order;

I have this present evening from my sister,
Been well informed of them, and with cautions.
SHAKESPEARE.

One acquaints a father with all the circumstances that respect his son's conduct; 'If any man lives under a minister that doth not act according to the rules of the gospel, it is his own fault in that he doth not acquaint the bishop with it.'—BEVERIDGE. One apprizes a friend of a bequest that has been made to him; 'You know, without my telling you, with what zeal I have recommended you to Cæsar, although you may not be apprized that I have frequently written to him upon that subject.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero). One informs the magistrate of any irregularity that passes; one acquaints the master of a family with the misconduct of his servants: one apprizes a person of the time when he will be obliged to appear. Inform is used figuratively, but the other terms mostly in the proper sense; 'Religion informs us that misery and sin were produced together.'—JOHNSON.

INFORMANT, INFORMER.

These two epithets, from the verb to inform, have acquired by their application an important distinction. The informant being he who informs for the benefit of others, and the informer to the molestation of others. What the informant communicates is for the benefit of the individual, and what the informer communicates is for the benefit of the whole. The informant is thanked for his civility in making the communication; the informer undergoes a great deal of odium, but is thanked by not one, not even by those who employ him. We may all be informants in our turn, if we know of any thing of which another may be informed; 'Aye (says our Artist's informant), but at the same time he declared you (Hogarth) were as good a portrait painter as Vandyke.'—PILKINGTON. None are informers who do not inform against the transgressors of any law; 'Every member of society feels and acknowledges the necessity of detecting crimes, yet scarce any degree of virtue or reputation is able to secure an informer from public hatred.'—JOHNSON.

INFORMATION, INTELLIGENCE, NOTICE, ADVICE.

Information (v. To inform) signifies the thing of which one is informed: Intelligence, from the Latin intelligo to understand, signifies that by which one is made to understand: notice, from the Latin notitia, is that which brings a circumstance to our knowledge: Advice (v. Advise) signifies that which is made known. These terms come very near to each other in signification, but differ in application: information is the most general and indefinite of all; the three others are but modes of information. Whatever is communicated to us in information, be it public or private, open or concealed;

There, centring in a focus round and neat,
Let all your rays of information meet.—COWPER.

Notice, intelligence, and advice, are mostly public, but particularly the former. Information and notice may be communicated by word of mouth or by writing; intelligence is mostly communicated by writing or printing; advices are mostly sent by letter: information is mostly an informal mode of communication; notice, intelligence, and advice, are mostly formal communications. A servant gives his master information, or one friend sends another information from the country; magistrates or officers give notice of such things as it concerns the public to know and to observe; spies give intelligence of all that passes under their notice; or intelligence is given in the public prints of all that passes worthy of notice; 'My lion, whose jaws are at all hours open to intelligence, informs me that there are a few enormous weapons still in being.'—STEELE. A military commander sends advice to his government of the operations which are going forward under his direction; or one merchant gives advice to another of the state of the market; 'As he was dictating to his hearers with great authority, there came in a gentleman from Garraway's, who told us that there were several letters from France just come in, with advice that the king was in good health.'—ADDISON.

Information, as calculated to influence men's actions, ought to be correct: those who are too eager to know what is passing, are often misled by false information. Notice, as it serves either to warn or direct, ought to be timely;

At his years

Death gives short notice.—THOMSON.

No law of general interest is carried into effect without timely notice being given. Intelligence, as the first intimation of an interesting event, ought to be early; advices, as entering into details, ought to be clear and particular; official advices often arrive to contradict non-official intelligence.

Information and intelligence, when applied as characteristics of men, have a farther distinction: the man of information is so denominated only on account of his knowledge; but a man of intelligence is so denominated on account of his understanding as well as experience and information. It is not possible to be intelligent without information; but we may be well informed without being remarkable for intelligence: a man of information may be an agreeable companion, and fitted to maintain conversation; but an intelligent man will be an instructive companion, and most fitted for conducting business.

ACQUAINTANCE, FAMILIARITY, INTIMACY.

Acquaintance comes from acquaint, which is compounded of the intensive syllable ac or ad and quain; in old French coint, Teut. gekannt known, signifying known to one; familiarity comes from familiar, in Latin familiaris and familia, signifying known as one of the family; intimacy, from intimate, in Latin intimus, participle of intimo to love entirely, from intimus innermost, signifies known to the innermost recesses of the heart.

These terms mark different degrees of closeness in the social intercourse; acquaintance expressing less than familiarity; and that less than intimacy; 'A slight knowledge of any one constitutes an acquaintance; to be familiar requires an acquaintance of some standing; intimacy supposes such an acquaintance as is supported by friendship.'—TRUSLER.

Acquaintance springs from occasional intercourse; familiarity is produced by a daily intercourse, which wears off all constraint, and banishes all ceremony; intimacy arises not merely from frequent intercourse, but unreserved communication. An acquaintance will be occasionally a guest; 'An acquaintance is a being who meets us with a smile and salute, who tells us with the same breath that he is glad and sorry for the most trivial good and ill that befalls us.'—HAWKSWORTH. One that is on terms of familiarity has easy access to our table; 'His familiar were his entire friends, and could have no interested views in courting his acquaintance.'—STEELE. An intimate lays claim to a share at least of our confidence; 'At an entertainment given by Pisistratus to some of his intimates, Thrasippus took some occasion, not recorded, to break out into the most violent abuse.'—CUMBERLAND. An acquaintance with a person affords but little opportunity for knowing his character; familiarity puts us in the way of seeing his foibles, rather than his virtues; but intimacy enables us to appreciate his worth; 'Those who are apt to be familiar on a slight acquaintance, will never acquire any degree of intimacy.'—TRUSLER.

A simple acquaintance is the most desirable footing on which to stand with all persons, however deserving

Acquaintance grew; th' acquaintance they improve
To friendship; friendship ripen'd into love.

EUSDEN.

If it have not the pleasures of familiarity or intimacy, it can claim the privilege of being exempted from their pains. "Too much familiarity," according to the old proverb, "breeds contempt." The unlicensed freedom which commonly attends familiarity affords but too ample scope for the indulgence of the selfish and unamiable passions; 'That familiarity produces neglect has been long observed.'—JOHNSON. Intimacies begun in love often end in hatred, as ill chosen friends commonly become the bitterest enemies. A man may have a thousand acquaintance, and not one whom he should make his intimate; 'The intimacy between the father of Eugenio and Agrestis produced a tender friendship between his sister and Amelia.'—HAWKESWORTH.

These terms may be applied to things as well as persons, in which case they bear a similar analogy. An acquaintance with a subject is opposed to entire ignorance upon it; familiarity with it is the consequence of frequent repetition; and intimacy of a steady and thorough research; 'With Homer's heroes we have more than historical acquaintance: we are made intimate with their habits and manners.'—CUMBERLAND. 'The frequency of envy makes it so familiar, that it escapes our notice.'—JOHNSON. In our intercourse with the world we become daily acquainted with fresh subjects to engage our attention. Some men have by extraordinary diligence acquired a considerable familiarity with more than one language and science; but few, if any, can boast of having possessed an intimate acquaintance with all the particulars of even one language or science. When we can translate the authors of any foreign language, we may claim an acquaintance with it; when we can speak, or write it freely, we may be said to be familiar with it; but an intimate acquaintance comprehends a thorough critical intimacy with all the niceties and subtleties of its structure.

TO KNOW, BE ACQUAINTED WITH.

To know is a general term; to be acquainted with is particular (v. Acquaintance). We may know things or persons in various ways; we may know them by name only; or we may know their internal properties or characters; or we may simply know their figure; we may know them by report; or we may know them by a direct intercourse: one is acquainted with either a person or a thing, only in a direct manner, and by an immediate intercourse in one's own person. We know a man to be good or bad, virtuous or vicious, by being a witness to his actions;

Is there no temp'rate region can be known,
Between their frigid and our torrid zone?
Could we not wake from that lethargic dream,
But to be restless in a worse extreme.—DENHAM.

We become acquainted with a person by frequently being in his company; 'But how shall I express my anguish for my little boy, who became acquainted with sorrow as soon as he was capable of reflection.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero).

KNOWLEDGE, SCIENCE, LEARNING, ERUDITION.

Knowledge, from know, in all probability comes from the Latin nosco, and the Greek γινώσκω; science, in Latin scientia, from scio, Greek scire to know, and שׂוּר to see or perceive; learning, from learn, signifies the thing learned; erudition, in Latin eruditio, comes from erudio to bring out of a state of rudeness or ignorance.

Knowledge is a general term which simply implies the thing known: science, learning, and erudition, are modes of knowledge qualified by some collateral idea: science is a systematic species of knowledge which consists of rule and order; learning is that species of knowledge which one derives from schools, or through the medium of personal instruction; erudition is scholastic knowledge obtained by profound research: knowledge admits of every possible degree, and is expressly opposed to ignorance; science, learning, and erudition, are positively high degrees of knowledge.

The attainment of knowledge is, of itself, a pleasure, independent of the many extrinsic advantages which it brings to every individual, according to the station of life in which he is placed; the pursuits of science have a peculiar interest for men of a peculiar turn: those who thirst after general knowledge may not have a reach of intellect to take the comprehensive survey of nature, which is requisite for a scientific man. Learning is less dependent on the genius, than on the will of the individual; men of moderate talents have overcome the deficiencies of nature, by labour and perseverance, and have acquired such stores of learning as have raised them to a respectable station in the republic of letters. Profound erudition is obtained but by few; a retentive memory, patient industry, and deep penetration, are requisites for one who aspires to the title of an erudite man.

Knowledge, in the unqualified and universal sense, is not always a good: Pope says, "A little knowledge is a dangerous thing;" it is certain we may have a knowledge of evil as well as good, and as our passions are ever ready to serve us an ill turn, they will call in our imperfect or superficial knowledge to their aid;

Can knowledge have no bound, but must advance
So far, to make us wish for ignorance.—DENHAM.

Science is more exempt from this danger; but the scientific man who forgets to make experience his guide, as many are apt to do in the present day, will wander in the regions of idle speculation, and sink in the quicksands of skepticism;

O sacred poetry, thou spirit of Roman arts,
The soul of science, and the queen of souls.

B. JOHNSON.

Learning is more generally and practically useful to the morals of men than science; while it makes us acquainted with the language, the sentiments, and manners of former ages: it serves to purify the sentiments, to enlarge the understanding, and exert the powers; but the pursuit of that learning which consists merely in the knowledge of words or in the study of editions, is even worse than a useless employment of the time; 'As learning advanced, new works were adopted into our language, but I think with little improvement of the art of translation.'—JOHNSON. Erudition is always good, it does not merely serve to ennoble the possessor, but it adds to the stock of important knowledge; it serves the cause of religion and morality, and elevates the views of men to the grandest objects of inquiry; 'Two of the French clergy with whom I passed my evenings were men of deep erudition.'—BURKE.

LETTER, EPISTLE.

According to the origin of these words, letter, in Latin litera, signifies any document composed of written letters; and epistle, in Greek ἐπιστολή from ἐπιστάλλω to send, signifies a letter sent or addressed to any one; consequently the former is the generic, the latter the specific term. Letter is a term altogether familiar, it may be used for whatever is written by one friend to another in domestic life, or for the public documents of this description, which have emanated from the pen of writers, as the letters of Madame de Savigny, the letters of Pope or of Swift, and even those which were written by the ancients, as the letters of Cicero, Pliny, and Seneca: but in strict propriety those are entitled epistles, as a term most adapted to whatever has received the sanction of ages, and by the same rule, likewise, whatever is peculiarly solemn in its contents has acquired the same epithet, as the epistles of St. Paul, St. Peter, St. John, St. Jude; and by an analogous rule, whatever poetry is written in the epistolary form is denominated an epistle rather than a letter, whether of ancient or modern date, as the epistles of Horace, or the epistles of Boileau; and finally, whatever is addressed by way of dedication is denominated a dedicatory epistle. Ease and a friendly familiarity should characterize the letter: sentiment and instruction are always conveyed by an epistle.

LETTERS, LITERATURE, LEARNING.

Letters and literature signify knowledge, derived through the medium of written letters or books, that is, information: learning (v. Knowledge) is confined to that which is communicated, that is, scholastic knowledge. The term men of letters, or the republic of letters, comprehends all who devote themselves to the cultivation of their minds; 'To the greater part of mankind the duties of life are inconsistent with much study; and the hours which they would spend upon letters must be stolen from their occupations and families.'—JOHNSON. Literary societies have for their object the diffusion of general information: learned societies propose to themselves the higher object of extending the bounds of science, and increasing the sum of human knowledge. Men of letters have a passport for admittance into the higher circles; literary men can always find resources for themselves in their own society: learned men, or men of learning, are more the objects of respect and admiration than of imitation; 'He that recalls the attention of mankind to any part of learning which time has left behind it, may be truly said to advance the literature of his own age.'—JOHNSON.

CHARACTER, LETTER.

Character comes from the Greek χαρακτήρ, signifying an impression or mark, from χαράσσω to imprint or stamp: letter, in French lettre, Latin littera, is probably contracted from legitera, signifying what is legible.

Character is to letter as the genus to the species: every letter is a character; but every character is not a letter. Character is any printed mark that serves to designate something; a letter is a species of character which is the constituted part of a word. Shorthand and hieroglyphicks consist of characters, but not of letters.

Character is employed figuratively, but letter is not. A grateful person has the favours which are conferred upon him written in indelible characters upon his heart; 'A disdainful, a subtle, and a suspicious temper, is displayed in characters that are almost universally understood.'—HAWKESWORTH.

SCHOLAR, DISCIPLE, PUPIL.

Scholar and disciple are both applied to such as learn from others: but the former is said only of those who learn the rudiments of knowledge; the latter of one who acquires any art or science from the instruction of another; the scholar is opposed to the teacher, the disciple to the master: children are always scholars; adult persons may be disciples.

Scholars chiefly employ themselves in the study of words; disciples, as the disciples of our Saviour, in the study of things: we are the scholars of any one under whose care we are placed, or from whom we learn any thing, good or bad; 'The Romans confessed themselves the scholars of the Greeks.'—JOHNSON. We are the disciples only of distinguished persons or such as communicate either knowledge or opinions, useful or otherwise; 'We are not the disciples of Voltaire.'—BURKE. Children are sometimes too apt scholars in learning evil from one another.

A pupil is a species of scholar who is under the immediate and personal superintendence of the person from whom he receives his instruction. The Latin word pupillus signifies a fatherless child, or a man child under age and in ward, in which sense it is also sometimes used for the term ward; but in the ordinary acceptance of the term it now comprehends the idea of instruction more than that of wardship and superintendence;

My master sues to her, and she hath taught her suitor,
He being her pupil, to become her tutor.

SHAKESPEARE.

SCHOOL, ACADEMY.

The Latin term schola signifies a loitering place; a place for desultory conversation or instruction, from the Greek σχολή leisure; hence it has been extended to any place where instruction is given, particularly that which is communicated to youth, which being an easy task to one who is familiar with this subject is considered as a relaxation rather than a labour; academy derives its name from the Greek ακαδημία the name of a public place in Athens, where the philosopher Plato first gave his lectures, which afterward became a place of resort for learned men; hence societies of learned men have since been termed academies.

The leading idea in the word school is that of instruction given and doctrine received: in the word academy is that of association among those who have already learned: hence we speak in the literal sense of the school where young persons meet to be taught, or in the extended and moral sense of the old and new school, the Pythagorean school, the philosophical school, and the like; 'The world is a great school where deceit, in all its forms, is one of the lessons that is first learned.'—BLAIR. But the academy of arts or sciences, the French academy, being members of any academy, and the like; As for other academies such as those for painting, sculpture, or architecture, we have not so much as heard the proposal.'—SHAFESBURY.

EDUCATION, INSTRUCTION, BREEDING.

Instruction and breeding are to education as parts to a whole; instruction respects the communication of knowledge, and breeding the manners or outward conduct; but education comprehends not only both these but the formation of the mind, the regulation of the heart and the establishment of the principles: good instruction makes one wiser; good breeding makes one more polished and agreeable; good education makes one really good. A want of education will always be to the injury if not to the ruin of the sufferer: a want of instruction is of more or less inconvenience, according to circumstances: a want of breeding only unfits a man for the society of the cultivated. Education belongs to the period of childhood and youth; 'A mother tells her infant that two and two make four, the child remembers the proposition, and is able to count four for all the purposes of life, till the course of his education brings him among philosophers, who fright him from his former knowledge, by telling him that four is a certain aggregate of units.'—JOHNSON. Instruction may be given at different ages: 'To illustrate one thing by its resemblance to another, has been always the most popular and efficacious art of instruction.'—JOHNSON. Good breeding is best learned in the early part of life; 'My breeding abroad hath shown me more of the world than yours has done.'—WENTWORTH.

IGNORANT, ILLITERATE, UNLEARNED, UNLETTERED.

Ignorant, in Latin ignorans, from the privative ig or in and noro, or the Greek γνῶσκω, signifies not knowing things in general, or not knowing any particular circumstance; unlearned, illiterate, and unlettered, are compared with ignorant in the general sense.

Ignorant is a comprehensive term; it includes want of knowledge to any degree from the highest to the lowest, and consequently includes the other terms, illiterate, unlearned, and unlettered, which express different forms of ignorance;

He said, and sent Cyllenius with command

To free the ports and ope the Punic land

To Trojan guests; lest, ignorant of fate,

The queen might force them from her town and state.

DRYDEN.

Ignorance is not always to one's disgrace, since it is not always one's fault; the term is not therefore directly reproachful: the poor ignorant savage is an object of pity, rather than condemnation; but when ignorance is coupled with self-conceit and presumption, it is a perfect deformity: hence the word illiterate, which is used only in such cases as to become a term of reproach: an illiterate man who sets up to teach others, is termed an illiterate preacher; and quacks, whether in religion or medicine, from the very nature of their calling, are altogether an illiterate race of men. The words unlearned and unlettered are exempt from such unfavourable associations. A modest man, who makes no pretensions to learning, may suitably apologize for his supposed deficiencies by saying he is an unlearned or unlettered man; the former is, however, a term of more familiar use than the latter. A man may be described either as generally unlearned, or as unlearned in particular sciences or arts; as unlearned in history; unlearned in philosophy; 'Because this doctrine may have appeared to the unlearned light and whimsical, I must take leave to unfold the wisdom and antiquity of my first proposition in these my essays, to wit, that "every worthless man is a dead man."'—ADDISON. We say of a person that he is unlearned in the ways of the world: and a poet may describe his muse as unlettered; 'Ajax, the haughty chief, the unlettered soldier, had no way of making his anger known, but by gloomy sullenness.'—JOHNSON.

TO ILLUMINATE, ILLUMINE, ENLIGHTEN.

Illuminate, in Latin, illuminatus, participle of illuminare, and enlighten, from the noun light, both denote the communication of light; the former in the natural, the latter in the moral sense. We illuminate by means of artificial lights; the sun illuminates the world by its own light;

Reason our guide, what can she more reply,
Than that the sun illuminates the sky ?—PRIOR.

Preaching and instruction enlighten the minds of men; 'But if neither you nor I can gather so much from these places, they will tell us it is because we are not inwardly enlightened.'—SOUTH. Illumine is but a poetick variation of illuminate; as, the Sun of Righteousness illuminated the benighted world;

What in me is dark
Illumine; what is low, raise and support.
MILTON.

Illuminations are employed as publick demonstrations of joy: no nation is now termed enlightened but such as have received the light of the Gospel.

CULTIVATION, CULTURE, CIVILIZATION, REFINEMENT.

Cultivation, from the Latin cultus, denotes the act of cultivating, or state of being cultivated; culture signifies the state only of being cultivated; civilization signifies the act of civilizing, or state of being civilized; refinement denotes the act of refining, or the state of being refined.

Cultivation is with more propriety applied to the thing that grows; culture to that in which it grows. The cultivation of flowers will not repay the labour unless the soil be prepared by proper culture. In the same manner, when speaking figuratively, we say the cultivation of any art or science; the cultivation of one's taste or inclination, may be said to contribute to one's own skill, or the perfection of the thing itself; but the mind requires culture previously to this particular exertion of the powers; 'Notwithstanding this faculty (of taste) must be in some measure born with us, there are several methods of cultivating and improving it.'—ADDISON.

But tho' Heav'n
In every breath has sown these early seeds
Of love and admiration, yet in vain
Without fair culture's kind parental aid.

AKENSIDE.

Civilization is the first stage of cultivation; refinement is the last: we civilize savages by divesting them of their rudeness, and giving them a knowledge of such arts as are requisite for civil society; we cultivate people in general by calling forth their powers into action and independent exertion; we refine them by the introduction of the liberal arts.

The introduction of Christianity has been the best means of civilizing the rudest nations. The cultivation of the mind in serious pursuits tends to refine the sentiments without debilitating the character; but the cultivation of the liberal arts may be pursued to a vicious extent, so as to introduce an excessive refinement of feeling that is incompatible with real manliness;

To civilize the rude unpollish'd world
And lay it under the restraint of laws,
To make man mild and sociable to man,
To cultivate the wild licentious savage
With wisdom, discipline, and lib'ral arts,
Th' embellishments of life! Virtues like these Make human nature shine.—ADDISON.

Poetry makes a principal amusement among unpollished nations, but in a country verging to the extremes of refinement, painting and musick come in for a share.' GOLDSMITH.

Cultivation is applied either to persons or things; civilization is applied to men collectively, refinement to men individually: we may cultivate the mind or any of its operations; or we may cultivate the ground or any thing that grows upon the ground; we civilize nations; we refine the mind or the manners.

SUAVITY, URBANITY.

Suavity is literally sweetness; and urbanity the refinement of the city, in distinction with the country: inasmuch, therefore, as a polite education tends to soften the mind and the manners, it produces suavity; but suavity may sometimes arise from natural temper, and exist therefore without urbanity; although there cannot be urbanity without suavity. By the suavity of our manners we gain the love of those around us; by the urbanity of our manners we render ourselves agreeable companions; 'The virtue called urbanity by the moralists, or a courtly behaviour, consists in a desire to please the company.'—POPE. Hence also arises another distinction that the term suavity may be applied to other things, as the voice, or the style; 'The suavity of Menander's style might be more to Plutarch's taste than the irregular sublimity of Aristophanes.'—CUMBERLAND. Urbanity is applied to manners only.

CIVIL, POLITE.

Civil, in French civile, Latin civilis, from civis, a citizen, signifies belonging to or becoming a citizen; polite, in French poli, Latin politus, participle of polio to polish, signifies literally polished.

These two epithets are employed to denote different modes of acting in social intercourse; polite expresses more than civil; it is possible to be civil without being polite: politeness supposes civility and something in addition.

Civility is confined to no rank, age, condition, or country; all have an opportunity with equal propriety of being civil, but it is not so with politeness; this requires a certain degree of equality, at least the equality of education; it would be contradictory for masters and servants, rich and poor, learned and unlearned, to be polite to each other. Civility is a Christian duty; there are times when every man ought to be civil to his neighbour: politeness is rather a voluntary devotion of ourselves to others; among the inferior orders civility is indispensable; an uncivil person in a subordinate station is an obnoxious member of society;

He has good nature,
And I have good manners,
His sons too are civil to me, because
I do not pretend to be wiser than they.—OTWAY.

Among the higher orders, politeness is often a substitute; and where the form and spirit are combined, it supersedes the necessity of civility: politeness is the sweetener of human society; it gives a charm to every thing that is said and done; 'The true effect of genuine politeness seems to be rather ease than pleasure.'—JOHNSON.

Civility is contented with pleasing when the occasion offers; politeness seeks the opportunity to please, it prevents the necessity of asking by anticipating the wishes; it is full of delicate attentions, and is an active benevolence in the minor concerns of life.

Civility is anxious not to offend, but it often gives pain from ignorance or error: politeness studies all the circumstances and situations of men; it enters into their characters, suits itself to their humours, and even yields indulgently to their weaknesses; its object is no less to avoid giving pain than to study to afford pleasure.

Civility is dictated by the desire of serving, politeness by that of pleasing: civility often confines itself to the bare intention of serving; politeness looks to the action and its consequences: when a peasant is civil he often does the reverse of what would be desired of him; he takes no heed of the wants and necessities of others: politeness considers what is due to others and from others; it does nothing superfluously; men of good breeding think before they speak, and move before they act. It is necessary to be civil without being troublesome, and polite without being affected.

Civility requires nothing but goodness of intention; it may be associated with the coarsest manners, the grossest ignorance, and the total want of all culture: politeness requires peculiar properties of the head and the heart, natural and artificial; much goodness and gentleness of character, an even current of feeling, quickness and refined delicacy of sentiment, a command of temper, a general insight into men and manners, and a thorough acquaintance with the forms of society.

Civility is not incompatible with the harshest expressions of one's feelings; it allows the utterance of all a man thinks without regard to person, time, or season; it lays no restraint upon the angry passions: politeness enjoins upon us to say nothing to another which we would not wish to be said to ourselves: it lays at least a temporary constraint on all the angry passions, and prevents all turbulent commotions.

Civility is always the same; whatever is once civil is arwapsow, and acknowledged as such by all persons; hence the term civil may be applied figuratively in the same sense;

I heard a mermaid on a dolphin's back,
Uttering such dulcet and harmonious sounds,
That the rude sea grew civil at her song.

SHAKESPEARE.

Politeness varies with the fashions and times; what is polite in one age or in one country may be unpolite in another; 'A polite country squire shall make you as many bows in half an hour as would serve a courtier for a week.'—ADDISON.

If civility be not a splendid virtue, it has at least the recommendation of being genuine and harmless, having nothing artificial in it: it admits of no gloss, and will never deceive; it is the true expression of good will, the companion of respect in inferiours, of condescension in superiours, of humanity and kindness in equals: politeness springs from education, is the offspring of refinement, and consists much in the exterior: it often rests contented with the bare imitation of virtue, and is distinguished into true and false; in the latter case it may be abused for the worst of purposes, and serve as a mask to conceal malignant passions under the appearance of kindness; hence it is possible to be polite in form without being civil, or any thing else that is good.

CIVIL, OBLIGING, COMPLAISANT.

Civil (v. Civil, polite); obliging, from oblige, signifies either doing what *oblige*s, or ready to oblige; complaissant, in French complaissant, comes from complaître to please, signifying ready to please.

Civil is more general than obliging: one is always civil when one is obliging, but one is not always civil when one is civil: complaissance is more than either, it refines upon both; it is a branch of politeness (v. Civil, polite).

Civil regards the manner as well as the action, obliging respects the action, complaissant includes all the circumstances of the action: to be civil is to please by any word or action; 'Pride is never more offensive than when it condescends to be civil.'—CUMBERLAND. To be obliging is to perform some actual service;

The shepherd home
Hies merry-hearted, and by turns relieves
The ruddy milkmaid of her brimming pail,
The beauty whom perhaps his wildest heart
Sincerely loves, by that best language shown
Of cordial glances, and obliging deeds.

THOMSON.

To be complaissant is to do a service in the time and manner that is most suitable and agreeable; 'I seem'd so pleased with what every one said, and smiled with so much complaissance at all their pretty fancies, that though I did not put one word into their discourse, I have the vanity to think they looked upon me as very agreeable company.'—ADDISON. Civility requires no effort; to be obliging always costs the agent some trouble; complaissance requires attention and observation; a person is civil in his reply, obliging in lending assistance, complaissant in his attentions to his friends.

One is habitually civil; obliging from disposition; complaissant from education and disposition: it is necessary to be civil without being free, to be obliging without being efficacious, to be complaissant without being servile.

COURTEOUS, COMPLAISANT, COURTLY.

Courteous, from court, denotes properly belonging to a court, and by a natural extension of the sense, suitable to a court; complaissant (v. Complaissance).

Courteous in one respect comprehends in it more than complaissant; it includes the manner as well as the action; it is, properly speaking, polished complaissance: on the other hand, complaissance includes more of the disposition in it than courteousness; it has less of the polish, but more of the reality of kindness.

Courteousness displays itself in the address and the manners;

And then I stole all courtesy from Heav'n,
And dress'd myself in such humility,
That I did pluck allegiance from men's hearts.

SHAKESPEARE

Complaisance displays itself in direct good offices, particularly in complying with the wishes of others; 'To comply with the notions of mankind is in some degree the duty of a social being; because by compliance only he can please, and by pleasing only he can become useful; but as the end is not to be lost for the sake of the means, we are not to give up virtue for complaisance.'—JOHNSON. Courteousness is most suitable for strangers; complaissance for friends or the nearest relatives: among well-bred men, and men of rank, it is an invariable rule to address each other courteously on all occasions whenever they meet, whether acquainted or otherwise; there is a degree of complaissance due between husbands and wives, brothers and sisters, and members of the same family, which cannot be neglected without endangering the harmony of their intercourse.

Courtly, though derived from the same word as courteous, is in some degree opposed to it in point of sense; it denotes a likeness to a court, but not a likeness which is favourable; courtly is to courteous as the form to the reality; the courtly consists of the exterior only, the latter of the exterior combined with the spirit; the former therefore seems to convey the idea of insincerity when contrasted with the latter, which must necessarily suppose the contrary: a courtly demeanour, or a courtier-like demeanour may be suitable on certain occasions; but a courteous demeanour is always desirable;

In our own time (excuse some courtly strains)

No whiter page than Addison's remains.—POPE.

Courtly may likewise be employed in relation to things; but courteous has always respect to persons: we may speak of a courtly style, or courtly grandeur; but we always speak of courteous behaviour, courteous language, and the like.

Yes, I know

He had a troublesome old-fashion'd way
Of shocking courtly ears with horrid truth.

THOMSON

POLITE, POLISHED, REFINED, GENTEEL.

Polite (v. Civil) denotes a quality; polished, a state; he who is polite is so according to the rules of politeness; he who is polished is polished by the force of art: a polite man is, in regard to his behaviour, a finished gentleman. A rude person may be more or less polished, or freed from rudeness; 'In rudeness the dependence of children on their parents is of shorter continuance than in polished societies.'—ROBERTSON. Refined rises in sense, both in regard to polite and polished: a man is indebted to nature, rather than to art, for his refinement; but his politeness, or his polish, are entirely the fruit of education.

Politeness and polish do not extend to any thing but externals; refinement applies as much to the mind as the body: rules of conduct, and good society, will make a man polite: 'A pedant among men of learning and sense is like an ignorant servant giving an account of polite conversation.'—STERLE. Lessons in dancing will serve to give a polish; refined manners or principles will naturally arise out of refinement of mind and temper; 'What is honour but the height and flower of morality, and the utmost refinement of conversation?'—SOUTH.

As polish extends only to the exterior, it is less liable to excess than refinement: when the language, the walk, and deportment of a man is polished, he is divested of all that can make him offensive in social intercourse; but if the temper of a man be refined beyond a certain boundary, he loses the nerve of character which is essential for maintaining his dignity against the rude shocks of human life.

Genteel, in French gentil, Latin gentilis, signified literally one belonging to the same gens or family, the next akin to whom the estate would fall, if there were no children; hence by an extended application it denoted to be of a good family, and the term gentility now respects rank in life; in distinction from politeness, which respects the refinement of the mind and outward behaviour, a genteel education is suited to the station of a gentleman; 'A lady of genius will give a genteel air to her whole dress by a well-fancied suit of knots, as a judicious writer gives a spirit to a whole sentence by a single expression.'—GAY. A poli education fits for polished society and conversation, and raises the individual among his equals;

In this isle remote,
Our painted ancestors were slow to learn,
To arms devote, in the politer arts,
Nor skilled, nor studious.—SOMERVILLE.

There may be gentility without politeness; and vice versâ. A person may have genteel manners, a genteel carriage, a genteel mode of living as far as respects his general relation with society; but a polite behaviour and a polite address, which qualify him for every relation in society, and enable him to shine in connexion with all orders of men, is independent of either birth or wealth; it is in part a gift of nature, although it is to be acquired by art.

A person's equipage, servants, house, and furniture, may be such as to entitle a man to the name of genteel, although he is wanting in all the forms of real good-breeding. Fortune may sometimes frown upon the polished gentleman, whose politeness is a recommendation to him wherever he goes.

AFFABLE, COURTEOUS.

Affable, in French affable, Latin affabilis, from af or ad, and for to speak, signifies a readiness to speak to any one; courteous, in French courtois, from the word court, signifies after the refined manner of a court.

We are affable by a mild and easy address towards all, without distinction of rank, who have occasion to speak to us; we are courteous by a refined and engaging air to our equals or superiours who address themselves to us.

The affable man invites to inquiry, and is ready to gratify curiosity; 'It is impossible for a publick minister to be so open and easy to all his old friends as he was in his private condition; but this may be helped out by an affability of address.'—L'ESTRANGE. The courteous man encourages to a communication of our wants, and discovers in his manners a willingness to relieve them;

Whereat the Elfin knight with speeches went
Him first saluted, who, well as he might,
Him fair salutes again, as seemeth courteous knight.
WEST.

Affability results from good nature, and courteousness from fine feeling; it is necessary to be affable without familiarity, and courteous without officiousness.

COMPLAISANCE, DEFERENCE, CONDESCENSION.

Complaisance, from com and plaire to please, signifies the act of complying with, or pleasing others; deference, in French déference, from the Latin defero to bear down, marks the inclination to defer, or acquiesce in the sentiments of another in preference to one's own; condescension marks the act of condescending from one's own height to yield to the satisfaction of others, rather than rigorously to exact one's rights.

The necessities, the conveniences, the accommodations and allurements of society, of familiarity, and of intimacy, lead to complaisance; it makes sacrifices to the wishes, tastes, comforts, enjoyments, and personal feelings of others; 'Complaisance renders a superior amiable, an equal agreeable, and an inferior acceptable.'—ADDISON. Age, rank, dignity, and personal merit, call for deference: it enjoins compliance with respect to our opinions, judgements, pretensions, and designs; 'Tom Courtly never fails of paying his obedience to every man he sees, who has title or office to make him conspicuous; but his deference is wholly given to outward consideration.'—STEELE. The infirmities, the wants, the defects and foibles of others, call for condescension: it relaxes the rigour of authority, and removes the distinction of rank or station; 'The same noble condescension which never dwells but in truly great minds, and such as Homer would represent that of Ulysses to have been, discovers itself likewise in the speech which he made to the ghost of Ajax.'—ADDISON.

Complaisance is properly the act of an equal; deference that of an inferior; condescension that of a superior. Complaisance is due from one well-bred person to another; deference is due to all superiours in age, knowledge, or station, whom one approaches; condescension is due from all superiours to such as are dependent on them for comfort and enjoyment.

All these qualities spring from a refinement of humanity; but complaisance has most of genuine kindness in its nature; deference most of respectful submission; condescension most of easy indulgence. Complaisance has unalloyed pleasure for its companion, it is pleased with doing; it is pleased with seeing that it has pleased; it is pleasure to the giver and pleasure to the receiver. Deference is not unmixed with pain; it fears to offend, or to fail in the part it has to perform; it is mingled with a consciousness of inferiority, and a fear of appearing lower than it deserves to be thought. Condescension is not without its alloy; it is accompanied with the painful sentiment of witnessing inferiority, and the no less painful apprehension of not maintaining its own dignity.

Complaisance is busied in anticipating and meeting the wishes of others; it seeks to amalgamate one's own will with that of another: deference is busied in yielding submission, doing homage, and marking one's sense of another's superiority: condescension employs itself in not opposing the will of others; in yielding to their gratification, and laying aside unnecessary distinctions of superiority. Complaisance among strangers is often the forerunner of the most friendly intercourse: it is the characteristic of self-conceit to pay deference to no one, because it considers no one as having superior worth: it is the common characteristic of ignorant and low persons when placed in a state of elevation, to think themselves degraded by any act of condescension.

IMPERTINENT, RUDE, SAUCY, IMPUDENT, INSOLENT.

Impertinent, in Latin in and pertinens not belonging to one, signifies being or wanting to do what it does not belong to one to be or do; rude, in Latin rudis rude, and raudus a ragged stone, in the Greek ράβδος a rough stick, signifies literally unpolished; and in an extended sense, wanting all culture; saucy comes from sauce, and the Latin salsus, signifying literally salt; and in an extended sense, stinging like salt; impudent (v. Assurance); insolent, from the Latin in and solens, contrary to custom, signifies being or wanting to be contrary to custom.

Impertinent is allied to rude, as respects one's general relations in society, without regard to station; it is allied to saucy, impudent, and insolent, as respects the conduct of inferiours.

He who does not respect the laws of civil society in his intercourse with individuals, and wants to assume to himself what belongs to another, is impertinent: if he carry this impertinence so far as to commit any violent breach of decorum in his behaviour, he is rude. Impertinence seems to spring from a too high regard of one's self: rudeness from an ignorance of what is due to others. An impertinent man will ask questions for the mere gratification of curiosity; a rude man will stare in one's face in order to please himself. An impertinent man will take possession of the best seat without regard to the right or convenience of another: a rude man will burst into the room of another, or push against his person, in violation of all ceremony.

Impertinent, in comparison with the other terms, saucy, impudent, and insolent, is the most general and indefinite: whatever one does or says that is not compatible with our station is impertinent; saucy is a sharp kind of impertinence; impudent an unblushing kind of impertinence; insolence is an outrageous kind of impertinence, it runs counter to all established order: thus, the terms seem to rise in sense. A person may be impertinent in words or actions: he is saucy in words or looks: he is impudent or insolent in words, tones, gesture, looks, and every species of action. A person's impertinence discovers itself in not giving the respect which is due to his superiours in general, strangers, or otherwise; as when a common person sits down in the presence of a man of rank: sauciness discovers itself towards particular individuals, in certain relations; as in the case of servants who are saucy to their masters, or children who are saucy to their teachers: impudence and insolence are the stropest degrees of impertinence; but the former is more particularly said of such things as reflect disgrace upon the offender, and spring from a low depravity of mind, such as the abuse of one's superiours, and a vulgar defiance of those to whom one owes obedience and respect: insolence, on the contrary, originates from a haughtiness of spirit, and a misplaced pride, which breaks out into a contemptuous disregard of the station of those by whom one is offended; as in the case of a servant who should offer to strike his master, or of a criminal who sets a magistrate at defiance; 'It is publicly whispered as a piece of impertinent pride in me, that I have hitherto been saucily civil to every body, as if I thought nobody good enough to quarrel with.'—LADY M. W. MONTAGU.

My house should no such rude disorders know,
As from high drinking consequently flow.

POMFRET.

Whether he knew the thing or no,
His tongue externally would go;
For he had impudence at will.—GAY.

He claims the bull with lawless insolence,
And having seiz'd his horns, accosts the prince.

DRYDEN.

Self-conceit is the grand source of impertinence, it makes persons forget themselves; the young thereby forget their youth; the servant forgets his relationship to his master; the poor and ignorant man forgets the distance between himself and those who are elevated by education, rank, power, or wealth: impertinent persons, therefore, act towards their equals as if they were inferiours, and towards their superiours as if they were their equals: an angry pride that is offended with reproof commonly provokes sauviness: an insensibility to shame, or an unconsciousness of what is honourable either in one's self or others, gives birth to impudence: uncontrolled passions, and bloated pride, are the ordinary stimulants to insolence.

ABRUPT, RUGGED, ROUGH.

Abrupt, in Latin abruptus, participle of abrumpe, to break off, signifies the state of being broken off; rugged, in Saxon krugge, comes from the Latin rugosus full of wrinkles; rough is in Saxon reoh, high German rauh, low German rug, Dutch ruig, in Latin rudis uneven.

These words mark different degrees of unevenness. What is abrupt has greater cavities and protuberances than what is rugged; what is rugged has greater irregularities than what is rough. In the natural sense abrupt is opposed to what is unbroken, rugged to what is even, and rough to what is smooth. A precipice is abrupt, a path is rugged, a plank is rough;

The precipice abrupt,

Projecting horror on the blackened flood,
Softens at thy return.—THOMSON'S SUMMER.

'The evils of this life appear like rocks and precipices, rugged and barren at a distance; but at our nearer approach we find them little fruitful spots.'—SPECTATOR.

Not the rough whirlwind, that deforms
Adria's black gulf, and vexes it with storms,
The stubborn virtue of his soul can move.

FRANCIS.

The abruptness of a body is generally occasioned by a violent concussion and separation of its parts; ruggedness arises from natural, but less violent causes; roughness is mostly a natural property, although sometimes produced by friction.

In the figurative sense the distinction is equally clear. Words and manners are abrupt when they are sudden and unconnected; the temper is rugged which is exposed to frequent ebullitions of angry humour; actions are rough when performed with violence and incaution.

An abrupt behaviour is the consequence of an agitated mind;

My lady craves

To know the cause of your abrupt departure.

SHAKESPEARE.

A rugged disposition is inherent in the character; The greatest favours to such a one neither soften nor win upon him; neither melt nor endear him, but leave him as hard, rugged, and unconcerned as ever.'—SOUTH. A rough deportment arises from an undisciplined state of feeling; 'Kind words prevent a good deal of that perverseness, which rough and imperious usage often produces in generous minds.'—LOCKE.

An habitual steadiness and coolness of reflection is best fitted to prevent or correct any abruptness of manners; a cultivation of the Christian temper cannot fail of smoothing down all ruggedness of humour; an intercourse with polished society will inevitably refine down all roughness of behaviour.

COARSE, ROUGH, RUDE.

Coarse, probably from the Gothic kaurids heavy, answering to our word gross, and the Latin gravis; rough, in Saxon hruh, German rauh, roh, &c. is probably a variation of rude (v. Impertinent).

These epithets are equally applied to what is not polished by art. In the proper sense coarse refers to the composition and materials of bodies, as coarse bread, coarse meat, coarse cloth; rough respects the surface of bodies, as rough wood and rough skin; rude respects the make or fashion of things, as a rude bark, a rude utensil. Coarse is opposed to fine, rough to smooth, rude to polished.

In the figurative application they are distinguished in a similar manner: coarse language is used by persons of naturally coarse feeling; 'The fineness and delicacy of perception which the man of taste requires. may be more liable to irritation than the coarser feelings of minds less cultivated.'—CRAIG. Rough language is used by those whose tempers are either naturally or occasionally rough;

This is some fellow,

Who, having been prais'd for bluntness, doth affect
A saucy roughness.—SHAKESPEARE.

Rude language is used by those who are ignorant of any better; 'Is it in destroying and pulling down that skill is displayed? the shallowest understanding, the rudest hand, is more than equal to that task.'—BURKE.

GROSS, COARSE.

Gross derives its meaning in this application from the Latin crassus thick from fat, or that which is of common materials; coarse (v. Coarse).

These terms are synonymous in the moral application. Grossness of habit is opposed to delicacy; coarseness to softness and refinement. A person becomes gross by an unrestrained indulgence of his sensual appetites; particularly in eating and drinking; he is coarse from the want of polish either as to his mind or manners. A gross sensualist approximates very nearly to the brute; he sets aside all moral considerations; he indulges himself in the open face of day in defiance of all decency: a coarse person approaches nearest to the savage, whose roughness of humour and inclination have not been refined down by habits of restraining his own will, and complying with the will of another. A gross expression conveys the idea of that which should be kept from the view of the mind, which shocks the moral feeling, a coarse expression conveys the idea of an unseemly sentiment in the mind of the speaker. The representation of the Deity by any sensible image is gross, because it gives us a low and grovelling idea of the Supreme; the doing a kindness, and making the receiver at the same time sensible of your superiority and his dependence, indicates great coarseness in the character of the person granting the favour; 'A certain preparation is requisite for the enjoyment of devotion in its whole extent; not only must the life be reformed from gross enormities, but the heart must have undergone that change which the Gospel demands.'—BLAIR. 'The refined pleasures of a pious mind are, in many respects, superior to the coarse gratifications of sense.'—BLAIR.

TO AMEND, CORRECT, REFORM, RECTIFY, EMEND, IMPROVE, MEND, BETTER.

Amend, in Latin emendo, from menda a fault in transcribing, signifies to remove this fault; correct, in Latin correctus, participle of corrigo, compounded of con and rego, signifies to set in order, to set to rights; reform, compounded of re and form, signifies to reform afresh, or put into a new form; rectify, in Latin rectifico, compounded of rectus and facio, signifies to make or put right; emend is the immediate derivative of the Latin emendo; improve comes from the Latin in and probo to prove or try, signifying to make any thing good, or better than it was, by trials or after experiments; mend is a contraction of emend; better is properly to make better.

To amend, correct, rectify, and emend, imply the lessening of evil; to improve, reform, and better, the increase of good. We amend the moral conduct, correct errors, reform the life, rectify mistakes, emend the readings of an author, improve the mind, mend or better the condition. What is amended is mostly that which is wrong in ourselves: what is reformed or corrected is that which is faulty in ourselves or in others; what is rectified is mostly wrong in that which has been done; that which is improved may relate either to an individual or to indifferent objects.

To mend and better are common terms, employed only on familiar occasions, corresponding to the terms amend and improve. Whatever is wrong must be amended; whatever is faulty must be corrected; whatever is altogether insufficient for the purpose must be reformed; whatever error escapes by an oversight must be rectified; whatever is obscure or incorrect must be amended.

What has been torn may be mended;

The wise for cure on exercise depend,
God never made his work for man to mend.

DRYDEN.

What admits of change may be improved or bettered; 'I then bettered my condition a little, and lived a whole summer in the shape of a bee.'—ADDISON. When a person's conduct is in any way culpable, it ought to be amended; 'The interest which the corrupt part of mankind have in hardening themselves against every motive to amendment, has disposed them to give to contradictions, when they can be produced against the cause of virtue, that weight which they will not allow them in any other case.'—JOHNSON. When a person's habits and principles are vicious, his character ought to be reformed; 'Indolence is one of the vices from which those whom it once infects are seldom reformed.'—JOHNSON. When a man has any particular faulty habit, it ought to be corrected; 'Presumption will be easily corrected; but timidity is a disease of the mind more obstinate and fatal.'—JOHNSON. When we commit mistakes we should not object to have them rectified; 'That sorrow which dictates no caution, that fear which does not quicken our escape, that austerity which fails to rectify our affections, are vain and unavailing.'—JOHNSON. 'Some had read the manuscript, and rectified its inaccuracies.'—JOHNSON. The emendations of critics frequently involve an author in still greater obscurity; 'That useful part of learning which consists in emendations, knowledge of different readings, and the like, is what in all ages persons extremely wise and learned have had in great veneration.'—ADDISON. Whoever wishes to advance himself in life must endeavour to improve his time and talents.

'While a man, infatuated with the promises of greatness, wastes his hours and days in attendance and solicitation, the honest opportunities of improving his condition pass by without his notice.'—ADDISON. The first step to amendment is a consciousness of error in ourselves: busy politicians are ever ready to propose a reform in the constitution of their country, but they forget the reformation which is requisite in themselves: the correction of the temper is of the first moment, in order to live in harmony with others: in order to avoid the necessity of rectifying what has been done amiss, we must strive to do every thing with care: critics emend the productions of the pen, and ingenious artists improve the inventions of art.

Correct respects ourselves or others; rectify has regard to one's self only; correct is either an act of authority or discretion; rectify is an act of discretion only. What is corrected may vary in its magnitude or importance, and consequently may require more or less trouble; what is rectified is always of a nature to be altered without great injury or effort. Habitual or individual faults are corrected; 'Desire is corrected when there is a tenderness or admiration expressed which partakes of the passion. Licentious language has something brutal in it which disgraces humanity.'—STEELE. Individual mistakes are rectified; 'A man has frequent opportunities of mitigating the fierceness of a party; of softening the envious, quieting the angry, and rectifying the prejudiced.'—ADDISON. A person corrects himself or another of a bad habit in speaking or pronouncing; he rectifies any error in his accounts. Mistakes in writing must be corrected for the advantage of the scholar; mistakes in pecuniary transactions cannot be too soon rectified for the satisfaction of all parties.

Reform like rectify is used only for one's self when it respects personal actions: but reform and correct are likewise employed for matters of general interest. Correct in neither case amounts to the same as reform. A person corrects himself of particular habits; he reforms his whole life; what is corrected undergoes a change, more or less slight; what is reformed assumes a new form and becomes a new thing. Correction is always advisable: it is the removal of an evil; reform is equally so as it respects a man's own conduct; but as it respects public matters, it is altogether of a questionable nature: a man cannot begin too soon to reform himself, nor too late to attempt reforming the constitutions of society. The abuses of government may always be advantageously corrected by the judicious hand of a wise minister; reforms in a state are always attended with a certain evil, and promise but an uncertain good; they are never recommended but by the young, the thoughtless, the busy, or the interested. The reformation of laws is the peculiar province of the prince;

Edward and Henry, now the boast of fame,
And virtuous Alfred, a more sacred name,
After a life of generous toils endure'd,
The Gauls subdu'd, or property secur'd,
Ambition humbled, mighty cities storm'd,
Or laws establish'd, and the world reformed.

POPE.

CORRECT; ACCURATE.

Correct is equivalent to corrected (v. To Amend,) or set to rights. Accurate (v. Accurate) implies properly done with care, or by the application of care. Correct is negative in its sense; accurate is positive; it is sufficient to be free from fault to be correct; it must contain every minute particular to be accurate. Information is correct which contains nothing but facts; 'Sallust the most elegant and correct of all the Latin historians, observes, that in his time when the most formidable states of the world were subdued by the Romans, the republic sunk into those two opposite vices of a quite different nature, luxury and avarice.'—ADDISON. Information is accurate when it contains a vast number of details; 'Those ancients who were the most accurate in their remarks on the genius and temper of mankind, have with great exactness allotted inclinations and objects of desire to every stage of life.'—STEELE.

What is incorrect is allied to falsehood; what is inaccurate is general and indefinite.

According to the dialect of modern times, in which gross vices are varnished over with smooth names, a liar is said to speak incorrectly; this is however not only an inaccurate but an incorrect mode of speech, for a lie is a direct violation of truth, and the incorrect is only a deviation from it to greater or less extent

JUSTNESS, CORRECTNESS.

Justness, from jus law (v. Justice), is the conformity to established principle: correctness, from rectus right or straight (v. Correct), is the conformity to a certain mark or line: the former is used in the moral or improper sense only; the latter is used either in the proper or improper sense. We estimate the value of remarks by their justness, that is, their accordance to certain admitted principles; 'Few men, possessed of the most perfect sight, can describe visual objects with more spirit and justness than Mr. Blacklock the poet, born blind.'—BURKE. Correctness of outline is of the first importance in drawing; correctness of dates enhances the value of a history; 'I do not mean the popular eloquence which cannot be tolerated at the bar, but that correctness of style and elegance of method which at once pleases and persuades the hearer.'—SIR WM. JONES. It has been justly observed by the moralists of antiquity, what money is the root of all evil; partisans seldom state correctly what they see and hear.

ACCURATE, EXACT, PRECISE.

Accurate, in French accurate, Latin accuratus, participle of accuro, compounded of the intensive ac or ad, and curo, to take care of, signifies done with great care; exact, in French exacts, Latin exactus, participle of exigo, to finish or complete, denotes the quality of completeness, the absence of defect; precise, in French précis, Latin præcisus, participle of præcido, to cut by rule, signifies the quality of doing by rule.

A man is accurate when he avoids faults; exact, when he attends to every minutia, and leaves nothing undone; precise, when he does it according to a certain measure. These epithets, therefore, bear a comparative relation to each other; exact expresses more than accurate, and precise more than exact. An account is accurate in which there is no misrepresentation; it is exact when nothing essential is omitted; it is precise when it contains particular details of time, place, and circumstance.

Accuracy is indispensable in all our concerns, be they ever so ordinary; 'An eminent artist who wrought up his pictures with the greatest accuracy, and gave them all those delicate touches which are apt to please the nicest eye, is represented as tuning a theorbo.'—ADDISON. Exactness is of peculiar importance in matters of economy and taste; 'This lady is the most exact economist, without appearing busy.'—CONGREVE. In some cases, where great results flow from trifling causes, the greatest precision becomes requisite: we may, however, be too precise when we dwell on unimportant particulars; but we never can be too accurate or exact. Hence the epithet precise is sometimes taken in the unfavourable sense for affectedly exact; 'An apparent desire of admiration, a reflection upon their own merit, and a precise behaviour in their general conduct, are almost inseparable accidents in beauties.'—HUGHES. An accurate man will save himself much trouble; an exact man will gain himself much credit; and a precise man will take much pains only to render himself ridiculous. Young people should strive to do every thing accurately, which they think worth doing at all, and thus they will learn to be exact or precise, as occasion may require.

Accuracy, moreover, concerns our mechanical labours, and the operations of our senses and understandings; 'An aptness to jumble things together, wherein can be found any likeness, hinders the mind from accurate conceptions of them.'—LOCKE. Exactness respects our dealings with others, or our views of things; 'Angels and spirits, in their several degrees of elevation above us, may be endowed with more comprehensive faculties; and some of them, perhaps, have perfect and exact views of all finite beings that come under their consideration.'—LOCKE. Precision is applied to our habits and manners in society, or to our representations of things; 'A definition is the only way whereby the precise meaning of moral words can be known.'—LOCKE. We write, we see, we think, we judge accurately; we are exact in our payments; we are precise in our modes of dress. Some men are very accurate in their particular line of business, who are not very exact in fulfilling their engagements, nor very precise in the hours which they keep.

EXACT, NICE, PARTICULAR, PUNCTUAL.

Exact (v. Accurate); nice, in Saxon nise, comes in all probability from the German geniessen, &c. to enjoy, signifying a quick and discriminating taste; particular signifies here directed to a particular point; punctual, from the Latin punctum a point, signifies keeping to a point.

Exact and nice are to be compared in their application, either to persons or things; particular and punctual only in application to persons. To be exact, is to arrive at perfection; to be nice, is to be free from faults; to be particular, is to be nice in certain particulars; to be punctual, is to be exact in certain points. We are exact in our conduct or in what we do; nice and particular in our mode of doing it; punctual as to the time and season for doing it. It is necessary to be exact in our accounts; to be nice as an artist in the choice and distribution of colours; to be particular as a man of business, in the number and the details of merchandises that are to be delivered out; to be punctual in observing the hour or the day that has been fixed upon for keeping appointments.

Exactness and punctuality are always taken in a good sense; they designate an attention to that which cannot be dispensed with; they form a part of one's duty; niceeness and particularity are not always taken in the best sense; they designate an excessive attention to things of inferior importance; to matters of taste and choice. Early habits of method and regularity will make a man very exact in the performance of all his duties, and particularly punctual in his payments; 'What if you and I inquire how money matters stand between us? With all my heart, I love exact dealing; and let Hocus audit.'—ARBUTHNOT. 'The trading part of mankind suffer by the want of punctuality in the dealings of persons above them.'—STEELE. An over niceeness in the observance of mechanical rules often supplies the want of genius; or a niceeness in regard to one's diet is the mark of an epicure;

Nor be so nice in taste myself to know,

If what I swallow, be a thrush or no.—DRYDEN

Thus critics, of less judgement than caprice

Curious, not knowing, not exact, but nice.—POPE.

It is the mark of a contracted mind to amuse itself with particularities about the dress, the person, the furniture, and the like. On the other hand, it is desirable for a person to be particular in the account he is called upon to give of any transaction; 'I have been the more particular in this inquiry, because I hear there is scarce a village in England that has not a Moll White in it.'—ADDISON.

When exact and nice are applied to things, the former expresses more than the latter; we speak of an exact resemblance, and a nice distinction. The exact point is that which we wish to reach; 'We know not so much as the true names of either Homer or Virgil, with any exactness.'—WALSH. The nice point is that which it is difficult to keep; 'Every age a man passes through, and way of life he engages in, has some particular vice or imperfection naturally cleaving to it, which it will require his nicest care to avoid.'—BUTTELL.

REFORM, REFORMATION.

Reform has a general, and reformation a particular application: whatever undergoes such a change as to give a new form to an object occasions a reform; when such a change is produced in the moral character, it is termed a reformation: the concerns of a state require occasional reform; which, when administered with discretion, may be of great benefit, otherwise of great injury; 'He was anxious to keep the distemper of France from the least countenance in England, where he was sure some wicked persons had shown a strong disposition to recommend an imitation of the French spirit of reform.'—BURKE. The concerns of an individual require reformation; 'Examples are pictures, and strike the senses, nay, raise the passions, and call in those (the strongest and most general of all motives) to the aid of reformation.'—POPE. When reform and reformation are applied to the moral character, the former has a more extensive signification than the latter: the term reform conveying the idea of a complete amendment; reformation implying only the process of amending or improving.

A reform in one's life and conversation will always be accompanied with a corresponding increase of happiness to the individual; when we observe any approaches to reformation, we may cease to despair of the individual who gives the happy indications.

TO RECLAIM, REFORM.

Reclaim, from clamo to call, signifies to call back to its right place that which has gone astray; reform signifies the same as in the preceding article.

A man is reclaimed from his vicious courses by the force of advice or exhortation; he may be reformed by various means, external or internal.

A parent endeavours to reclaim a child, but too often in vain; 'Scotland had nothing to dread from a princess of Mary's character, who was wholly occupied in endeavouring to reclaim her heretical subjects.'—RO

BERTSON. A hardened offender is seldom reformed, nor is a corrupt state easy to be reformed;

A monkey, to reform the times,
Resolv'd to visit foreign climes.—GAY.

PROGRESS, PROFICIENCY, IMPROVEMENT.

Progress (v. Proceeding) is a generic term, the rest are specific; proficiency, from the Latin proficio, compounded of pro and facio, signifies a profited state, that is to say, a progress already made; and improvement, from the verb improve, signifies an improved condition, that is, progress in that which improves. The progress here, as in the former paragraph, marks the step or motion onward, and the two others the point already reached; but the term progress is applied either in the proper or improper sense, that is, either to those travelling forward, or to those going on stepwise in any work; proficiency is applied in the proper sense, to the ground gained in an art, and improvement to what is gained in science or arts; when idle people set out about any work, it is difficult to perceive that they make any progress in it from time to time;

Solon, the sage, his progress never ceas'd,
But still his learning with his days increas'd.

DENHAM.

Those who have a thorough taste for either music or drawing will make a proficiency in it which is astonishing to those who are unacquainted with the circumstances; 'When the lad was about nineteen, his uncle desired to see him, that he might know what proficiency he had made.'—HAWKESWORTH. The improvement of the mind can never be so effectually and easily obtained as in the period of childhood; 'The metrical part of our poetry, in the time of Chaucer, was capable of more improvement.'—TYRWHITT.

PROGRESS, PROGRESSION, ADVANCE, ADVANCEMENT.

A forward motion is designated by these terms: but progress and progression simply imply this sort of motion; advance and advancement also imply an approximation to some object: we may make a progress in that which has no specific termination, as a progress in learning, which may cease only with life; 'I wish it were in my power to give a regular history of the progress which our ancestors have made in this species of versification.'—TYRWHITT. The advance is only made to some limited point or object in view; as an advance in wealth or honour, which may find a termination within the life; 'The most successful students make their advances in knowledge by short flights.'—JOHNSON.

Progress and advance are said of that which has been passed over; but progression and advancement may be said of that which one is passing: the progress is made, or a person is in advance; he is in the act of progression or advancement: a child makes a progress in learning by daily attention; the progression from one stage of learning to another is not always perceptible;

And better thence again, and better still,
In infinite progression.—THOMSON.

It is not always possible to overtake one who is in advance; sometimes a person's advancement is retarded by circumstances that are altogether contingent; 'I have lived to see the fierce advancement, the sudden turn, and the abrupt period, of three or four enormous friendships.'—POPE. The first step in any destructive course still prepares for the second, and the second for the third, after which there is no stop, but the progress is infinite.

CORRECTION, DISCIPLINE, PUNISHMENT.

As correction and discipline have commonly required punishment to render them efficacious, custom has affixed to them a strong resemblance in their application, although they are distinguished from each other by obvious marks of difference. The prominent idea in correction (v. To correct), is that of making right what has been wrong. In discipline, from the Latin disciplina and disco to learn, the leading idea is that of instructing or regulating. In punishment, from the Latin punio, and the Greek πᾶν pain, the leading idea is that of inflicting pain.

Children are the peculiar subjects of correction; discipline and punishment are confined to no age. A wise parent corrects his child;

Wilt thou, pupil-like,
Take thy correction mildly, kiss the rod?

SHAKESPEARE.

A master maintains discipline in his school; a general preserves discipline in his army; 'The imaginations of young men are of a roving nature, and their passions under no discipline or restraint.'—ADDISON. Whoever commits a fault is liable to be punished by those who have authority over him; if he commits a crime he subjects himself to be punished by law.

Correction and discipline are mostly exercised by means of chastisement, for which they are often employed as a substitute; punishment is inflicted in any way that gives pain. Correction and discipline are both of them personal acts of authority exercised by superiors over inferiors, but the former is mostly employed by one individual over another: the latter has regard to a number who are the subjects of it directly or indirectly: punishment has no relation whatever to the agent by which the action is performed; it may proceed alike from persons or things. A parent who spares the due correction of his child, or a master who does not use a proper discipline in his school, will alike be punished by the insubordination and irregularities of those over whom they have a control;

When by just vengeance impious mortals perish,
The gods behold their punishment with pleasure

ADDISON

TO CHASTEN, TO CHASTISE.

Chasten, chastise, both come through the French châtier, from the Latin castigo, which is compounded of castus and ago to make pure.

Chasten has most regard to the end, chastise to the means; the former is an act of the Deity, the latter a human action: God chastens his faithful people to cleanse them from their transgressions; parents chastise their children to prevent the repetition of faults: afflictions are the means which the Almighty adopts for chastening those whom he wishes to make more obedient to his will;

I follow thee, safe guide! the path
Thou leadst me; and to the hand of Heaven submit,
However chastening.—MILTON.

Stripes are the means by which offenders are chastised; 'Bad characters are dispersed abroad with profusion; I hope for example's sake, and (as punishments are designed by the civil power) more for the delivering of the innocent, than the chastising of the guilty.'—HUGHES. To chasten is also sometimes taken in the sense of making chaste by a course of discipline, either moral, literary, or religious, as to chasten the fancy, or to chasten the style; 'By repairing sometimes to the house of mourning, you would chasten the looseness of fancy.'—BLAIR.

STRICT, SEVERE.

Strict, from strictus, bound or confined, characterizes the thing which binds or keeps in control: severe (v. Austere) characterizes in the proper sense the disposition of the person to inflict pain, and in an extended application the thing which inflicts pain. The term strict is, therefore, taken always in the good sense; severe is good or bad, according to circumstances: he who has authority over others must be strict in enforcing obedience, in keeping good order, and a proper attention to their duties; but it is possible to be very severe in punishing those who are under us, and yet very lax in all matters that our duty demands of us;

Lycurgus then, who bow'd beneath the force
Of strictest discipline, severely wise,
All human passions.—THOMSON.

FINE, MULCT, PENALTY, FORFEITURE.

Fine, from the Latin finis the end or purpose, signifies, by an extended application, satisfaction by way of amends for an offence; mulct, in Latin mulcta, comes from mulgeo to draw or wipe, because an offence is wiped off by money; penalty, in Latin pœnalitus, from pœna a pain, signifies what gives pain by way of punishment; forfeiture, from forfeit, in French forfait, from forfaire, signifies to do away or lose by doing wrong.

The fine and mult are always pecuniary; a penalty may be pecuniary; a forfeiture applies to any loss of personal property; the fine and mult are imposed; the penalty is inflicted or incurred; the forfeiture is incurred.

The violation of a rule or law is attended with a fine or mult, but the former is a term of general use; the latter is rather a technical term in law: a criminal offence incurs a penalty: negligence of duty occasions the forfeiture.

A fine or mult serves either as punishment to the offender, or as an amends for the offence;

Too dear a fine, ah much lamented maid!

For warring with the Trojans thou hast paid.

DRYDEN.

For to prohibit and dispense,

To find out or to make offence,

To set what characters they please,

And mults on sin, or godliness,

Must prove a pretty thriving trade.—BUTLER.

A penalty always inflicts some kind of pain as a punishment on the offender; 'It must be confessed, that as for the laws of men, gratitude is not enjoined by the sanction of penalties.'—SOUTH. A forfeiture is attended with loss as a punishment to the delinquent: 'The Earl of Hereford, being tried secundum leges Normannorum, could only be punished by a forfeiture of his inheritance.'—TYRWHITT. 'In the Roman law, if a lord manumits his slave, gross ingratitude in the person so made free forfeits his freedom.'—SOUTH. Among the Chinese, all offences are punished with fines or flogging; the Roman Catholics were formerly subject to penalties if detected in the performance of their religious worship: societies subject their members to forfeitures for the violation of their laws.

TO BANISH, EXILE, EXPEL.

Banish, in French bannir, German bannen, signified to put out of a community by a ban or civil interdict, which was formerly either ecclesiastical or civil; exile, in French exiler, from the Latin exilium banishment; and exul an exile, compounded of extra and solum the soil, signifies to put away from one's native soil or country; expel, in Latin expello, compounded of ex and pello to drive, signifies to drive out.

The idea of exclusion, or of a coercive removal from a place, is common to these terms: banishment includes the removal from any place, or the prohibition of access to any place, where one has been, or whither one is in the habit of going; exile signifies the removal from one's home: to exile, therefore, is to banish, but to banish, is not always to exile.* the Tarquins were banished from Rome; Coriolanus was exiled.

Banishment follows from a decree of justice; exile either by the necessity of circumstances or an order of authority: banishment is a disgraceful punishment inflicted by tribunals upon delinquents; exile is a disgrace incurred without dishonour: exile removes us from our country: banishment drives us from it ignominiously: it is the custom in Russia to banish offenders to Siberia; Ovid was exiled by an order of Augustus.

Banishment is an action, a compulsory exercise of power over another, which must be submitted to;

O banishment! Eternal banishment!

Ne'er to return! Must we ne'er meet again!

My heart will break.—OTWAY.

Exile is a state into which we may go voluntarily; many Romans chose to go into exile rather than await the judgement of the people, by whom they might have been banished;

Arms, and the man I sing, who forc'd by fate,
And haughty Juno's unrelenting hate,
Expell'd and exil'd, left the Trojan shore.—DRYDEN

Banishment and expulsion both mark a disgraceful and coercive exclusion, but banishment is authoritative; it is a public act of government: expulsion is simply coercive; it is the act of a private individual, or a small community; 'The expulsion and escape of Hippas at length set Athens free.'—CUMBERLAND. Banishment always supposes a removal to a distant spot, to another land; expulsion never reaches beyond a particular house or society: expulsion from the university, or any public school, is the necessary consequence of discovering a refractory temper, or a propensity to insubordination.

Banishment and expulsion are likewise used in a figurative sense, although exile is not; in this sense, banishment marks a distant and entire removal; expulsion a violent removal: we banish that which it is not prudent to retain; we expel that which is noxious. Hopes are banished from the mind when every prospect of success has disappeared; fears are banished when they are altogether groundless;

If sweet content is banish'd from my soul,
Life grows a burden and a weight of wo.

GENTLEMAN.

Envy, hatred, and every evil passion, should be expelled from the mind as disturbers of its peace: harmony and good humour are best promoted by banishing from conversation all subjects of difference in religion and politics; good morals require that every unseemly word should be expelled from conversation; 'In all the tottering imbecility of a new government, and with a parliament totally unmanageable, his Majesty (King William III.) persevered. He persevered to expel the fears of his people by his fortitude; to steady their fickleness by his constancy.'—BURKE.

PREVAILING, PREVALENT, RULING, OVERRULING, PREDOMINANT.

Prevailing and prevalent both come from the Latin prevaleo to be strong above others; ruling, overruling, and predominant (from dominor to rule), signify ruling or bearing greater sway than others.

Prevailing expresses the actual state or quality of a particular object: prevalent marks the quality of prevailing, as it affects objects in general. The same distinction exists between overruling and predominant. A person has a prevailing sense of religion; 'The evils naturally consequent upon a prevailing temptation are intolerable.'—SOUTH. Religious feeling is prevalent in a country or in a community. The prevailing idea at present is in favour of the legitimate rights of sovereigns: a contrary principle has been very prevalent for many years; 'The conduct of a peculiar providence made the instruments of that great design prevalent and victorious, and all those mountains of opposition to become plains.'—SOUTH. Prevailing and prevalent mark simply the existing state of superiority: ruling and predominant express this state, in relation to some other which it has superseded or reduced to a state of inferiority. An opinion is said to be prevailing as respects the number of persons by whom it is maintained: a principle is said to be ruling as respects the superior influence which it has over the conduct of men more than any other;

Whate'er thou shalt ordain, thou ruling pow'r,
Unknown and sudden be the dreadful hour.

ROWE.

An argument is overruling that bears down every other, and Providence is said to be overruling when it determines things contrary to the natural course of events; 'Nor can a man independently of the overruling influence of God's blessing and care, call him self one penny richer.'—SOUTH. Particular disorders are prevalent at certain seasons of the year, when they affect the generality of persons: a particular taste or fashion is predominant which supersedes all other tastes or fashions. Excessive drinking is too prevalent a practice in England: virtue is certainly predominant over vice in this country, if it be in any country; 'The doctrine of not owning a foreigner to be a king was held and taught by the Pharisees, a predominant sect of the Jews.'—PRIDEAUX.

* Vide Roubaud: "Exiler, bannir."

TO OVERBALANCE, OUTWEIGH, PREPONDERATE.

To overbalance is to throw the balance over on one side; to outweigh is to exceed in weight; to preponderate, from pro before, and pondus a weight, signifies also to exceed in weight.

Although these terms approach so near to each other in their original meaning, yet they have now a different application: in the proper sense, a person overbalances himself who loses his balance and goes on one side; a heavy body outweighs one that is light, when they are put into the same pair of scales. Overbalance and outweigh are likewise used in the improper application; preponderate is never used otherwise: things are said to overbalance which are supposed to turn the scale to one side or the other; they are said to outweigh when they are to be weighed against each other; they are said to preponderate when one weighs every thing else down: the evils which arise from innovations in society commonly overbalance the good; 'Whatever any man may have written or done, his precepts or his valour will scarcely overbalance the unimportant uniformity which runs through his time.'—JOHNSON. The will of a parent should outweigh every personal consideration in the mind of a child;

If endless ages can outweigh an hour,

Let not the laurel but the palm inspire.—YOUNG.

Children can never be unmindful of their duty to their parents where the power of religion preponderates in the heart; 'Looks which do not correspond with the heart cannot be assumed without labour, nor continued without pain; the motive to relinquish them must, therefore, soon preponderate.'—HAWKESWORTH.

TO OVERRULE, SUPERSEDE.

To overrule is literally to get the superiority of rule; and to supersede is to get the upper or superiour seat; but the former is employed only as the act of persons or things personified; the latter is also applied to things as the agents: a man may be overruled in his domestic government, or he may be overruled in a public assembly, or he may be overruled in the cabinet; 'When fancy begins to be overruled by reason, and corrected by experience, the most artful tale raises but little curiosity.'—JOHNSON. Large works in general supersede the necessity of smaller ones, by containing that which is superiour both in quantity and quality; or one person supersedes another in an office; 'Christoval received a commission empowering him to supersede Cortes.'—ROBERTSON.

CHIEF, CHIEFTAIN, LEADER, HEAD.

Chief and chieftain signify he who is chief; leader, from to lead, and head, from the head, sufficiently designate their own signification.

Chief respects precedence in civil matters; leader regards the direction of enterprises: chieftain is employed for the superiour in military rank; and head for the superiour in general concerns.

Among savages the chief of every tribe is a despotick prince within his own district. Factions and parties in a state, like savage tribes, must have their leaders, to whom they are blindly devoted, and by whom they are instigated to every desperate proceeding. Robbers have their chieftains, who plan and direct every thing, having an unlimited power over the band. The heads of families were, in the primitive ages, the chiefs, who in conjunction regulated the affairs of state.

Chiefs have a permanent power, which may descend by inheritance to branches of the same families;

No chief like thee, Menestheus, Greece could yield,
To marshal armies in the dusty field.—POPE.

Leaders and chieftains have a deputed power with which they are invested, as the time and occasion require; 'Their constant emulation in military renown dissolved not that inviolable friendship which the ancient Saxons professed to their chieftain and to each other.'—HUME. 'Savage alleged that he was then dependent upon the Lord Tyrconnel, who was an implicit follower of the ministry; and, being enjoined by him, not without menaces, to write in praise of his leader, he had not sufficient resolution to sacrifice the pleasure of affluence to that of integrity.'—JOHNSON. Heads have a natural power springing out of the nature of their birth, rank, talents, and situation; it is not hereditary, but it may be successive, as the father is the head of his family, and may be succeeded by his son; a head is also sometimes temporary and partial, as the head of a party; 'As each is more able to distinguish himself as the head of a party, he will less readily be made a follower or associate.'—JOHNSON.

Chiefs ought to have superiority of birth combined with talents for ruling; leaders and chieftains require a bold and enterprising spirit; heads should have talents for directing.

CHIEF, PRINCIPAL, MAIN.

Chief, in French chef, from the Latin caput the head, signifies belonging to the uppermost part; principal, in French principal, Latin principalis, comes from princeps a chief or prince, signifying belonging to a prince; main, from the Latin magnus, signifies in a great degree.

Chief respects order and rank; principal has regard to importance and respectability; main to degree or quantity. We speak of a chief clerk; a commander in chief; the chief person in a city: but the principal people in a city; the principal circumstances in a narrative, and the main object.

The chief cities, as mentioned by geographers, are those which are classed in the first rank;

What is man,

If his chief good and market of his time

Be but to sleep and feed? A beast, no more!

SHAKESPEARE.

The principal cities generally include those which are the most considerable for wealth and population; these, however, are not always technically comprehended under the name of chief cities; 'The right which one man has to the actions of another is generally borrowed, or derived from one or both of these two great originals, production or possession, which two are certainly the principal and most undoubted rights that take place in the world.'—SOUTH. The main end of man's exertions is the acquirement of wealth; 'To the accidental or adventitious parts of Paradise Lost, some slight exceptions may be made; but the main fabrick is immovably supported.'—JOHNSON.

ESPECIALLY, PARTICULARLY, PRINCIPALLY, CHIEFLY.

Especially and particularly are exclusive or superlative in their import; they refer to one object out of many that is superiour to all: principally and chiefly are comparative in their import; they designate in general the superiority of some objects over others. Especially is a term of stronger import than particularly, and principally expresses something less general than chiefly: we ought to have God before our eyes at all times, but especially in those moments when we present ourselves before him in prayer; 'All love has something of blindness in it, but the love of money especially.'—SOUTH. The heat is very oppressive in all countries under the torrid zone, but particularly in the deserts of Arabia, where there is a want of shade and moisture; 'Particularly let a man dread every gross act of sin.'—SOUTH. It is principally among the higher and lower orders of society that we find vices of every description to be prevalent; 'Neither Pythagoras nor any of his disciples were, properly speaking, practitioners of physick, since they applied themselves principally to the theory.'—JAMES. Patriots who declaim so loudly against the measures of government do it chiefly (may I not say solely?) with a view to their own interest; 'The reformers gained credit chiefly among persons in the lower and middle classes.'—ROBERTSON.

TO GOVERN, RULE, REGULATE.

Govern, in French gouverner, comes from the Latin gubernare, Greek κυβερνάω, which properly signify to govern a ship, and are in all probability derived from the Hebrew גָּבַר to prevail or be strong: rule and regulate signify to bring under a rule, or make by rule.

The exercise of authority enters more or less into the signification of these terms; but to govern implies the exercise likewise of judgement and knowledge.

To rule implies rather the unqualified exercise of power, the making the will the rule; a king governs his people by means of wise laws and an upright administration: a despot rules over a nation according to his arbitrary decision; if he have no principle his rule becomes an oppressive tyranny: of Robespierre it has been said, that if he did not know how to govern, he aimed at least at ruling.

These terms are applied either to persons or things: persons govern or rule others; or they govern, rule, or regulate things.

In regard to persons, govern is always in a good sense, but rule is sometimes taken in a bad sense; it is naturally associated with an abuse of power: to govern is so perfectly discretionary, that we speak of governing ourselves; but we speak only of ruling others: nothing can be more lamentable than to be ruled by one who does not know how to govern himself;

Slaves to our passions we become, and then
It becomes impossible to govern men.—WALLER.

It is the business of a man to rule his house by keeping all its members in due subjection to his authority; it is the duty of a person to rule those who are under him in all matters wherein they are incompetent to govern themselves;

Marg'ret shall now be queen, and rule the king,
But I will rule both her, the king, and realm.
SHAKESPEARE.

To govern, necessarily supposes the adoption of judicious means; but ruling is confined to no means but such as will obtain the end of subjecting the will of one to that of another; a woman is said to rule by obeying; an artful and imperious woman will have recourse to various stratagems to elude the power to which she ought to submit, and render it subservient to her own purposes.

In application to things, govern and rule admit of a similar distinction: a minister governs the state, and a pilot governs the vessel; the movements of the machine are in both cases directed by the exercise of the judgement;

Whence can this very motion take its birth,
Not sure from matter, from dull clods of earth?
But from a living spirit lodg'd within,
Which governs all the bodily machine.—JENYNS.

A person rules the times, seasons, fashions, and the like; it is an act of the individual will;

When I behold a factious band agree,
To call it freedom when themselves are free;
Each wanton judge new penal statutes draw;
Laws grind the poor, and rich men rule the law;
I fly from petty tyrants to the throne.—GOLDSMITH.

Regulate is a species of governing simply by judgement; the word is applicable to things of minor moment, where the force of authority is not so requisite: one governs the affairs of a nation, or a large body where great interests are involved; we regulate the concerns of an individual, or we regulate in cases where good order or convenience only is consulted;

Regulate the patient in his manner of living.—WISEMAN. So likewise in regard to ourselves, we govern our passions, but we regulate our affections.

These terms are all properly used to denote the acts of conscious agents, but by a figure of personification they may be applied to inanimate or moral objects: the price of one market governs the price of another, or governs the seller in his demand; 'The chief point which he is to carry always in his eye, and by which he is to govern all his counsels, designs, and actions.'—ATTERBURY. Fashion and caprice rule the majority, or particular fashions rule;

Distracting thoughts by turns his bosom rule'd,
Now fir'd by wrath, and now by reason cool'd.
POPE.

One clock may regulate many others; 'Though a sense of moral good and evil be deeply impressed on the heart of man, it is not of sufficient power to regulate his life.'—BLAIR.

GOVERNMENT, ADMINISTRATION.

Both these terms may be employed either to designate the act of governing and administering, or the persons governing and administering. In both cases government has a more extensive meaning than administration: the government includes every exercise of authority; the administration implies only that exercise of authority, which consists in putting the laws or will of another in force: hence, when we speak of the government, as it respects the persons, it implies the whole body of constituted authorities; and the administration, only that part which puts in execution the intentions of the whole: the government of a country, therefore, may remain unaltered, while the administration undergoes many changes; 'Government is an art above the attainment of an ordinary genius.'—SOUTH. It is the business of the government to make treaties of peace and war; and without a government it is impossible for any people to negotiate; 'What are we to do if the government and the whole community are of the same description?'—BURKE. It is the business of the administration to administer justice, to regulate the finances, and to direct all the complicated concerns of a nation; without an administration all public business would be at a stand; 'In treating of an invisible world, and the administration of government there carried on by the Father of spirits, particulars occur which appear incomprehensible.'—BLAIR.

GOVERNMENT, CONSTITUTION.

Government is here as in the former article (v. Government) the generic term; constitution the specific. Government implies generally the act of governing or exercising authority under any form whatever; constitution implies any constituted or fixed form of government: we may have a government without a constitution; we cannot have a constitution without a government. In the first formation of society government was placed in the hands of individuals who exercised authority according to discretion rather than any fixed rule or law: here then was government without a constitution: as time and experience proved the necessity of some established form, and the wisdom of enlightened men discovered the advantages and disadvantages of different forms, government in every country assumed a more definite shape, and became the constitution of the country; hence then the union of government and constitution. Governments are divided by political writers into three classes, monarchical, aristocratic, and republican: but these three general forms have been adopted with such variations and modifications as to render the constitution of every country something peculiar to itself; 'Free governments have committed more flagrant acts of tyranny than the most perfect despotick governments which we have ever known.'—BURKE. 'The physician of the state who, not satisfied with the cure of distempers, undertakes to regenerate constitutions, ought to show uncommon powers.'—BURKE.

Political squabblers have always chosen to consider government in its limited sense as including only the supreme or executive authority, and the constitution as that which is set up by the authority of the people; but this is only a forced application of a general term to serve the purposes of party. Constitution, according to its real signification, does not convey the idea of the source of power any more than government; the constitution may with as much propriety be formed or constituted by the monarch as government is exercised by the monarch; and of this we may be assured, that what is to be formed specifically by any person or persons so as to become constituted must be framed by something more authoritative than a rabble. The constitution may, as I have before observed, be the work of time, for most of the constitutions in Europe, whether republican or monarchical, are indebted to time and the natural course of events for their establishment; but in our own country the case has been so far different that by the wisdom and humanity of those in government or power, a constitution has been expressly formed, which distinguishes the English nation from all others. Hence the word constitution is applied by distinction to the English form of government; and since this constitution has happily secured the rights and liberties of the people by salutary laws, a vulgar error has arisen that the constitution is the work of the people, and by a natural consequence it is maintained that the people, if they are not satisfied with their constitution, have the right of introducing changes; a dangerous error which cannot be combated with too much steadfastness. It must be obvious to all who reflect on this subject that the constitution, as far as it is assignable to the efforts of any man or set of men, was never the work of the people; but of the government or those who held the supreme power.

This view of the matter is calculated to lessen the jealousies of the people towards their government, and to abate that overweening complacency with which they are apt to look upon themselves, and their own imaginary work; for it is impossible but that they must regard with a more dispassionate eye the possessors of power, when they see themselves indebted to those in power for the most admirable constitution ever framed.

The constitution is in danger, is the watchword of a party who want to increase the power of the people; but every one who is acquainted with history, and remembers that before the constitution was fully formed it was the people who overturned the government, will perceive that much more is to be apprehended by throwing any weight into the scale of the popular side of government, than by strengthening the hands of the executive government. The constitution of England has arrived at the acme of human perfection; it ensures to every man as much as he can wish; it deprives no man of what he can consistently with the public peace expect; it has within itself adequate powers for correcting every evil and abuse as it may arise, and is fully competent to make such modifications of its own powers as the circumstances may require. Every good citizen therefore will be contented to leave the government of the country in the hands of those constituted authorities as they at present exist, fully assured that if they have not the wisdom and the power to meet every exigency, the evil will not be diminished by making the people our legislators.

UNRULY, UNGOVERNABLE, REFRACTORY.

Unruly marks the want of disposition to be ruled; ungovernable, an absolute incapacity to be governed: the former is a temporary or partial error, the latter is an habitual defect in the temper: a volatile child will be occasionally unruly; any child of strong passions will become ungovernable by excessive indulgence: we say that our wills are unruly, and our tempers are ungovernable; 'How hardly is the restive unruly will of man first tamed and broke to duty.'—SOUTH.

Heav'ns, how unlike their Belgic sires of old!
Rough, poor, content, ungovernably bold.

GOLDSMITH.

The unruly respects that which is to be ruled or turned at the instant, and is applicable therefore to the management of children: ungovernable respects that which is to be put into a regular course, and is applicable therefore either to the management of children or the direction of those who are above the state of childhood; a child is unruly in his actions, and ungovernable in his conduct. Refractory, which from the Latin refringo to break open, marks the disposition to break every thing down before it, is the excess of the unruly with regard to children: the unruly is however negative; but the refractory is positive: an unruly child objects to be ruled; a refractory child sets up a positive resistance to all rule: an unruly child may be altogether silent and passive; a refractory child always commits himself by some act of intemperance in word or deed: he is unruly if in any degree he gives trouble in the ruling; he is refractory if he refuses altogether to be ruled. This term refractory may also be applied to the brutes; 'I conceive (replied Nicholas) I stand here before you, my most equitable judges, for no worse a crime than cudgelling my refractory mules.

CUMBERLAND.

TUMULTUOUS, TURBULENT, SEDITION, MUTINIOUS.

Tumultuous describes the disposition to make a noise; those who attend the play-houses, particularly the lower orders, are frequently tumultuous; 'Many civil broils and tumultuous rebellions, they fairly overcame, by reason of the continual presence of their king, whose only presence oftentimes constrains the unruly people from a thousand evil occasions.'—SPENSER (on Ireland). Turbulent marks a hostile spirit of resistance to authority; when prisoners are dissatisfied they are frequently turbulent; 'Men of ambitious and turbulent spirits, that were dissatisfied with privacy, were allowed to engage in matters of state.'—BENTLEY. Seditious marks a spirit of resistance to government; during the French revolution the people were often disposed to be seditious; 'Very many of the nobility in Edinburgh, at that time, did not appear yet in this seditious behaviour.'—CLARENDON.—Mutinous marks a spirit of resistance against officers either in the army or navy; a general will not fail to quell the first risings of a mutinous spirit;

Lend me your guards, that if persuasion fail;

Force may against the mutinous prevail. —WALLER

Electioneering mobs are always tumultuous; the young and the ignorant are so averse to control that they are easily led by the example of an individual to be turbulent; among the Romans the people were in the habit of holding seditious meetings, and some times the soldiery would be mutinous.

TUMULTUOUS, TUMULTUARY

Tumultuous signifies having tumult; tumultuary, disposed for tumult: the former is applied to object, in general; the latter to persons only: in tumultuous meetings the voice of reason is the last thing that is heard;

But, O! beyond description happiest he

Who ne'er must roll on life's tumultuous sea.

PRIOR.

It is the natural tendency of large and promiscuous assemblies to become tumultuary; 'With tumultuary, but irresistible violence, the Scotch insurgents fell upon the churches in that city (Perth).'
—ROBERTSON.

INSURRECTION, SEDITION, REBELLION, REVOLT.

Insurrection, from surgo to rise up, signifies rising up, against any power that is; sedition, in Latin seditio compounded of se and itio, signifies a going apart, that is, the people going apart from the government; rebellion, in Latin rebellio, from rebellio, signifies turning upon or against in a hostile manner; revolt, in French revolter, is most probably compounded of re and volver, from volvo to roll, signifying to roll or turn back from, to turn against.

The term insurrection is general; it is used in a good or bad sense, according to the nature of the power against which one rises up; sedition and rebellion are more specific; they are always taken in the bad sense of unallowed opposition to lawful authority. There may be an insurrection against usurped power which is always justifiable; but sedition and rebellion are levelled against power universally acknowledged to be legitimate. Insurrection is always open; it is a rising up of many in a mass; but it does not imply any concerted, or any specifically active measure; a united spirit of opposition, as the moving cause, is all that is comprehended in the meaning of the term; 'Elizabeth enjoyed a wonderful calm (excepting some short gusts of insurrection at the beginning) for near upon forty-five years together.'—HOWELL. Sedition is either secret or open, according to circumstances, in popular governments it will be open and determined; in monarchical governments it is secretly organized; 'When the Roman people began to bring in plebeians to the office of chiefest power and dignity, then began those seditious which so long distempered, and at length ruined, the state.'—TEMPLE. Rebellion is the consummation of sedition; the scheme of opposition which has been digested in secrecy breaks out into open hostilities, and becomes rebellion.

If that rebellion

Came like itself, in base and abject routs,
You reverend father, and these noble lords,
Had not been here to dress the ugly forms
Of base and bloody insurrection.—SHAKESPEARE.

The insurrection which was headed by Wat Tyler, in the time of Richard II. was an unhappy instance of widely extended delusion among the common people; the insurrection in Madrid, in the year 1808. against the infamous usurpation of Buonaparte, has led to the most important results that ever sprung from any commotion. Rome was the grand theatre of seditions, which were set on foot by the Tribunes: England has been disgraced by one rebellion, which ended in the death of its king.

Sedition is common to all forms of government, but flourishes most in republics, since there it can scarcely be regarded as a political or moral offence: rebellion exists properly in none but monarchical states; in which the allegiance that men owe to their sovereign requires to be broken with the utmost violence, in order to be shaken off. Insurrections may be made by nations against a foreign dominion, or by subjects against their government: sedition and rebellion are carried on by subjects only against their government: revolt is carried on only by nations against a foreign dominion; upon the death of Alexander the Great most of his conquered countries revolted from his successors; 'He was greatly strengthened, and the enemy as much enfeebled by daily revolts.'—RALEIGH.

Revolt is also applied to moral objects in the same sense; 'Our self-love is ever ready to revolt from our better judgement, and join the enemy within.'—STEELE.

FACTION, PARTY

* These two words equally suppose the union of many persons, and their opposition to certain views different from their own. But faction, from factio making, denotes an activity and secret machination against those whose views are opposed; and party, from the verb to part or split, expresses only a division of opinion.

The term party has of itself nothing odious, that of faction is always so. Any man, without distinction of rank, may have a party either at court or in the army, in the city or in literature, without being himself immediately implicated in raising it; but factions are always the result of active efforts; one may have a party for one's merit from the number and ardour of one's friends; but a faction is raised by busy and turbulent spirits for their own purposes. Rome was torn by the intestine factions of Cæsar and Pompey; France, from the commencement of the revolution to the period of Buonaparte's usurpation, was successively governed by some ruling faction which raised itself upon the ruins of that which it had destroyed. Factions are not so prevalent in England as parties, owing to the peculiar excellence of the constitution; but there are not wanting factionous spirits who, if they could overturn the present balance of power which has been so happily obtained, would have an opportunity of practising their arts alternately on the high and low, and carrying on their schemes by the aid of both. Faction is the demon of discord, armed with the power to do endless mischief, and intent alone on destroying whatever opposes its progress. Wo to that state into which it has found an entrance; 'It is the restless ambition of a few artful men that thus breaks a people into factions, and draws several well-meaning persons to their interest by a specious concern for their country.'—ADDISON. Party spirit may show itself in noisy debate; but while it keeps within the legitimate bounds of opposition, it is an evil that must be endured; 'As men formerly became eminent in learned societies by their parts and acquisitions, they now distinguish themselves by the warmth and violence with which they espouse their respective parties.'—ADDISON.

FACTIOUS, SEDITIOUS.

Factious, in Latin factiosus from facio to do, signifies the same as busy or intermeddling; ready to take an active part in matters of one's own immediate concern; seditious, in Latin sediciosus, signifies prone to sedition (v. Insurrection).

* Vide Beauzée: "Faction, parti."

Factious is an epithet to characterize the tempers of men; seditious characterizes their conduct: the factious man attempts to raise himself into importance, he aims at authority, and seeks to interfere in the measures of government; the seditious man attempts to excite others, and to provoke their resistance to established authority: the first wants to be a law-giver; the second does not hesitate to be a law-breaker: the first wants to direct the state; the second to overturn it: the factious man is mostly in possession of either power, rank, or fortune; the seditious man is seldom elevated in station or circumstances above the mass of the people. The Roman tribunes were in general little better than factious demagogues; such, in fact, as abound in all republics: Wat Tyler was a seditious disturber of the peace. Factious is mostly applied to individuals;

He is a traitor, let him to the Tower,
And crop away that factious part of his.

SHAKESPEARE

Seditious is employed for bodies of men; hence we speak of a factious nobleman, a seditious multitude; 'France is considered (by the ministry) as merely a foreign power, and the seditious English only as a domestic faction.'—BURKE.

OBSTINATE, CONTUMACIOUS, STUBBORN, HEADSTRONG, HEADY

Obstinate, in Latin obstinatus, participle of obstino, from ob and stino, sto or sisto, signifies standing in the way of another; contumacious, prone to contumacy (v. Contumacy); stubborn, or stoutborn, stiff or immovable by nature; headstrong, strong in the head or the mind; and heady, full of one's own head.

Obstinacy is a habit of the mind; contumacy is either a particular state of feeling or a mode of action: obstinacy consists in an attachment to one's own mode of acting; contumacy consists in a swelling contempt of others: the obstinate man adheres tenaciously to his own ways, and opposes reason to reason: the contumacious man disputes the right of another to control his actions, and opposes force to force. Obstinacy interferes with a man's private conduct, and makes him blind to right reason; contumacy is a crime against lawful authority; the contumacious man sets himself against his superiors: when young people are obstinate they are bad subjects of education;

But man we find the only creature
Who, led by folly, combats nature;
Who, when she loudly cries, forbear
With obstinacy fixes there.—SWIFT.

When people are contumacious they are troublesome subjects to the king; 'When an offender is cited to appear in any ecclesiastical court, and he neglects to do it, he is pronounced contumacious.'—BEVERIDGE.

The stubborn and the headstrong are species of the obstinate: the former lies altogether in the perversion of the will; the latter in the perversion of the judgement: the stubborn person wills what he wills; the headstrong person thinks what he thinks. Stubbornness is mostly inherent in the nature: a headstrong temper is commonly associated with violence and impetuosity of character. Obstinacy discovers itself in persons of all ages and stations; a stubborn and headstrong disposition betray themselves mostly in those who are bound to conform to the will of another.

The obstinate keep the opinions which they have once embraced in spite of all proof; but they are not hasty in forming their opinions, nor adopt them without a choice: the headstrong seize the first opinion that offer, and act upon them in spite of all remonstrance;

We, blindly by our headstrong passions led,
Are hot for action.—DRYDEN.

The stubborn follow the ruling will or bent of the mind, without regard to any opinions: they are not to be turned by force or persuasion;

From whence he brought them to these salvage parts
And with science mollified their stubborn hearts.

SPENSER.

If an obstinate child be treated with some degree of indulgence, there may be hopes of correcting his failing; but a stubborn and a headstrong child are troublesome subjects of education, who will baffle the utmost skill and patience: the former is insensible to all reason; the latter has blinded the little reason which he possesses: the former is unconscious of every thing, but the simple will and determination to do what he does; the latter is so preoccupied with his own favourite ideas as to set every other at naught: force serves mostly to confirm both in their perverse resolution of persistence. Heady is applied as an epithet to the thing rather than the person; 'Heady confidence promises victory without contest.'—JOHNSON.

CONTUMACY, REBELLION.

Contumacy, from the Latin contumax, compounded of contra and tumeo to swell, signifies the swelling one's self by way of resistance; rebellion, in Latin rebellio, from rebello, or re and bello to war in return, signifies carrying on war against those to whom we owe, and have before paid, a lawful subjection.

Resistance to lawful authority is the common idea included in the signification of both these terms, but contumacy does not express so much as rebellion: the contumacious resist only occasionally; the rebel resists systematically: the contumacious stand only on certain points, and oppose the individual; the rebel sets himself up against the authority itself: the contumacious thwart and contradict, they never resort to open violence; the rebel acts only by main force: contumacy shelters itself under the plea of equity and justice;

The censor told the criminal that he spoke in contempt of the court, and that he should be proceeded against for contumacy.—ADDISON. Rebellion sets all law and order at defiance; 'The mother of Waller was the daughter of John Hampden of Hampden, in the same county, and sister to Hampden the zealot of rebellion.'—JOHNSON.

DISAFFECTION, DISLOYALTY.

Disaffection is general; disloyalty is particular, being a species of disaffection. Men are disaffected to the government; disloyal to their prince.

Disaffection may be said with regard to any form of government; disloyalty only with regard to a monarchy. Although both terms are commonly employed in a bad sense, yet the former does not always convey the unfavourable meaning which is attached to the latter. A man may have reasons to think himself justified in disaffection; but he will never attempt to offer any thing in justification of disloyalty. A usurped government will have many disaffected subjects with whom it must deal leniently;

Yet, I protest, it is no salt desire
Of seeing countries shifting for a religion!
Nor any disaffection to the state
Where I was bred, and unto which I owe
My dearest plots, hath brought me out.

BEN JONSON.

The best king may have disloyal subjects, upon whom he must exercise the rigour of the law; 'Milton being cleared from the effects of his disloyalty, had nothing required from him but the common duty of living in quiet.'—JOHNSON. Many were disaffected to the usurpation of Oliver Cromwell, because they would not be disloyal to their king.

GUIDE, RULE.

Guide, signifies either the person that guides, or the thing that guides; rule is only the thing that rules or regulates; guide is to rule as the genus to the species; every rule is a guide to a certain extent; but the guide is often that which exceeds the rule. The guide, in the moral sense, as in the proper sense, goes with us, and points out the exact path; it does not permit us to err either to the right or left; the rule marks out a line, beyond which we may not go; but it leaves us to trace the line, and consequently to fail either on the one side or other.

The Bible is our best guide for moral practice; 'You must first apply to religion as the guide of life, before you can have recourse to it as the refuge of sorrow.'—BLAIR. Its doctrines as interpreted in the articles of the established church are the best rule of faith for every Christian; 'There is something so wild and yet so solemn, in Shakspeare's speeches of his ghosts and fairies, and the like imaginary persons, that we cannot forbear thinking them natural, though we have no rule by which to judge them.'—ADDISON.

AXIOM, MAXIM, APHORISM, APOPTHEGM, SAYING, ADAGE, PROVERB, BY-WORD SAW.

Axiom, in French axiome, Latin axioma, comes from the Greek ἀξίω to think worthy, signifying the thing valued; maxim, in French maxime, in Latin maximus the greatest, signifies that which is most important; aphorism, from the Greek ἀφορισμός a short sentence, and ἀφορίζω to distinguish, signifies that which is set apart; apophthegm, in Greek ἀποφθέγμα, from ἀποφθγγομαι to speak pointedly, signifies a pointed saying; saying signifies literally what is said, that is, said habitually; adage, in Latin adagium, probably compounded of ad and ago, signifies that which is fit to be acted upon; proverb, in French proverbe, Latin proverbium, compounded of pro and verbum, signifies that expression which stands for something particular; by-word signifies a word by the by, or by the way, in the course of conversation; saw is but a variation of say, put for saying.

A given sentiment conveyed in a specific sentence, or form of expression, is the common idea included in the signification of these terms. The axiom is a truth of the first value; a self-evident proposition which is the basis of other truths. A maxim is a truth of the first moral importance for all practical purposes. An aphorism is a truth set apart for its pointedness and excellence. Apophthegm is, in respect to the ancients, what saying is in regard to the moderns; it is a pointed sentiment pronounced by an individual, and adopted by others. Adage and proverb are vulgar sayings, the former among the ancients, the latter among the moderns. A by-word is a casual saying, originating in some local circumstance. The saw, which is a barbarous corruption of saying, is a saying formerly current among the ignorant.

Axioms are in science what maxims are in morals; self-evidence is an essential characteristic in both; the axiom presents itself in so simple and undeniable a form to the understanding as to exclude doubt, and the necessity for reasoning. The maxim, though not so definite in its expression as the axiom, is at the same time equally parallel to the mind of man, and of such general application, that it is acknowledged by all moral agents who are susceptible of moral truth; it comes home to the common sense of all mankind. * "Things that are equal to one and the same thing are equal to each other."—"Two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time," are axioms in mathematics and metaphysics. "Virtue is the true source of happiness,"—"The happiness of man is the end of civil government," are axioms in ethics and politics. "To err is human, to forgive divine,"—"When our vices leave us, we flatter ourselves that we leave them," are among the number of maxims. Between axioms and maxims there is this obvious difference to be observed; that the axiom is unchangeable both in matter and manner, and admits of little or no increase in number; the maxim may vary with the circumstances of human life, and admit of considerable extension; 'Those authors are to be read at schools, that supply most axioms of prudence, most principles of moral truth.'—JOHNSON. 'It was my grandfather's maxim, that a young man seldom makes much money, who is out of his time before two and twenty.'—JOHNSON.

Aphorism is a speculative principle, either in science or morals, which is presented in a few words to the understanding: it is the substance of a doctrine, and many aphorisms may contain the abstract of a science. Of this description are the aphorisms of Hippocrates, and those of Lavater in physiognomy; 'As this one aphorism, Jesus Christ is the Son of God, is virtually and eminently the whole Gospel; so to confess or deny

* Vide Roubaud: 'Axiome, maxime, apophthegme aphorisme.'

It is virtually to embrace or reject the whole round and series of Gospel truths."—SOUTH.

Sayings and apophthegms differ from the preceding, in as much as they always carry the mind back to the person speaking; there is always one who says when there is a saying or an apophthegm, and both acquire a value as much from the person who utters them, as from the thing that is uttered: when Leonidas was asked why brave men prefer honour to life, his answer became an apophthegm; namely, that they hold life by fortune, and honour by virtue; 'It is remarkable that so near his time so much should be known of what Pope has written, and so little of what he has said. One apophthegm only stands upon record. When an objection raised against his inscription for Shakspeare was defended by the authority of Patrick, he replied, that he would allow the publisher of a dictionary to know the meaning of a single word, but not of two words together.'—JOHNSON. Of this description also are the apophthegms comprised by Plutarch; so likewise in modern times, the sayings of Franklin's Old Richard, or those of Dr. Johnson: these are happy effusions of the mind which men are fond of treasuring; 'The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds.'—TILLOTSON.

The adage and proverb are habitual, as well as general sayings, not repeated as the sayings of one, but of all; not adopted for the sake of the person, but for the sake of the thing; and they have been used in all ages for the purpose of conveying the sense of mankind on ordinary subjects. The adage of former times is the proverb of the present times; if there be any difference between them, it lies in this, that the former are the fruit of knowledge and long experience, the latter of vulgar observations; the adage is therefore more refined than the proverb. Adversity is our best teacher, according to the Greek adage, "What hurts us instructs us."—"Old birds are not to be caught with chaff," is a vulgar proverb; 'It is in praise and commendation of men, as it is in gettings and gains; the proverb is true that light gains make heavy purses: for light gains come thick, whereas great come now and then.'—BACON.

Quoth Hudibras, thou offer'st much,
But art not able to keep touch,
Mira de lente, as 'tis I, the adage,
Id est, to make a leek a cabbage.—BUTLER.

By-words rarely contain any important sentiment; they mostly consist of familiar similes, nick-names, and the like, as the Cambridge by-word of Hobson's choice, signifying that or none: the name of Nazarene was a by-word among the Jews, for a Christian; I knew a pretty young girl in a country village, who, beyond of her own praise, became a property to a poor rogue in the parish, who was ignorant of all things but fawning.—Thus Isaac extols her out of a quatern of cut and dry every day she lives, and though the young woman is really handsome, she and her beauty are become a by-word, and all the country round, she is called nothing but Isaac's best Virginia.—ARBUTHNOT. A saw is vulgar in form, and vulgar in matter: it is the partial saying of particular neighbourhoods, originating in ignorance and superstition: of this description are the sayings which attribute particular properties to animals or to plants, termed old women's saws; 'If we meet this dreadful and portentous energy with poor commonplace proceedings, with trivial maxims, paltry old saws, with doubts, fears, and suspicions; down we go to the bottom of the abyss, and nothing short of omnipotence can save us.'—BURKE.

MAXIM, PRECEPT, RULE, LAW.

Maxim (v. Axiom), is a moral truth that carries its own weight with itself; precept (v. Command), rule (v. Guide), and law, from lex and lego, signifying the thing specially chosen or marked out, all borrow their weight from some external circumstance: the precept derives its authority from the individual delivering it; in this manner the precepts of our Saviour have a weight which gives them a decided superiority over every thing else: the rule acquires a worth from its fitness for guiding us in our proceeding: the law, which is a species of rule, derives its weight from the sanction of power. Maxims are often precepts in as much as they are communicated to us by our parents: they are rules inasmuch as they serve as a rule for our conduct; they are laws inasmuch as they have the sanction of conscience. We respect the maxims of antiquity as containing the essence of human wisdom; 'I think I may lay it down as a maxim, that every man of good common sense may, if he please, most certainly be rich.'—BUDGELL. We reverence the precepts of religion as the foundation of all happiness; 'Philosophy has accumulated precept upon precept to warn us against the anticipation of future calamities.'—JOHNSON. We regard the rules of prudence as preserving us from errors and misfortunes; 'I know not whether any rule has yet been fixed by which it may be decided when poetry can properly be called easy.'—JOHNSON. We respect the laws as they are the basis of civil society;

God is thy law, thou mine.—MILTON.

LAWFUL, LEGAL, LEGITIMATE, LICIT

Lawful, from law, and the French loi, comes from the Latin lex, in the same manner as legal or legitimate, all signifying in the proper sense belonging to law. They differ therefore according to the sense of the word law; lawful respects the law in general, defined or undefined; legal respects only civil law, which is defined; and legitimate respects the laws or rules of science as well as civil matters in general. Licit, from the Latin licet to be allowed, is used only to characterize the moral quality of actions: the lawful property implies conformable to or enjoined by law; the legal what is in the form or after the manner of law, or binding by law; it is not lawful to coin money with the king's stamp; a marriage is not legal in England which is not solemnized according to the rites of the established church: men's passions impel them to do many things which are unlawful or illicit; their ignorance leads them into many things which are illegal or illegitimate. As a good citizen and a true Christian, every man will be anxious to avoid every thing which is unlawful: it is the business of the lawyer to define what is legal or illegal; it is the business of the critic to define what is legitimate verse in poetry; it is the business of the linguist to define the legitimate use of words; it is the business of the moralist to point out what is licit or illicit. As users have no lawful authority, no one is under any obligation to obey them; 'According to this spiritual doctor of politics, if his Majesty does not owe his crown to the choice of his people, he is no lawful king.'—BURKE. When a claim to property cannot be made out according to the established laws of the country it is not legal; 'Swift's mental powers declined till (1741) it was found necessary that legal guardians should be appointed to his person and fortune.'—JOHNSON. The cause of legitimate sovereigns is at length brought to a happy issue; it is to be hoped that men will never be so unwise as ever to revive the question; 'Upon the whole I have sent this my offspring into the world in as decent a dress as I was able; a legitimate one, I am sure it is.'—MOORE. The first inclination to an illicit indulgence should be carefully suppressed; 'The King of Prussia charged some of the officers, his prisoners, with maintaining an illicit correspondence.'—SMOLLETT.

JUDGE, UMPIRE, ARBITER, ARBITRATOR.

Judge, in Latin judico and judez, from jus right, signifies one pronouncing the law or determining right; umpire is most probably a corruption from empire, signifying one who has authority; arbitrer and arbitrator, from arbitror to think or determine, signifying one who decides.

Judge is the generic term, the others are specific terms. The judge determines in all matters disputed or undisputed; he pronounces what is law now as well as what will be law for the future; the umpire and arbitrer are only judges in particular cases that admit of dispute: there may be judges in literature, in arts, and civil matters;

Palemon shall be judge how ill you rhyme.

DRYDEN.

Umpires and arbiters are only judges in civil or pri vate matters. The judge pronounces, in matters of dispute, according to a written law or a prescribed rule; 'I am not out of the reach of people who oblige me to act as their judge or their arbitrator.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny). The umpire decides in all matters of contest; and the arbitrator or umpire in all matters of litigation, according to his own judgement. The judge acts under the appointment of government; the umpire and arbitrator are appointed by individuals: the former is chosen for his skill; he adjudges the palm to the victor according to the merits of the case: the latter is chosen for his impartiality; he consults the interests of both by equalizing their claims.

The office of an English judge is one of the most honourable in the state; he is the voice of the legislator, and the organ for dispensing justice; he holds the balance between the king and the subject: the characters of those who have filled this office have been every way fitted to raise it in the estimation of all the world. An umpire has no particular moral duty to discharge, nor important office; but he is of use in deciding the contested merits of individuals; among the Romans and Greeks, the umpire at their games was held in high estimation; but the term may be used in poetry in a higher sense;

To pray'r, repentance, and obedience due,
Mine ear shall not be slow, mine eye not shut,
And I will place within them as a guide,
My umpire conscience.—MILTON.

The office of an arbitrator, although not so elevated as that of a judge in its literal sense, has often the important duty of a Christian peace-maker; and as the determinations of an arbitrator are controlled by no external circumstances, the term is applied to monarchs, and even to the Creator as the sovereign Arbitrator of the world;

You once have known me
Twixt warring monarchs and contending states,
The glorious arbitrator.—LEWIS.

JUSTICE, EQUITY.

* Justice, from jus right, is founded on the laws of society: equity, from æquitas fairness, rightness, and equality, is founded on the laws of nature.

Justice is a written or prescribed law, to which one is bound to conform and make it the rule of one's decisions: equity is a law in our hearts; it conforms to no rule but to circumstances, and decides by the consciousness of right and wrong. The proper object of justice is to secure property; the proper object of equity is to secure the rights of humanity. Justice is exclusive, it assigns to every one his own: it preserves the subsisting inequality between men: equity is communicative; it seeks to equalize the condition of men by a fair distribution.

Justice forbids us doing wrong to any one; and requires us to repair the wrongs we have done to others: equity forbids us doing to others what we would not have them do to us; it requires us to do to others what in similar circumstances we would expect from them.

The obligations to justice are imperative: the observance of its laws is enforced by the civil power, and the breach of them is exposed to punishment: the obligations to equity are altogether moral; we are impelled to it by the dictates of conscience; we cannot violate it without exposing ourselves to the Divine displeasure. Justice is inflexible, it follows one invariable rule, which can seldom be deviated from consistently with the general good; equity, on the other hand, varies with the circumstances of the case, and is guided by discretion; justice may, therefore, sometimes run counter to equity, when the interests of the individual must be sacrificed to those of the community; and equity sometimes tempers the rigour of justice, by admitting of reasonable deviations from the literal interpretations of its laws; 'We see in contracts, and other dealings, which daily pass between man and man, that, to the utter undoing of some, many things by strictness of law may be done, which equity and honest meaning forbid. Not that the law is unjust, but imperfect, nor equity against but above law; binding men's consciences in things which law cannot reach unto.'—HOOKER. The tranquillity of society, and the security of the individual, are ensured by justice; the harmony and good will of one man towards another are cherished by equity: when justice requires any sacrifices which are not absolutely necessary for the preservation of this tranquillity and security, it is a useless breach of equity: on the other hand, when a regard to equity leads to the direct violation of any law, it ceases to be either equity or justice. The rights of property are alike to be preserved by both justice and equity: but the former respects only those general and fundamental principles which are universally admitted in the social compact, and comprehended under the laws; the latter respects those particular principles which belong to the case of individuals: justice is, therefore, properly a virtue belonging only to a large and organized society: equity must exist wherever two individuals come in connexion with each other. When a father disinherits his son, he does not violate justice, although he does not act consistently with equity; the disposal of his property is a right which is guaranteed to him by the established laws of civil society; but the claims which a child has by nature over the property of his parent become the claims of equity, which the latter is not at liberty to set at nought without the most substantial reasons. On the other hand, when Cyrus adjudged the coat to each boy as it fitted him, without regard to the will of the younger from whom the large coat had been taken, it is evident that he committed an act of injustice, without performing an act of equity; since all violence is positively unjust, and what is positively unjust, can never be equitable: whence it is clear that justice, which respects the absolute and unalienable rights of man kind, can at no time be superseded by what is supposed to be equity; although equity may be conveniently made to interpose where the laws of justice are either too severe or altogether silent. On this ground, supposing I have received an injury, justice demands reparation; it listens to no palliation, excuse, or exception: but supposing the reparation which I have a right to demand involves the ruin of him who is more unfortunate than guilty, can I in equity insist on the demand? Justice is that which public law requires equity is that which private law or the law of every man's conscience requires; 'They who supplicate for mercy from others, can never hope for justice through themselves.'—BURKE.

Ev'ry rule of equity demands
That vice and virtue from the Almighty's hands
Should due rewards and punishments receive.

JENYNS

INJUSTICE, INJURY, WRONG.

Injustice, signifying the abstract quality of unjust, injury, from injuria, or in privative, and jus right, signifying any act that is contrary to right; and wrong, signifying the thing that is wrong, are all opposed to right; but the injustice lies in the principle, the injury in the action that injures. There may, therefore, be injustice where there is no specific injury; and, on the other hand, there may be injury where there is no injustice. When we think worse of a person than we ought to think, we do him an act of injustice; but we do not, in the strict sense of the word, do him an injury: on the other hand, if we say any thing to the discredit of another, it will be an injury to his reputation if it be believed; but it may not be an injustice, if it be strictly conformable to truth, and that which one is compelled to say.

The violation of justice, or a breach of the rule of right, constitutes the injustice; but the quantum of ill which falls on the person constitutes the injury. Sometimes a person is dispossessed of his property by fraud or violence, this is an act of injustice; but it is not an injury, if, in consequence of this act, he obtains friends who make it good to him beyond what he has lost: on the other hand, a person suffers very much through the inadvertence of another, which to him is a serious injury, although the offender has not been guilty of injustice; 'A lie is properly a species of injustice, and a violation of the right of that person to whom the false speech is directed.'—SOUTH.

Law suits I'd shun with as much studious care,
As I would dens where hungry lions are:

* Vide Roubaud: 'Justice équité.'

And rather put up injuries than be
A plague to him who'd be a plague to me.

POMFRET.

A wrong partakes both of injustice and injury; it is in fact an injury done by one person to another, in express violation of justice. The man who seduces a woman from the path of virtue does her the greatest of all wrongs. One repeats of injustice, repairs injuries and redresses wrongs;

The humble man when he receives a wrong,
Refers revenge to whom it doth belong.—WALLER.

PRINCIPLE, MOTIVE.

The principle (v. Doctrine) may sometimes be the motive; but often there is a principle where there is no motive, and there is a motive where there is no principle. The principle lies in conscious and unconscious agents; the motive only in conscious agents: all nature is guided by certain principles; its movements go forward by certain principles: man is put into action by certain motives; the principle is the prime moving cause of every thing that is set in motion; the motive is the prime moving cause that sets the human machine into action. The principle in its restricted sense comes still nearer to the motive, when it refers to the opinions which we form: the principle in this case is that idea which we form of things, so as to regulate our conduct; 'The best legislators have been satisfied with the establishment of some sure, solid, and ruling principle in government.'—BURKE. The motive is that idea which simply impels to action; 'The danger of betraying our weakness to our servants, and the impossibility of concealing it from them, may be justly considered as one motive to a regular life.'—JOHNSON. The former is therefore something permanent, and grounded upon the exercise of our reasoning powers; the latter is momentary, and arises simply from our capacity of thinking: bad principles lead a man into a bad course of life; bad motives lead him to the commission of actions bad or good.

DIRECTION, ORDER.

Direction (v. To direct) contains most of instruction in it; order (v. To command) most of authority. Directions should be followed; orders obeyed. It is necessary to direct those who are unable to act for themselves: it is necessary to order those whose business it is to execute the orders. To servants and children the directions must be clear, simple, and precise;

Then meet me forthwith at the notary's,
Give him direction for this merry bond.

SHAKESPEARE.

To tradespeople the orders may be particular or general; 'To execute laws is a royal office: to execute orders is not to be a king.'—BURKE.

Directions extend to the moral conduct of others, as well as the ordinary concerns of life; 'A general direction for scholastic disputers is never to dispute upon mere trifles.'—WATTS. Orders are confined to the personal convenience of the individual;

Give order to my servants, that they take
No note of our being absent.—SHAKESPEARE.

A parent directs a child as to his behaviour in company, or as to his conduct when he enters life; a teacher directs his pupil in the choice of books, or in the distribution of his studies: the master gives orders to his attendants to be in waiting for him at a certain hour; or he gives orders to his tradesmen to provide what is necessary

DIRECTION, ADDRESS, SUPERScription.

Direction marks that which directs; address is that which addresses: superscription, from super and scribo, signifies that which is written over something else.

Although these terms may be used promiscuously for each other, yet they have a peculiarity of signification by which their proper use is defined: the direction may serve to direct to places as well as to persons: the address is never used but in direct application to the person: the superscription has more respect to the thing than the person. The direction may be written or verbal; the address in this sense is always written; the superscription must not only be written, but either on or over some other thing: a direction is given to such as go in search of persons and places, it ought to be clear and particular; 'There could not be a greater chance than that which brought to light the powder treason, when Providence, as it were, snatched a king and a kingdom out of the very jaws of death only by the mistake of a word in the direction of a letter.'—SOUTH. An address is put either on a card, and a letter, or in a book; it ought to be suitable to the station and situation of the person addressed; 'We think you may be able to point out to him the evil of succeeding; if it be solicitation, you will tell him where to address it.'—LORD CHESTERFIELD. A superscription is placed at the head of other writings, or over tombs and pillars, it ought to be appropriate; 'Deceit and hypocrisy carry in them more of the express image and superscription of the devil than any bodily sins whatsoever.'—SOUTH

INSIGHT, INSPECTION.

The insight is what we receive; the inspection is what we give: one gets a view into a thing by the insight; one takes a view over a thing by an inspection. The insight serves to increase our own knowledge; the inspection enables us to instruct others. An inquisitive traveller tries to get an insight into the manners, customs, laws, and government of the countries which he visits; 'Angels both good and bad have a full insight into the activity and force of natural causes.'—SOUTH. By inspection a master discovers the errors which are committed by his scholars, and sets them right; 'Something no doubt is designed; but what that is, I will not presume to determine from an inspection of men's hearts.'—SOUTH.

INSPECTION, SUPERINTENDENCY, OVERSIGHT.

The office of looking into the conduct of others is expressed by all these terms; but the former comprehends little more than the preservation of good order, the two latter include the arrangement of the whole.

The monitor of a school has the inspection of the conduct of his schoolfellows, but the master has the superintendence of the school. The officers of an army inspect the men, to see that they observe all the rules that have been laid down to them; 'This author proposes that there should be examiners appointed to inspect the genius of every particular boy.'—BUDGELL. A general or superior officer has the superintendence of any military operation; 'When female minds are embittered by age or solitude, their malignity is generally exerted by a spiteful superintendence of trifles.'—JOHNSON. Fidelity is peculiarly wanted in an inspector, judgement and experience in a superintendent. Inspection is said of things as well as persons; oversight only of persons: one has the inspection of books in order to ascertain their accuracy: one has the oversight of persons to prevent irregularity: there are inspectors of the customs, and overseers of the poor.

TO INSTITUTE, ESTABLISH, FOUND, ERECT.

Institute, in Latin institutus, participle of instituere, from in and statuo to place or appoint, signifies to dispose or fix a specific end; establish (v. To fix); found (v. To found); erect (v. To build).

To institute is to form according to a certain plan: to establish is to fix in a certain position what has been formed; to found is to lay the foundation; to erect is to make erect. Laws, communities, and particular orders, are instituted: schools, colleges, and various societies, are established; in the former case something new is supposed to be framed; in the latter case it is supposed only to have a certain situation assigned to it. The order of the Jesuits was instituted by Ignatius de Loyola: schools were established by Alfred the Great in various parts of his dominions. The act of instituting comprehends design and method; that of establishing includes the idea of authority. The inquisition was instituted in the time of Ferdinand; the Church of England is established by authority. To institute is always the immediate act of some agent; to establish is sometimes the effect of circumstances. Men of pub lick spirit institute that which is for the publick good; a communication or trade between certain places becomes established in course of time. An institution is properly of a publick nature, but establishments are as often private: there are charitable and literary institutions, but domestic establishments; 'The leap years were fixed to their due times according to Julius Caesar's institution.'—PRIDEAUX. 'The French have outdone us in these particulars by the establishment of a society for the invention of proper inscriptions (for their medals).'—ADDISON. To found is a species of instituting which borrows its figurative meaning from the nature of buildings, and is applicable to that which is formed after the manner of a building: a publick school is founded when its pecuniary resources are formed into a fund or foundation; 'After the flood which depopulated Attica, it is generally supposed no king reigned over it till the time of Cecrops, the founder of Athens.'—CUMBERLAND. To erect is a species of founding, for it expresses in fact a leading particular in the act of founding; 'Princes as well as private persons have erected colleges, and assigned liberal endowments to students and professors.'—BERKELEY. Nothing can be founded without being erected; although some things may be erected without being expressly founded in the natural sense; a house is both founded and erected: a monument is erected but not founded: so in the figurative sense, a college is founded and consequently erected: but a tribunal is erected, but not founded.

TO CONSTITUTE, APPOINT, DEPUTE.

To constitute, in Latin constitutus, participle of constituo, that is con and statuo to place together, signifies here to put or place for a specific purpose, in which sense it is allied to appoint as explained under the head of allot, and also depute, which from the French deputer, Latin deputo, compounded of de and puto to esteem or assign, signifies to assign a certain office to a person.

The act of choosing some person or persons for an office, is comprehended under all these terms: to constitute is a more solemn act than appoint, and this than depute. To constitute is the act of a body; to appoint and depute, either of a body or an individual: a community constitutes any one their leader; a monarch appoints his ministers, an assembly deputes some of its members.

To constitute implies the act of making as well as choosing; the office as well as the person is new: in appointing, the person but not the office is new. A person may be constituted arbiter or judge as circumstances may require; a successor is appointed but not constituted.

Whoever is constituted is invested with supreme authority derived from the highest sources of human power; 'Where there is no constituted judge, as between independent states there is not, the vicinage itself is the natural judge.'—BURKE. Whoever is appointed derives his authority from the authority of others, and has consequently but limited power: no individual can appoint another with authority equal to his own; 'The accusations against Columbus gained such credit in a jealous court, that a commissioner was appointed to repair to Hispaniola, and to inspect into his conduct.'—ROBERTSON. Whoever is deputed has private and not publick authority; his office is partial, often confined to the particular transaction of an individual, or a body of individuals; 'If the Commons disagree to the amendments, a conference usually follows between members deputed from each house.'—BLACKSTONE. According to the Romish religion, the Pope is constituted supreme head of the Christian church throughout the whole world; governors are appointed to distant provinces, persons are deputed to present petitions or make representations to government.

It has been the fashion of the present day to speak contemptuously of all constituted authorities: the appointments made by government are a fruitful source of discontent for those who follow the trade of opposition: a busy multitude, when agitated by political discussions, are ever ready to form societies and send deputations, in order to communicate their wishes to their rulers.

AMBASSADOR, ENVOY, PLENIPOTENTIARY DEPUTY.

Ambassador is supposed to come from the low Latin ambasciator a waiter, although this does not accord with the high station which ambassadors have always held; envoy, from the French envoyer to send, signifies one sent; plenipotentiary, from the Latin plenus and potens, signifies one invested with full powers; deputy, signifies one deputed.

Ambassadors, envoys, and plenipotentiaries, speak and act in the name of their sovereigns, with this difference, that the first are invested with the highest authority, acting in all cases as their representatives; the second appear only as simple authorized ministers acting for another, but not always representing him; the third are a species of envoy used by courts only on the occasion of concluding peace or making treaties. Deputies are not deputed by sovereigns, although they may be deputed to sovereigns; they have no power to act or speak, but in the name of some subordinate community, or particular body. The functions of the first three belong to the minister, those of the latter to the agent.

An ambassador is a resident in a country during a state of peace; he must maintain the dignity of his court by a suitable degree of splendour; 'Prior continued to act without a title till the Duke of Shrewsbury returned next year to England, and then he assumed the style and dignity of an ambassador.'—JOHNSON. An envoy may be a resident, but he is more commonly employed on particular occasions; address in negotiating forms an essential in his character; 'We hear from Rome, by letters dated the 20th of April, that the count de Mellos, envoy from the king of Portugal, had made his publick entry into that city with much state and magnificence.'—STEELE. A plenipotentiary is not so much connected with the court immediately, as with persons in the same capacity with himself; he requires to have integrity, coolness, penetration, loyalty, and patriotism; 'The conferences began at Utrecht on the 1st of January, 1711-12, and the English plenipotentiaries arrived on the fifteenth.'—JOHNSON. A deputy has little or no responsibility; and still less intercourse with those to whom he is deputed; he needs no more talent than is sufficient to maintain the respectability of his own character, and that of the body to which he belongs; 'They add that the deputies of the Swiss cantons were returned from Soleure, where they were assembled at the instance of the French ambassador.'—STEELE.

DELEGATE, DEPUTY.

Delegate, in Latin delegatus, from delego, signifies one commissioned; deputy, in Latin deputatus, from deputo, signifies one to whom a business is assigned.

A delegate has a more active office than a deputy; he is appointed to execute some positive commission, and officiates in the place of another;

Elect by Jove, his delegate of sway,

With joyous pride the summons I'd obey.—POPE.

A deputy may often serve only to supply the place or answer in the name of one who is absent; 'Every member (of parliament), though chosen by one particular district, when elected and returned serves for the whole realm; and therefore he is not bound, like a deputy in the United Provinces, to consult with his constituents on any particular point.'—BLACKSTONE. Delegates are mostly appointed in publick transactions; deputies are chosen either in publick or private matters: delegates are chosen by particular bodies for purposes of negotiation either in regard to civil or political affairs; deputies are chosen either by individuals or small communities to officiate on certain occasions of a purely civil nature: the Hans towns in Germany used formerly to send delegates to the Diet at Ratisbon;

Let chosen delegates this hour be sent,

Myself will name them, to Pelides' tent.—POPE.

When Calais was going to surrender to Edward III. King of England, deputies were sent from the townsmen to implore his mercy: 'The assembling of persons deputed from people at great distances is a trouble to them that are sent and a charge to them that send.'—TEMPLE. Delegate is sometimes also used figuratively in the same sense;

But this
And all the much transported muse can sing,
Are to thy beauty, dignity, and use,
Unequal far, great delegated journey
Of light, and life, and grace, and joy below.

THOMSON.

Deputy is also extended in its application to other objects; 'He exerciseth dominion over them as the viceroy and deputy of Almighty God.'—HALE.

TO NEGOTIATE, TREAT FOR OR ABOUT, TRANSACT.

The idea of conducting business with others is included in the signification of all these terms; but they differ in the mode of conducting it, and the nature of the business to be conducted. Negotiate, in the Latin negotiatum, participle of negotior, from negotium, is applied in the original mostly to merchandise or traffick, but it is now more commonly employed in the complicated concerns of governments and nations. Treat, from the Latin tracto, frequentative of traho to draw, signifies to turn over and over or set forth in all ways: these two verbs, therefore, suppose deliberation; but transact, from transactus, participle of transago, to carry forward or bring to an end, supposes more direct agency than consultation or deliberation: this latter is therefore adapted to the more ordinary and less entangled concerns of commerce. Negotiations are conducted by many parties, and involve questions of peace or war, dominions, territories, rights of nations, and the like; 'I do not love to mingle speech with any about news or worldly negotiations in God's holy house.'—HOWEL. Treaties are often a part of negotiations: they are seldom conducted by more than two parties, and involve only partial questions, as in treaties about peace, about commerce, about the boundaries of any particular state, or between families about domestic concerns; 'You have a great work in hand, for you write to me that you are upon a treaty of marriage.'—HOWEL. A congress carries on negotiations for the establishment of good order among the ruling powers of Europe; individual states treat with each other, to settle their particular differences. To negotiate mostly respects political concerns, except in the case of negotiating bills: to treat, as well as transact, is said of domestic and private concerns: we treat with a person about the purchase of a house; we transact business with a person either by paying or receiving money, or in any matter of mutual interest; 'We are permitted to know nothing of what is transacting in the regions above us.'—BLAIR.

As nouns, negotiation expresses rather the act of deliberating than the thing deliberated: treaty includes the ideas of the terms proposed, and the arrangement of those terms: transaction expresses the idea of something actually done and finished, and in that sense may often be the result of a negotiation or treaty; 'It is not the purpose of this discourse to set down the particular transactions of this treaty.'—CLARENDON. Negotiations are sometimes very long pending before the preliminary terms are even proposed, or any basis is defined; treaties of commerce are entered into by all civilized countries, in order to obviate misunderstandings, and enable them to preserve an amicable intercourse; the transactions which daily pass in a great metropolis, like that of London, are of so multifarious a nature, and so infinitely numerous, that the bare contemplation of them fills the mind with astonishment. Negotiations are long or short; treaties are advantageous or the contrary; transactions are honourable or dishonourable.

MISSION, MESSAGE, ERRAND.

Message, from the Latin missus, participle of mitto to send, signifies the thing for which one is sent; mission, signifies the state of being sent, or thing for which one is sent; errand, from erro to wander, or go to a distance, signifies the thing for which one goes to a distance.

Between mission and message the difference consists as much in the application as the sense. The mission is always a subject of importance, and the situation one of trust and authority, whence it is with propriety applied to our Saviour;

Her son tracing the desert wild,
All his great work to come before him set,
How to begin, how to accomplish best,
His end of being on earth, and mission high

MILTON.

The subject of a message is of inferior importance, and is commonly intrusted to inferior persons.

The message is properly any communication which is conveyed; the errand sent from one person to another is that which causes one to go: servants are the bearers of messages, and are sent on various errands. The message may be either verbal or written; the errand is limited to no form, and to no circumstance: one delivers the message, and goes the errand. Sometimes the message may be the errand, and the errand may include the message: when that which is sent consists of a notice or intimation to another, it is a message; and if that causes any one to go to a place, it is an errand: thus it is that the greater part of errands consist of sending messages from one person to another. Both the terms message and errand are employed by the poets in reference to higher objects, but they preserve the same distinction;

The scenes where ancient bards th' inspiring breath
Ecstatic felt, and, from this world retir'd,
Convers'd with angels and immortal forms,
On gracious errands bent.—THOMSON.

Sometimes, from her eyes,
I did receive fair speechless messages.

SHAKESPEARE

MINISTER, AGENT.

Minister comes from minus less, as magister comes from magis more; the one being less, and the other greater, than others: the minister, therefore, is literally one that acts in a subordinate capacity; and the agent, from ago to act, is the one that takes the acting part: they both perform the will of another, but the minister performs a higher part than the agent: the minister gives his counsel, and exerts his intellectual powers in the service of another; but the agent executes the orders or commission given him: a minister is employed by government in political affairs; an agent is employed by individuals in commercial and pecuniary affairs, or by government in subordinate matters: a minister is received at court, and serves as a representative for his government; an agent generally acts under the directions of the minister or some officer of government: ambassadors or plenipotentiaries, or the first officers of the state, are ministers; but those who regulate the affairs respecting prisoners, the police, and the like, are termed agents.

FORERUNNER, PRECURSOR, MESSENGER, HARBINGER.

Forerunner and precursor signify literally the same thing, namely, one running before; but the term forerunner is properly applied only to one who runs before to any spot to communicate intelligence; and it is figuratively applied to things which in their nature, or from a natural connexion, precede others; precursor is only employed in this figurative sense: thus imprudent speculations are said to be the forerunners of a man's ruin; 'Loss of sight is the misery of life, and usually the forerunner of death.'—SOUTH. The ferment which took place in men's minds was the precursor of the French revolution; 'Goseller was a name of contempt given by the papists to the Lollards, the puritans of early times, and the precursors of protestantism.'—JOHNSON.

Messenger signifies literally one bearing messages: and harbinger, from the Teutonic herbingen, signifies a provider of a herberge or inn for princes.

Both terms are employed for persons: but the messenger states what has been or is; the harbinger announces what is to be. Our Saviour was the messenger of glad tidings to all mankind; the prophets were the harbingers of the Messiah. A messenger may be employed on different offices; a harbinger is a messenger who acts in a specific office. The angels are represented as messengers on different occasions;

His words are bonds, his oaths are oracles,
His tears pure messengers sent from his heart

SHAKESPEARE.

John the Baptist was the harbinger of our Saviour, who prepared the way of the Lord;

Sin, and her shadow death; and misery,
Death's harbinger.—MILTON.

TO INTERCEDE, INTERPOSE, MEDIATE, INTERFERE, INTERMEDDLE.

Intercede signifies literally going between; interpose, placing one's self between; mediate, coming in the middle; interfere, setting one's self between; and intermeddle, meddling or mixing among.

One intercedes between parties that are unequal; one interposes between parties that are equal: one intercedes in favour of that party which is threatened with punishment; one interposes between parties that threaten each other with evil: we intercede with the parent in favour of the child who has offended, in order to obtain pardon for him; one interposes between two friends who are disputing, to prevent them from going to extremities. One intercedes by means of persuasion; it is an act of courtesy or kindness in the interceded party to comply: one interposes by an exercise of authority; it is a matter of propriety or necessity in the parties to conform. The favourite of a monarch intercedes in behalf of some criminal, that his punishment may be mitigated; 'Virgil recovered his estate by Mæcenas's intercession.'—DRYDEN. The magistrates interpose with their authority, to prevent the broils of the disorderly from coming to serious acts of violence;

Those few you see escap'd the storm, and fear,
Unless you interpose, a shipwreck here.—DRYDEN.

To mediate and intercede are both conciliatory acts; the intercessor and mediator are equals or even inferior; to interpose is an act of authority, and belongs most commonly to a superior: one intercedes or interposes for the removal of evil; one mediates for the attainment of good: Christ is our Intercessor, to avert from us the consequences of our guilt; he is our Mediator, to obtain for us the blessings of grace and salvation. An intercessor only pleads: a mediator guarantees; he takes upon himself a responsibility. Christ is our Intercessor, by virtue of his relationship with the Father; he is our Mediator, by virtue of his atonement; by which act he takes upon himself the sins of all who are truly penitent.

To intercede and interpose are employed on the highest and lowest occasions; to mediate is never employed but in matters of the greatest moment. As earthly offenders we require the intercession of a fellow mortal; as offenders against the God of Heaven, we require the intercession of a Divine Being: without the timely interposition of a superior, trifling disputes may grow into bloody quarrels; without the interposition of Divine Providence, we cannot conceive of anything important as taking place; to settle the affairs of nations, mediators may afford a salutary assistance; 'It is generally better (in negotiating) to deal by speech than by letter, and by the mediation of a third than by a man's self.'—BACON. To bring about the redemption of a lost world, the Son of God condescended to be Mediator.

All these acts are performed for the good of others: but interfere and intermeddle are of a different description: one may interfere for the good of others, or to gratify one's self; one never intermeddles but for selfish purposes: the first three terms are, therefore, always used in a good sense; the fourth in a good or bad sense, according to circumstances; the last always in a bad sense.

To interfere has nothing conciliating in it like intercede, nothing authoritative in it like interpose, nothing responsible in it like mediate; it may be useful, or it may be injurious; it may be authorized or unauthorized; it may be necessary, or altogether impertinent: when we interfere so as to make peace between men, it is useful; but when we interfere unreasonably, it often occasions differences rather than removes them; 'Religion interferes not with any rational pleasure.'—SOUTH.

Intercede, and the other terms, are used in cases where two or more parties are concerned; but interfere and intermeddle are said of what concerns only one individual; one interferes and intermeddles rather in the concern, than between the persons; and, on that account, it becomes a question of some importance to decide when we ought to interfere in the affairs of another: with regard to intermeddle, it always is the unauthorized act of one who is busy in things that ought not to concern him; 'The sight intermeddles not with that which affects the smell.'—SOUTH.

INTERMEDIATE, INTERVENING.

Intermediate signifies being in the midst, between two objects; intervening signifies coming between; the former is applicable to space and time; the latter either to time or circumstances.

The intermediate time between the commencement and the termination of a truce is occupied with preparations for the renewal of hostilities; 'A right opinion is that which connects truth by the shortest train of intermediate propositions.'—JOHNSON. Intervening circumstances sometimes change the views of the belligerent parties, and dispose their minds to peace; 'Hardly would any transient gleams of intervening joy be able to force its way through the clouds, if the successive scenes of distress through which we are to pass were laid before our view.'—BLAIR

INTERVENTION, INTERPOSITION.

The intervention, from inter between, and venio to come, is said of inanimate objects; the interposition, from inter between, and pono to place, is said only of rational agents. The light of the moon is obstructed by the intervention of the clouds; the life of an individual is preserved by the interposition of a superior: human life is so full of contingencies, that when we have formed our projects we can never say what may intervene to prevent their execution; 'Reflect also on the calamitous intervention of picture-cleaners (to originals).'-BARRY. When a man is engaged in an unequal combat, he has no chance of escaping but by the timely interposition of one who is able to rescue him;

Death ready stands to interpose his dart.—MILTON

TO BIND, OBLIGE, ENGAGE

Bind, through the medium of the northern languages, comes from the Latin vincio, and the Greek σφίγω; to oblige, in French obliger, Latin obligo, compounded of ob and ligo, signifies to tie up; engage, in French engager, compounded of en or in and gager a pledge, signifies to bind by means of a pledge.

Bind is more forcible and coercive than oblige; oblige than engage. We are bound by an oath, obliged by circumstances, and engaged by promises.

Conscience binds, prudence or necessity *oblige*s, honour and principle engage. A parent is bound no less by the law of his conscience, than by those of the community to which he belongs, to provide for his helpless offspring. Politeness *oblige*s men of the world to preserve a friendly exterior towards those for whom they have no regard. When we are engaged in the service of our king and country, we cannot shrink from our duty without exposing ourselves to the infamy of all the world.

We bind a man by fear of what may befall him; we oblige him by some immediately urgent motive; we engage him by alluring offers, and the prospect of gain. A debtor is bound to pay by virtue of a written instrument in law;

Who can be bound by any solemn vow,
To do a murder's deed?—SHAKESPEARE.

He is obliged to pay in consequence of the important demands of the creditor; 'No man is commanded or obliged to obey beyond his power.'—SOUTH. He is engaged to pay in consequence of a promise given; 'While the Israelites were appearing in God's house, God himself engages to keep and defend theirs.'—SOUTH. A bond is the strictest deed in law; an obligation binds under pain of a pecuniary loss; an engagement is mostly verbal, and rests entirely on the rectitude of the parties.

TO BIND, TIE.

Bind, in Saxon binden, German, &c. binden, comes from the Latin vincio, Greek σφίγω, and is vincio with the word wind: tie, in Saxon tian, is very probably connected with the low German tehen, high German ziehen to draw, the English tug or tow, and the Latin duco to draw.

The species of fastening denoted by these two words differ both in manner and degree. Binding is performed by circumvolution round a body; tying, by involution within itself. Some bodies are bound without being tied; others are tied without being bound: a wounded leg is bound but not tied;

Now are our brows bound with victorious wreaths,
Our stern alarms are chang'd to merry meetings.

SHAKESPEARE.

A string is tied but not bound;

A fluttering dove upon the top they tie,
The living mark at which their arrows fly

DRYDEN.

A riband may sometimes be bound round the head, and tied under the chin. Binding therefore serves to keep several things in a compact form together; tying may serve to prevent one single body separating from another: a criminal is bound hand and foot; he is tied to a stake.

Binding and tying likewise differ in degree; binding serves to produce adhesion in all the parts of a body; tying only to produce contact in a single part; thus when the hair is bound, it is almost enclosed in an envelope: when it is tied with a string, the ends are left to hang loose.

A similar distinction is preserved in the figurative use of the terms. A bond of union is applicable to a large body with many component parts; a tie of affection marks an adhesion between individual minds;

As nature's ties decay;

As duty, love, and honour fail to sway;
Fictitious bonds, the bonds of wealth and law,
Still gather strength, and force unwilling awe.

GOLDSMITH.

CHAIN, FETTER, BAND, SHACKLE.

Chain, in French chaîne, Latin catena, probably contracted from captena, comes from capio, signifying that which takes or holds; fetter, in German fessel, comes from fassen to lay hold of; band, from bind, signifies that which binds; shackle, in Saxon scacul, from shake, signifies that which makes a creature shake or move irregularly by confining the legs.

All these terms designate the instrument by which animals or men are confined. Chain is general and indefinite; all the rest are species of chains: but there are many chains which do not come under the other names; a chain is indefinite as to its make; it is made generally of iron rings, but of different sizes and shapes: fettters are larger, they consist of many stout chains: bands are in general any thing which confines the body or the limbs; they may be either chains or even cords: shackle is that species of chain which goes on the legs to confine them; malefactors of the worst order have fettters on different parts of their bodies, and shackles on their legs.

These terms may all be used figuratively. The substantive chain is applied to whatever hangs together like a chain, as a chain of events; but the verb to chain signifies to confine as with a chain: thus the mind is chained to rules, according to the opinions of the free thinkers, when men adhere strictly to rule and order; and to represent the slavery of conforming to the establishment, they tell us we are fettered by systems;

Almighty wisdom never acts in vain,
Nor shall the soul, on which it has bestow'd
Such powers, e'er perish like an earthly clod;
But purg'd at length from foul corruption's stain,
Freed from her prison, and unbound her chain,
She shall her native strength and native skies regain.

JENYNS.

'Legislators have no rule to bind them but the great principles of justice and equity. These they are bound to obey and follow; and rather to enlarge and enlighten law by the liberality of legislative reason than to fetter their higher capacity by the narrow constructions of subordinate artificial justice.'—BURKE.
Band in the figurative sense is applied, particularly in poetry, to every thing which is supposed to serve the purpose of a band; thus love is said to have its silken bands;

Break his bands of sleep asunder,
And rouse him like a rattling peal of thunder

DRYDEN.

Shackle, whether as a substantive or a verb, retains the idea of controlling the movements of the person, not in his body only, but also in his mind and in his moral conduct; thus, a man who commences life with a borrowed capital is shackled in his commercial concerns by the interest he has to pay, and the obligations he has to discharge; 'It is the freedom of the spirit that gives worth and life to the performance. But a servant commonly is less free in mind than in condition; his very will seems to be in bonds and shackles.'—SOUTH.

DEBT, DUE.

Debt and due are both derived from the same verb. Debt comes from debitus, participle of the Latin verb debeo; and due, in French du, participle of devoir comes likewise from debeo to owe.

Debt is used always as a substantive; due, either as a substantive or an adjective. A person contracts debts, and receives his due. The debt is both obligatory and compulsory; it is a return for something equivalent in value, and cannot be dispensed with; what is due is obligatory, but not always compulsory. A debtor may be compelled to discharge his debts; but it is not always in the power of a man even to claim that which is his due. Debt is generally used in a mercantile sense; due either in a mercantile or moral sense. A debt is determined by law: what is due is fixed often by principles of equity and honour. He who receives the stipulated price of his goods receives his debt; he who receives praise and honour, as a reward of good actions, receives his due;

The ghosts rejected are th' unhappy crew,
Depriv'd of sepulchres and funeral due.

DRYDEN.

Debt may sometimes be used figuratively, as, to pay the debt of nature; 'Though Christ was as pure and undefiled, without the least spot of sin, as purity and innocence itself; yet he was pleased to make himself the greatest sinner in the world by imputation, and render himself a surety responsible for our debts'—SOUTH.

PROMISE, ENGAGEMENT, WORD.

Promise, in Latin promissus, from promitto, compounded of pro before, and mitto to set or fix, that is, to fix beforehand; engagement is that which engages a person, or places him under an engagement; word, that is, the word given.

The promise is specifick, and consequently more binding than the engagement: we promise a thing in a set form of words, that are clearly and strictly understood; we engage in general terms, that may admit of alteration: a promise is mostly unconditional; an engagement is frequently conditional. In promises the faith of an individual is admitted upon his word, and built upon as if it were a deed; in engagements the intentions of an individual for the future are all that are either implied or understood: on the fulfilment of promises often depend the most important interests of individuals; 'An acre of performance is worth the whole world of promise.'—HOWEL. An attention to engagements is a matter of mutual convenience in the ordinary concerns of life; 'The engagements I had to Dr. Swift were such as the actual services he had done me, in relation to the subscription for Homer, obliged me to.'—POPE. A man makes a promise of payment, and upon his promise it may happen that many others depend upon the fulfilment of their promises; when engagements are made to visit or meet others, an inattention to such engagements causes great trouble. As a promise and engagement can be made only by words, the word is often put for either, or for both, as the case requires: he who breaks his word in small matters cannot be trusted when he gives his word in matters of consequence:

Æneas was our prince, a juster lord,
Or nobler warrior, never drew a sword;
Observant of the right, religious of his word.

DRYDEN.

TO IMPLICATE, INVOLVE.

Implicate, from plico to fold, denotes to fold into a thing; and involve, from volvo to roll, signifies to roll into a thing: by which explanation we perceive, that to implicate marks something less entangled than to involve: for that which is folded may be folded only once, but that which is rolled, is rolled many times. In application therefore to human affairs, people are said to be implicated who have taken ever so small a share in a transaction; but they are involved only when they are deeply concerned: the former is likewise especially applied to criminal transactions, the latter to those things which are in themselves troublesome: thus a man is implicated in the guilt of robbery, who should stand by and see it done, without interfering for its prevention; as law-suits are of all things the most intricate and harassing, he who is engaged in one is said to be involved in it, or he who is in debt in every direction is strictly said to be involved in debt; 'Those who cultivate the memory of our Revolution, will take care how they are involved with persons who, under pretext of zeal towards the Revolution and constitution, frequently wander from their true principles.'—BURKE. When implication is derived from the verb imply, signifying the act of implying, it departs altogether from the meaning of involve; 'That which can exalt a wife only by degrading a husband, will appear on the whole not worth the acquisition, even though it could be made without provoking jealousy by the implication of contempt.'—HAWKESWORTH.

TO DISENGAGE, DISENTANGLE, EXTRICATE.

To diseengage is to make free from an engagement; diseengage to get rid of an entanglement; extricate, in Latin extricatus, from ex and trica a hair, or noose, signifies to get as it were out of a noose. As to engage signifies simply to bind, and entangle signifies to bind in an involved manner; to diseengage is naturally applied to matters of greater difficulty and perplexity than to diseengage; and as the term extricate includes the idea of that which would hold fast and keep within a tight involvement, it is employed with respect to matters of the greatest possible embarrassment and intricacy. We may be diseengaged from an oath; diseengaged from pecuniary difficulties; extricated from a suit at law: it is not right to expect to be diseengaged from all the duties which attach to men as members of society; 'In old age the voice of nature calls you to leave to others the bustle and contest of the world, and gradually to diseengage yourself from a burden which begins to exceed your strength.'—BLAIR. He who enters into disputes about contested property must not expect to be soon diseengaged from the law; 'Savage seldom appeared to be melancholy but when some sudden misfortune had fallen upon him, and even then in a few moments he would diseengage himself from his perplexity.'—JOHNSON. When a general has committed himself by coming into too close a contact with a very superior force, he may think himself fortunate if he can extricate himself from his awkward situation with the loss of half his army; 'Nature felt its inability to extricate itself from the consequences of guilt; the Gospel reveals the plan of Divine interposition and aid.'—BLAIR.

TO UNFOLD, UNRAVEL, DEVELOPE.

To unfold is to open that which has been folded; to unravel is to open that which has been unravelled or tangled; to develope is to open that which has been wrapped in an envelope. The application of these terms therefore to moral objects is obvious: what has been folded and kept secret is unfolded; in this manner a hidden transaction is unfolded, by being related circumstantially;

And to the sage-instructing eye unfold
The various (wine of light).—THOMSON.

What has been entangled in any mystery or confusion is unravelled: in this manner a mysterious transaction is unravelled, if every circumstance is fully accounted for; 'You must be sure to unravel all your designs to a jealous man.'—ADDISON. What has been wrapped up so as to be entirely shut out from view is developed; in this manner the plot of a play or novel, or the character and talent of a person, are developed; 'The character of Tiberius is extremely difficult to develope' CUMBERLAND.

COMPLEXITY, COMPLICATION, INTRICACY.

Complexity and complication, in French complexion, Latin complicatio and complico, compounded of com and plico, signifies a folding one within another; intricacy, in Latin intricatio and intrico, compounded of in and trico or trices, the small hairs which are used to ensnare birds, signifies a state of entanglement by means of many involutions.

Complexity expresses the abstract quality or state; complication the act: they both convey less than intricacy; intricate is that which is very complicated.

Complexity arises from a multitude of objects, and the nature of these objects; complication from an involvement of objects; and intricacy from a winding and confused involution. What is complex must be decomposed; what is complicated must be developed; what is intricate must be unravelled. A proposition is complex; affairs are complicated; the law is intricate.

Complexity puzzles; complication confounds; intricacy bewilders. A clear head is requisite for understanding the complex; keenness and penetration are required to lay open that which is complicated; a comprehensive mind, coupled with coolness and perseverance of research, are essential to disentangle the intricate. A complex system may have every perfection but the one that is requisite, namely, a fitness to be reduced to practice. Complicated schemes of villany commonly frustrate themselves. They require unity of design among too many individuals of different stations, interests, and vices, to allow of frequent success with such heterogeneous combinations. The intricacy of the law is but the natural attendant on human affairs: every question admits of different illustrations as to their causes, consequences, analogies, and bearings; it is likewise dependent on so many cases infinitely ramified as to impede the exercise of the judgment in the act of deciding.

The complexity of the subject often deters young persons from application to their business;

Through the disclosing deep
Light my blind way; the mineral strata there
Thrust blooming, thence the vegetable world;
O'er that the rising system more complex
Of animals, and higher still the mind.

THOMSON.

There is nothing embarrasses a physician more than a complication of disorders, where the remedy for one impedes the cure for the other; 'Every living creature, considered in itself, has many very complicated parts that are exact copies of some other parts which it possesses, and which are complicated in the same manner.'—ADDISON. Some affairs are involved in such a degree of intricacy, as to exhaust the patience and perseverance of the most laborious; 'When the mind, by insensible degrees, has brought itself to attention and close thinking, it will be able to cope with difficulties. Every abstruse problem, every intricate question, will not baffle or break it.'—LOCKE.

COMPOUND, COMPLEX.

Compound comes from the present of compono, as compose (v. To compose) comes from compositi the pretérito of the same verb; complex (v. Complexity).

The compound consist of similar and whole bodies put together; the complex consists of various parts linked together: adhesion is sufficient to constitute a compound; involution is requisite for the complex. We distinguish the wholes that form the compound; we separate the parts that form the complex. What is compound may consist only of two; what is complex consists always of several.

Compound and complex are both commonly opposed to the simple; but the former may be opposed to the single, and the latter to the simple. Words are compound, sentences are complex; 'Inasmuch as man is a compound and a mixture of flesh as well as spirit, the soul during its abode in the body does all things by the mediation of these passions, and inferior affections.'—SOUTH.

With such perfection fram'd,
Is this complex stupendous scheme of things.

THOMSON.

TO COMPOUND, COMPOSE.

Compound (v. Compound) is used in the physical sense only; compose in the proper or the moral sense. Words are composed by making two or more into one; sentences are composed by putting words together so as to make sense. A medicine is composed of many ingredients; society is composed of various classes; 'The simple beauties of nature, if they cannot be multiplied, may be composed.'—BATHURST. 'The heathens, ignorant of the true source of moral evil, generally charged it on the obliquity of matter. This notion, as most others of theirs, is a composition of truth and error.'—GROVE.

TO COMPEL, FORCE, OBLIGE, NECESSITATE.

Compel, Latin compello or pello to drive, signifies to drive for a specific purpose or to a point; force, in French force, comes from the Latin fortis strong; force being nothing but the exertion of strength; oblige, in French obliger, Latin obligo, compounded of ob and ligo, signifies to bind down. These three terms mark an external action on the will, but compel expresses more than oblige, and less than force. Necessitate is to make necessary.

Compel and force act much more directly and positively than oblige or necessitate; and the latter indicates more of physical strength than the former. We are compelled by outward or inward motives; we are obliged more by motives than any thing else; we are forced sometimes by circumstances, though often by plain strength; we are necessitated solely by circumstances. An adversary is compelled to yield who resigns from despair of victory; he is forced to yield if he stand in fear of his life; he is obliged to yield if he cannot withstand the entreaties of his friends; he is necessitated to yield if he want the strength to continue the contest.

An obstinate person must be compelled to give up his point;

You will compel me then to read the will.

SHAKESPEARE.

A turbulent and disorderly man must be forced to go where the officers of justice choose to lead him;

With fates averse, the rout in arms resort
To force their monarch, and insult the court.

DRYDEN.

An unreasonable person must be obliged to satisfy a just demand; 'He that once owes more than he can pay is often obliged to bribe his creditors to patience, by increasing his debt.'—JOHNSON. We are all occasionally necessitated to do that which is not agreeable to us; 'I have sometimes fancied that women have not a retentive power, or the faculty of suppressing their thoughts, but that they are necessitated to speak every thing they think.'—ADDISON.

Pecuniary want compels men to do many things inconsistent with their station;

He would the ghosts of slaughter'd soldiers call,
These his dread wands did to short life compel,
And forc'd the fate of battles to foretell.—DRYDEN.

Honour and religion oblige men scrupulously to observe their word one to another; 'The church hath been thought fit to be called Catholic, in reference to the universal obedience which it prescribeth; both in respect of the persons obliging men of all conditions; and in relation to the precepts requiring the performance of all the evangelical commands.'—PEARSON. Hunger forces men to eat that which is most loathsome to the palate. The fear of a loss necessitates a man to give up a favourite project.

FORCE, VIOLENCE.

Force signifies here the exertion of strength in a particular manner, which brings it very near to the meaning of violence, which, from the Latin violentia and via force, comes from the Greek βία strength.

Force, which expresses a much less degree of exertion than violence, is ordinarily employed to supply the want of a proper will, violence is used to counteract an opposing will. The arm of justice must exercise force in order to bring offenders to a proper account; one nation exercises violence against another in the act of carrying on war. Force is mostly conformable to reason and equity, or employed in self defence;

Our host expell'd, what farther force can stay
The victor troops from universal sway?

DRYDEN

Violence is always resorted to for the attainment of that which is unattainable by law; 'He sees his distress to be the immediate effect of human violence or oppression; and is obliged at the same time to consider it as a Divine judgement.'—BLAIR. All who are invested with authority have occasion to use force at certain times to subdue the unruly will of those who should submit: violence and rapine are inseparable companions: a robber could not subsist by the latter without exercising the former.

In an extended and figurative application to things, these terms convey the same general idea of exerting strength. That is said to have force that acts with force; and that to have violence that acts with violence. A word, an expression, or a remark, has force or is forcible; a disorder, a passion, a sentiment, has violence or is violent. Force is always something desirable; violence is always something hurtful. We ought to listen to arguments which have force in them; we endeavour to correct the violence of all angry passions.

VIOLENT, FURIOUS, BOISTEROUS, VEHEMENT, IMPETUOUS.

Violent signifies having force; furious having fury; boisterous in all probability comes from bestir, signifying ready to bestir or come into motion; vehement, in Latin vehemens, compounded of veho and mens, signifies carried away by the mind or the force of passion; impetuous, that is, having an impetus.

Violent is here the most general term, including the idea of force or violence, which is common to them all. It is as general in its application as in its meaning. When violent and furious are applied to the same objects, the latter expresses a higher degree of the former; thus a furious temper is violent to an excessive degree; a furious whirlwind is violent beyond measure;

The furious pard,
Cow'd and subdu'd, flies from the face of man.

SOMERVILLE.

Violent and boisterous are likewise applied to the same objects; but the boisterous refers only to the violence of the motion or noise: hence we say that a wind is violent, inasmuch as it acts with great force upon all bodies; it is boisterous, inasmuch as it causes the great motion of bodies: a violent person deals in violence of every kind; a boisterous person is full of violent action;

Ye too, ye winds! that now begin to blow
With boisterous sweep, I raise my voice to you.

THOMSON.

Violent, vehement, and impetuous, are all applied to persons, or that which is personal: a man is violent in his opinions, violent in his measures, violent in his resentments; 'This gentleman (Mr. Steele) among a thousand others, is a great instance of the fate of all who are carried away by party spirit of any side; I wish all violence may succeed as ill.'—POPE. He is vehement in his affections or passions, vehement in love, vehement in zeal, vehement in pursuing an object, vehement in expression; 'If there be any use of gesticulation, it must be applied to the ignorant and rude, who will be more affected by vehement than delighted by propriety.'—JOHNSON. Violence transfers itself to some external object on which it acts with force; but vehement respects that species of violence which is confined to the person himself: we may dread violence, because it is always liable to do mischief; we ought to suppress our vehemence, because it is injurious to ourselves; a violent partisan renders himself obnoxious to others; a man who is vehement in any cause puts it out of his own power to be of use. Impetuosity is rather the extreme of violence or vehemence: an impetuous attack is an excessively violent attack: an impetuous character is an excessively vehement character;

The central waters round impetuous rush'd.
THOMSON.

BUSTLE, TUMULT, UPROAR.

Bustle is probably a frequentative of busy; tumult, in French tumulte, Latin tumultus, compounded probably of tumor multus, signifies much swelling and perturbation; uproar, compounded of up and roar, marks the act of setting up a roar or clamour, or the state of its being so set up.

Bustle has most of hurry in it; tumult most of disorder and confusion; uproar most of noise.

The hurried movements of one, or many, cause a bustle; disorderly struggles of many constitute a tumult; the loud elevation of many opposing voices produces an uproar.

Bustle is frequently not the effect of design, but the natural consequence of many persons coming together; 'They who live in the bustle of the world are not, perhaps, the most accurate observers of the progressive change of manners in that society in which they pass their time.'—ABERCROMBY. Tumult commonly arises from a general effervescence in the minds of a multitude;

Outlaws of nature! yet the great must use 'em
Sometimes as necessary tools of tumult.—DRYDEN.

Uproar is the consequence either of general anger or mirth; 'Amid the uproar of other bad passions, conscience acts as a restraining power.'—BLAIR.

A crowded street will always be in a bustle. Contested elections are always accompanied with great tumult. Drinking parties make a considerable uproar, in the indulgence of their intemperate mirth.

TO COERCE, RESTRAIN.

Coerce, in Latin coerceo, that is, con and arceo, signifies to drive into conformity with any person or thing; restrain, in Latin restringo, i. e. re and stringo, signifies to bind hard.

Coercion is a species of restraint: we always restrain or intend to restrain when we coerce; but we do not always coerce when we restrain: coercion always comprehends the idea of force, restraint that of simply keeping under or back: coercion is always an external application; restraint either external or internal: a person is coerced by others only; he may be restrained by himself as well as others.

Coercion acts by a direct application, it opposes force to resistance; restraint acts indirectly to the prevention of an act: the law restrains all men in their actions more or less; it coerces those who attempt to violate it: the unruly will is coerced; the improper will is restrained: coercion is exercised; restraint is imposed: punishment, threats, or any actual exercise of authority, coerces; 'Without coercive power all government is but toothless and precarious, and does not so much command as beg obedience.'—SOUTH. Fear, shame, or a remonstrance from others, restrains; 'The enmity of some men against goodness is so violent and implacable, that no innocence, no excellence of goodness, how great soever, can restrain their malice.'—TILLOTSON. The innovators of the present age are for having all coercion laid aside in the management of children, in lieu of which a system of reasoning is to be adopted; could they persuade the world to adopt their fanciful scheme, we may next expect to hear that all restraint on the inclinations ought to be laid aside as an infringement of personal liberty.

COGENT, FORCIBLE, STRONG.

Cogent, from the Latin cogo to compel; and forcible, from the verb to force, have equally the sense of acting by force; strong is here figuratively employed for that species of strength which is connected with the mind.

Cogency applies to reasons individually considered: force and strength to modes of reasoning or expression; cogent reasons impel to decisive conduct; strong conviction is produced by forcible reasoning conveyed in strong language: changes of any kind are so seldom attended with benefit to society, that a legislator will be cautious not to adopt them without the most cogent reasons; 'Upon men intent only upon truth, the art of an orator has little power; a credible testimony, or a cogent argument, will overcome all the art of modulation and all the violence of contortion.'—JOHNSON. The important truths of Christianity cannot be presented from the pulpit too forcibly to the minds of men; 'The ingenious author just mentioned, assured me that the Turkish satires of Ruhi Bag-dadi were very forcible.'—SIR WM. JONES.

Accuracy and strength are seldom associated in the same mind; those who accustom themselves to strong language are not very scrupulous about the correctness of their assertions; 'Such is the censure of Dennis. There is, as Dryden expresses it, perhaps "too much horse-play in his railleury;" but if his jests are coarse his arguments are strong.'—JOHNSON.

CONSTRAINT, COMPULSION.

Constraint, from constrain, Latin constringo, compounded of con and stringo, signifies the act of straining or tying together; compulsion signifies the act of compelling.

There is much of binding in constraint; of violence in compulsion: constraint prevents from acting agreeably to the will: compulsion forces to act contrary to the will: a soldier in the ranks moves with much constraint, and is often subject to much compulsion to make him move as is desired. Constraint may arise from outward circumstances; compulsion is always produced by some active agent: the forms of civil society lay a proper constraint upon the behaviour of men so as to render them agreeable to each other;

Commands are no constraints. If I obey them
I do it freely.—MILTON.

The arm of the civil power must ever be ready to compel those who will not submit without compulsion: 'Savage declared that it was not his design to fly from justice; that he intended to have appeared (to appear) at the bar without compulsion.'—JOHNSON. In the moments of relaxation, the actions of children should be as free from constraint as possible, which is one means of lessening the necessity for compulsion when they are called to the performance of their duty.

CONSTRAINT, RESTRAINT, RESTRICTION

The meaning of constraint is given in the preceding article; that of restraint as given under To coerce, restrain; restriction is but a variation of restraint.

Constraint respects the movements of the body only; restraint those of the mind and the outward actions: when they both refer to the outward actions, we say a person's behaviour is constrained; his feelings are restrained: he is constrained to act or not to act, or to act in a certain manner; he is restrained from acting at all, if not from feeling: the conduct is constrained by certain prescribed rules, by discipline and order; it is restrained by particular motives; whoever learns a mechanical exercise is constrained to move his body in a certain direction; the fear of detection often restrains persons from the commission of vices more than any sense of their enmity.

The behaviour of children must be more constrained in the presence of their superiors than when they are by themselves: the angry passions should at all times be restrained. A person who is in the slightest degree constrained to do a good action, does good only by halves; 'When from constraint only the offices of seeming kindness are performed, little dependence can be placed on them.'—BLAIR. The inordinate passions and propensities of men are restrained by nothing so effectually as religion; 'What restraints do they lie under who have no regards beyond the grave?'—BERKELEY. Whoever is restrained by shame only may seek gratification under the shelter of concealment.

Restrain and restrict, though but variations from the same verb, have acquired a distinct acceptation: the former applies to the desires, as well as the outward conduct; the latter only to the outward conduct. A person restrains his inordinate appetite; or he is restrained by others from doing mischief: he is restricted in the use of his money. Restrain is an act of power; but restrict is an act of authority or law: the will or the actions of a child are restrained by the parent;

Tully, whose powerful eloquence awhile
Restrain'd the rapid fate of rushing Rome.

THOMSON.

A patient is restricted in his diet by a physician, or any body of people may be restricted by laws; 'Though the Egyptians used flesh for food, yet they were under greater restrictions, in this particular, than most other nations.'—JAMES.

STRAIN, SPRAIN, STRESS, FORCE.

Strain and sprain are without doubt variations of the same word, namely, the Latin stringo to pull tight, or to stretch; they have now, however, a distinct application: to strain is to extend a thing beyond its ordinary length by some extraordinary effort; to sprain is to strain it so as to put out of its place, or extend to an injurious length: the ankle and the wrist are liable to be sprained by a contusion; the back and other parts of the body may be strained by over-exertion.

Strain and stress are kindred terms, as being both variations of stretch and stringo; but they differ now very considerably in their application: figuratively we speak of straining a nerve, or straining a point, to express making great exertions, even beyond our ordinary powers; and morally we speak of laying a stress upon any particular measure or mode of action, signifying to give a thing importance: the strain may be put for the course of sentiment which we express, and the manner of expressing it; the stress may be put for the efforts of the voice in uttering a word or syllable: a writer may proceed in a strain of panegyric or invective; a speaker or a reader lays a stress on certain words by way of distinguishing them from others. To strain is properly a species of forcing; we may force in a variety of ways, that is, by the exercise of force upon different bodies, and in different directions; but to strain is to exercise force by stretching or prolonging bodies; thus to strain a cord is to pull it to its full extent; but we may speak of forcing any hard substance in, or forcing it out, or forcing it through, or forcing it from a body: a door or a lock may be forced by violently breaking them: but a door or a lock may be strained by putting the hinges or the spring out of its place. So likewise, a person may be said to force himself to speak, when by a violent exertion he gives utterance to his words; but he strains his throat or his voice when he exercises the force on the throat or lungs so as to extend them, or he strains his powers of thinking; 'There was then (before the fall) no poring, no struggling with memory, no straining for invention.'—SOUTH. Force and stress as nouns are in like manner comparable when they are applied to the mode of utterance. We must use a certain force in the pronunciation of every word; this therefore is indefinite and general; but the stress is that particular and strong degree of force which is exerted in the pronunciation of certain words; 'Was ever any one observed to come out of a tavern fit for his study, or indeed for any thing requiring stress.'—SOUTH.

Oppose not rage, while rage is in his force.

SHAKESPEARE.

STRESS, STRAIN, EMPHASIS, ACCENT.

Stress and strain signify the same as in the preceding article; emphasis, from the Greek émballo to appear, signifies making to appear; accent, in Latin accentus, from canto to sing, signifies to suit the tune or tone of the voice.

Stress and strain are general both in sense and application: the former still more than the latter: emphasis and accent are modes of the stress. Stress is applicable to all bodies, the powers of which may be tried by exertion; as the stress upon a rope, upon a shaft of a carriage, a wheel or spring in a machine: the strain is an excessive stress, by which a thing is thrown out of its course; there may be a strain in most cases where there is a stress; but stress and strain are to be compared with emphasis and accent, particularly in the exertion of the voice, in which case the stress is a strong and special exertion of the voice, on one word, or one part of a word, so as to distinguish it from another; but the strain is the undue exertion of the voice beyond its usual pitch, in the utterance of one or more words; we lay a stress on our words for the convenience of others; but when we strain the voice it is as much to the annoyance of others as it is hurtful to ourselves; 'Singing differs from vociferation in this, that it consists in a certain harmony; nor is it performed with so much straining of the voice.'—JAMES. The stress may consist in an elevation of voice, or a prolonged utterance; 'Those English syllables which I call long ones receive a peculiar stress of voice from their acute or circumflex accent, as in quickly, dōwry.'—FOSTER. The emphasis is that species of stress which is employed to distinguish one word or syllable from another: the stress may be accidental; but the emphasis is an intentional stress: ignorant people and children are often led to lay the stress on little and unimportant words in a sentence; speakers sometimes find it convenient to mark particular words, to which they attach a value, by the emphasis with which they utter them; 'Emphasis not so much regards the time as a certain grandeur, whereby some letter, syllable, word, or sentence, is rendered more remarkable than the rest by a more vigorous pronunciation and a longer stay upon it.'—HOLDER. The stress may be casual or regular, on words or syllables; the accent is that kind of regulated stress which is laid on one syllable to distinguish it from another: there are many words in our own language, such as subject, object, present, and the like, where, to distinguish the verb from the noun, the accent falls on the last syllable for the former, and on the first syllable for the latter; 'The correctness and harmony of English verse depends entirely upon its being composed of a certain number of syllables, and its having the accents of those syllables properly placed.'—TAYLOR.

In reference to the use of words, these terms may admit of a farther distinction: for we may lay a stress or emphasis on a particular point of our reasoning, in the first case, by enlarging upon it longer than on other points; or, in the second case, by the use of stronger expressions or epithets; 'After such a mighty stress, so irritatingly laid upon two slight, empty words ('self-consciousness' and 'mutual consciousness') have they made any thing, but the author himself (Sherlock on the Trinity) better understood?'—SOUTH. 'The idle, who are neither wise for this world nor the next, are *emphasis*ly called, by Dr. Tillotson, "Fools at large."—SPECTATOR. The strain or accent may be employed to designate the tone or manner in which we express ourselves, that is, the spirit of our discourse: in familiar language we talk of a person's proceeding in a strain of panegyric, or of censure; 'An assured hope of future glory raises him to a pursuit of a more than ordinary strain of duty and perfection.'—SOUTH. In poetry persons are said to pour forth their complaints in tender accents;

For thee my tuneful accents will I raise.—DRYDEN

TO REPRESS, RESTRAIN, SUPPRESS.

To repress is to press back or down: to restrain is to strain back or down. the former is the general, the latter is the specific term: we always repress when we restrain, but not vice versa. Repress is used mostly for pressing down, so as to keep that inward which wants to make its appearance: restrain is an habitual repression by which it is kept in a state of lowness: a person is said to repress his feelings when he does not give them vent either by his words or actions; he is said to restrain his feelings when he never lets them rise beyond a certain pitch: good morals, as well as good manners, call upon us to repress every unseemly expression of joy in the company of those who are not in a condition to partake of our joy; it is prudence as well as virtue to restrain our appetites by an habitual forbearance, that they may not gain the ascendancy. One cannot too quickly repress a rising spirit of resistance in any community, large or small; 'Philosophy has often attempted to repress insolence by asserting that all conditions are levelled by death.'—JOHNSON. One cannot too early restrain the irregularities of childhood; 'He that would keep the power of sin from running out into act, must restrain it from conversing with the object.'—SOUTH. The innocent vivacity of youth should not be repressed; but their wildness and intemperance ought to be restrained.

To repress is simply to keep down or to keep from rising to excess. To suppress is to keep under or to keep from appearing in public or coming into notice. A judicious parent represses every tumultuous passion in a child; 'Her forwardness was repressed with a frown by her mother or aunt.'—JOHNSON. A judicious commander suppresses a rebellion by a timely and resolute exercise of authority; 'Every rebellion, when it is suppressed, makes the subject weaker and the prince stronger.'—DAVIES. To repress a feeling is to keep it down so that it may not increase in force; so likewise to repress violence either of feeling or conduct;

Such kings

Favour the innocent, repress the bold,
And, while they flourish, make an age of gold,
WALLER.

'Some, taking dangers to be the only remedy against dangers, endeavoured to set up the sedition again, but they were speedily repressed, and thereby the sedition suppressed wholly.'—HAYWARD. To suppress a feeling is not to give it expression, to suppress a work, &c. is not to give it publication, or withdraw it from farther publication;

With him Palemon kept the watch at night,
In whose sad bosom many a sigh suppressed
Some painful secret of the soul confest.

FALCONER.

You may depend upon the suppression of these verses.'—POPE.

TO STIFLE, SUPPRESS, SMOTHER.

Stifle is a frequentative of stuff, in Latin stipo, and Greek σῑφω to make tight or close; suppress signifies the same as in the preceding article; smother, as a frequentative of smut or smoke, signifies to cover with smut or smoke.

Stifle and smother in their literal sense will be more properly considered under the article of Suffocate, &c. (v. To suffocate); they are here taken in a moral application.

The leading idea of all these terms is that of keeping out of view: stifle is applicable to the feelings only; suppress to the feelings or to outward circumstances; smother to outward circumstances only: we stifle resentment; we suppress anger; the former is an act of some continuance; the latter is the act of the moment: we stifle our resentment by abstaining to take any measures of retaliation; 'You excel in the art of stifling and concealing your resentment.'—SWIFT. We suppress the rising emotion of anger, so as not to give it utterance or even the expression of a look; 'They foresaw the violence with which this indignation would burst out after being so long suppressed.'—ROBERTSON. It requires time and powerful motives to stifle, but only a single effort to suppress; nothing but a long course of vice can enable a man to stifle the admonitions and reproaches of conscience;

Art, brainless art! our furious charioteer,
(For nature's voice unstifled would recall)
Drives headlong to the precipice of death.

YOUNG.

A sense of prudence may sometimes lead a man to suppress the joy which an occurrence produces in his mind;

Well did'st thou, Richard, to suppress thy voice;
For had the passions of thy heart burst out,
I fear we should have seen decipher'd there
More rancorous spight, more furious raging broils.

SHAKESPEARE.

In regard to outward circumstances, we say that a book is suppressed by the authority of government; that vice is suppressed by the exertions of those who have power: an affair is smothered so that it shall not become generally known, or that the fire is smothered under the embers; 'Great and generous principles not being kept up and cherished, but smothered in sensual delights, God suffers them to sink into low and inglorious satisfaction.'—SOUTH.

TO SUFFOCATE, STIFLE, SMOTHER, CHOKE.

Suffocate, in Latin suffocatus, participle of suffoco, is compounded of sub and fauz, signifying to stop up the throat; stifle is a frequentative of stuff, that is, to stuff excessively; smother is a frequentative of smoke; choke is probably a variation of cheek, in Saxon ceac, because strangulation is effected by a compression of the throat under the cheek-bone.

These terms express the act of stopping the breath; but under various circumstances and by various means; suffocation is produced by every kind of means, external or internal, and is therefore the most general of these terms;

A suffocating wind the pilgrim smites
With instant death.—THOMSON.

Stifling proceeds by internal means, that is, by the admission of foreign bodies into the passages which lead to the respiratory organs, and in this sense is employed figuratively;

When my heart was ready with a sigh to cleave,
I have, with mighty anguish of my soul,
Just at the birth stifled this still-born sigh.

SHAKESPEARE.

We may be suffocated by excluding the air externally, as by gagging, confining closely, or pressing violently: we may be suffocated or stifled by means of vapours, close air, or smoke. To smother is to suffocate by the exclusion of air externally, as by covering a person entirely with bedclothes: to choke is a mode of stifling by means of bodies disproportionately large, as a piece of food lodging in the throat or the larynx, in which sense they may both be used figuratively; 'The love of jealous men breaks out furiously (when the object of their loves is taken from them) and throws off all mixture of suspicion which choked and smothered it before.'—ADDISON.

TO CHECK, CURB, CONTROL.

All these terms express a species of restraining.

Check and curb are figurative expressions borrowed from natural objects. Check, from check or check-mate in the game of chess, signifies as a verb to exert a restrictive power; curb, from the curb, by which horses are kept in, signifies in like manner, a coercive restraining; control is probably contracted from counter-roll, that is, to turn against an object, to act against it.

To check is to throw obstacles in the way, to impede the course; to curb is to bear down by the direct exercise of force, to prevent from action; to control is to direct and turn the course: the actions of men are checked; their feelings are curbed; their actions or feelings are controlled.

External means are employed in checking or controlling; external or internal means are employed in curbing: men check and control others; they curb themselves or others; young people ought always to be checked whenever they discover a too forward temper in the presence of their superiors or elders; 'Devotion, when it does not lie under the check of reason, is apt to degenerate into enthusiasm.'—ADDISON. It is necessary to curb those who are of an impetuous temper;

The point of honour has been deem'd of use,
To teach good manners, and to curb abuse;
Admit it true, the consequence is clear,
Our polished manners are a mask we wear.

COWPER.

It is necessary to keep youth under control, until they have within themselves the restrictive power of judgment to curb their passions, and control their inordinate appetites;

Whatever private views and passions plead,
No cause can justify so black a deed;
These, when the angry tempest clouds the soul,
May darken reason and her course control.

THOMSON

Unlimited power cannot with propriety be intrusted to any body of individuals; there ought in every state to be a legitimate means of checking those who show a disposition to exercise an undue authority; but to invest the people with this office is in fact giving back, into the hands of the community, that which for the wisest purposes was taken from them by the institution of government: it is giving a restraining power to those who themselves are most in want of being restrained; whose ungovernable passions require to be curbed by the iron arm of power, whose unruly wills require all the influence of wisdom and authority to control them.

TO FORBID, PROHIBIT, INTERDICT, PROSCRIBE.

The for in forbid, from the German ver, is negative, signifying to bid not to do; the pro in prohibit, and inter in interdict, have both a similarly negative sense: the former verb, from habeo to have, signifies to have or hold that a thing shall not be done, to restrain from doing; the latter, from disco to say, signifies to say that a thing shall not be done.

Forbid is the ordinary term; prohibit is the judicial term; interdict the moral term.

To forbid is a direct and personal act; to prohibit is an indirect action that operates by means of extended influence: both imply the exercise of power or authority of an individual; but the former is more applicable to the power of an individual, and the latter to the authority of government. A parent forbids his child marrying when he thinks proper; 'The father of Constantia was so incensed at the father of Theodosius that he forbade the son his house.'—ADDISON. The government prohibits the use of spirituous liquors; 'I think that all persons (that is, quacks) should be prohibited from curing their incurable patients by act of parliament.'—HAWKSWORTH. Interdict is a species of forbidding applied to more serious concerns; we may be interdicted the use of wine by a physician; 'It is not to be desired that morality should be considered as interdicted to all future writers.'—JOHNSON.

A thing is forbidden by a command; it is prohibited by a law: hence that which is immoral is forbidden by the express word of God; that which is illegal is prohibited by the laws of man. We are forbidden in the Scripture from even indulging a thought of committing evil; it is the policy of every government to prohibit the importation and exportation of such commodities as are likely to affect the internal trade of the country.* To forbid or interdict are opposed to command; to prohibit, to allow. As nothing is forbidden to Christians which is good and just in itself, so nothing is commanded that is hurtful and unjust; the same cannot be said of the Mahometan or any other religion. As no one is prohibited in our own country from writing that which can tend to the improvement of mankind; so on the other hand he is not allowed to indulge his private malignity by the publication of injurious personalities.

Forbid and interdict, as personal acts, are properly applicable to persons only, but by an improper application are extended to things; prohibit, however, in the general sense of restraining, is applied with equal propriety to things as to persons: shame forbids us doing a thing;

Life's span forbids us to extend our cares,
And stretch our hopes beyond our years.

CREECH.

Law, authority, and the like, prohibit; 'Fear prohibits endeavours by infusing despair of success.'—JOHNSON. Nature interdicts;

Other ambition nature interdicts.—YOUNG.

Proscribe, in Latin proscribo, signified originally to offer for sale, and also to outlaw a person, but is now employed either in the political or moral sense of condemning capitally or utterly, whence it has been extended in its application to signify the absolutely forbidding to be used or held as to proscribe a name or a doctrine; 'Some utterly proscribe the name of chance, as a word of impious and profane signification.'—SOUTH.

* Vide Trusler: "To forbid, prohibit."

TO DECIDE, DETERMINE, CONCLUDE UPON

The idea of bringing a thing to an end is common to the signification of all these words; but decide expresses more than determine, and determine more than conclude upon; to decide, from the Latin decido, compounded of de and cadō, signifying to cut off or cut short a business; and determine, from the Latin determino, compounded of de and terminus a term or boundary, signifying to fix the boundary, are both employed in matters relating to ourselves or others; conclude, from the Latin concludo, signifying to make the mind up to a thing, is employed in matters that respect the parties only who conclude. As it respects others, to decide is an act of greater authority than to determine: a parent decides for his child; a subordinate person may determine sometimes for those who are under him in the absence of his superiors. In all cases, to decide is an act of greater importance than to determine. The nature and character of a thing is decided upon: its limits or extent are determined on. A judge decides on the law and equity of the case; the jury determines as to the guilt or innocence of the person. An individual decides in his own mind on any measure, and the propriety of adopting it; he determines in his own mind, as to how, when, and where it shall be commenced.

One decides in all matters of question or dispute; one determines in all matters of fact. We decide in order to have an opinion; we determine in order to act. In complicated cases, where arguments of apparently equal weight are offered by men of equal authority, it is difficult to decide;

With mutual blood th' Ausonian soil is dyed,
While on its borders each their claim decide.

DRYDEN

When equally feasible plans are offered for our choice, we are often led to determine upon one of them from trifling motives; 'Revolutions of state, many times make way for new institutions and forms; and often determine in either setting up some tyranny at home, or bringing in some conquest from abroad.'—TEMPLE.

To determine and conclude are equally practical: but determine seems to be more peculiarly the act of an individual; conclude may be the act of one or of many. We determine by an immediate act of the will: we conclude on a thing by inference and deduction. Caprice may often influence in determining; but nothing is concluded on without deliberation and judgement. Many things may be determined on which are either never put into execution, or remain long unexecuted;

Ever! now expect great tidings, which perhaps
Of us will soon determine, or impose
New laws to be observ'd.—MILTON.

What is concluded on is mostly followed by immediate action. To conclude on is properly to come to a final determination;

Is it concluded he shall be protector?
It is determined, not concluded yet;
But so it must be, if the king miscarry.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO DETERMINE, RESOLVE.

To determine (v. To decide) is more especially an act of the judgement; * to resolve (v. Courage) is an act of the will: the former requires examination and choice; we determine how or what we shall do: the latter requires a firm spirit; we resolve that we will do what we have determined upon. Our determinations should be prudent, that they may not cause repentance; our resolutions should be fixed, in order to prevent variation. There can be no co-operation with a man who is undetermined; it will be dangerous to co-operate with a man who is irresolute.

In the ordinary concerns of life we have frequent occasion to determine without resolving; in the discharge of our moral duties, or the performance of any office, we have occasion to resolve without determining. A master determines to dismiss his servant; the servant resolves on becoming more diligent. Personal convenience or necessity gives rise to the determination; a sense of duty, honour, fidelity, and the like gives birth to the resolution. A traveller determines to take a certain route; a learner resolves to conquer every difficulty in the acquirement of learning. Humour or change of circumstances occasions a person to alter his determination; timidity, fear, or defect in principle, occasions the resolution to waver. Children are not capable of determining; and their best resolutions fall before the gratification of the moment. Those who determine hastily are frequently under the necessity of altering their determinations; 'When the mind hovers among such a variety of allurements, one had better settle on a way of life that is not the very best we might have chosen, than grow old without determining our choice.'—ADDISON. There are no resolutions so weak as those that are made on a sick bed: the return of health is quickly succeeded by a recurrence to our former course of life; 'The resolution of dying to end our miseries does not show such a degree of magnanimity, as a resolution to bear them, and submit to the dispensations of Providence.'—ADDISON.

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Decision, resolution"

In matters of science, determine is to fix the mind, or to cause it to rest in a certain opinion; to resolve is to lay open what is obscure, to clear the mind from doubt and hesitation. We determine points of question; we resolve difficulties. It is more difficult to determine in matters of rank or precedence than in cases where the solid and real interests of men are concerned; 'We pray against nothing but sin, and against evil in general (in the Lord's prayer), leaving it with Omniscience to determine what is really such.'—ADDISON. It is the business of the teacher to resolve the difficulties which are proposed by the scholar; 'I think there is no great difficulty in resolving your doubts. The reasons for which you are inclined to visit London are, I think, not of sufficient strength to answer the objections.'—JOHNSON. Every point is not proved which is determined; nor is every difficulty resolved which is answered.

TO SOLVE, RESOLVE.

Solve and resolve both come from the Latin solvo, in Greek λύω, in Hebrew פָּרַק to loosen.

Between solve and resolve there is no considerable difference either in sense or application: the former seems merely to speak of unfolding, in a general manner, that which is wrapped up in obscurity: to resolve is rather to unfold it by the particular method of carrying one back to first principles; we solve a problem, and resolve a difficulty;

Something yet of doubt remains,
Which only thy solution can resolve.—MILTON.

DECIDED, DETERMINED, RESOLUTE.

A man who is decided (v. To decide) remains in no doubt: he who is determined is uninfluenced by the doubts or questions of others: he who is resolute (v. To determine, resolve) is uninfluenced by the consequences of his actions. A decided character is at all times essential for a prince or a minister, but particularly so in an unsettled period like the present; a determined character is essential for a commander, or any one who has to exercise authority; a resolute character is essential for one who has engaged in dangerous enterprises. Pericles was a man of a decided temper, which was well fitted to direct the affairs of government in a season of turbulence and disquietude; 'Almost all the high-bred republicans of my time have, after a short space, become the most decided thorough-paced courtiers.'—BURKE. Titus Manlius Torquatus displayed himself to be a man of a determined character, when he put to death his victorious son for a breach of military discipline;

A race determined, that to death contend;
So fierce these Greeks their last retreats defend.

POPE.

Brutus, the murderer of Cæsar, was a man of a resolute temper; 'Most of the propositions we think, reason, discourse, nay, act upon, are such as we cannot have undoubted knowledge of their truth; yet some of them border so near upon certainty that we make no doubt at all about them; but assent to them as firmly, and act according to that assent as resolutely, as if they were infallibly demonstrated.'—LOCKE.

DECIDED, DECISIVE.

Decided marks that which is actually decided: decisive that which appertains to decision.

Decided is employed for persons or things; decisive only for things. A person's aversion or attachment is decided; a sentence, a judgement, or a victory, is decisive. A man of a decided character always adopts decisive measures. It is right to be decidedly averse to every thing which is immoral: we should be cautious not to pronounce decisively on any point where we are not perfectly clear and well grounded in our opinion. In every popular commotion it is the duty of a good subject to take a decided part in favour of law and order; 'A politic caution, a guarded circumspection, were among the ruling principles of our forefathers in their most decided conduct.'—BURKE. Such is the nature of law, that, if it were not decisive, it would be of no value; 'The sentences of superiour judges are final, decisive, and irrevocable.'—BLACKSTONE.

DECISION, JUDGEMENT, SENTENCE.

Decision signifies literally the act of deciding, or the thing decided upon (v. To decide); judgement signifies the act of judging or determining in general (v. To decide); sentence, in Latin sententia, signifies the opinion held or maintained.

These terms, though very different in their original meaning, are now employed so that the two latter are species of the former; a final conclusion of any business is comprehended in them all: but the decision conveys none of the collateral ideas which are expressed by judgement and sentence; a decision has no respect to the agent; it may be said of one or many; it may be the decision of a court of law, of the nation, of the publick, of a particular body of men, or of a private individual: but a judgement is given in a publick court, or among private individuals: a sentence is passed in a court of law, or at the bar of the publick.

A decision signifies none of the circumstances of the action; it may be a legal or an arbitrary decision; it may be a decision according to one's caprice, or after mature deliberation: a judgement is always passed either in a court of law, and consequently by virtue of authority; or it is passed by an individual by the authority of his own judgement: a sentence is always passed by the authority of law, or the will of the publick.

A decision respects matters of dispute or litigation; it puts an end to all question; 'The decisions of the judges, in the several courts of justice, are the principal and most authoritative evidence that can be given of the existence of such a custom as shall form a part of the common law.'—BLACKSTONE. A judgement respects the guilt or innocence, the moral excellence or defects, of a person; 'It is the greatest folly to seek the praise or approbation of any being besides the Supreme Being; because no other being can make a right judgement of us.'—ADDISON. A sentence respects the punishment or consequent fate of the object: 'The guilty man has an honour for the judge, who with justice pronounces against him the sentence of death itself.'—STEELE. Some questions are of so complicated a nature, that it is not possible to bring them to a decision; men are forbidden by the Christian religion to be severe in their judgements on one another; the works of an author must sometimes await the sentence of impartial posterity before their value can be duly appreciated.

FINAL, CONCLUSIVE.

Final, in French final, Latin finalis, from finis the end, signifies having an end; conclusive, as in the preceding article, signifies shutting up, or coming to a conclusion.

Final designates simply the circumstance of being the last; conclusive the mode of finishing or coming to the last: a determination is final which is to be succeeded by no other; 'Neither with us in England hath there been (till very lately) any final determination upon the right of authors at the common law.'—BLACKSTONE. A reasoning is conclusive that puts a stop to further question; 'I hardly think the example of Abraham's complaining, that, unless he had some children of his body, his steward Eliezer of Damascus would be his heir, is quite conclusive to show that he made him so by will.'—BLACKSTONE. The final is arbitrary; it depends upon the will to make it so or not; the conclusive is relative; it depends upon the circumstances and the understanding, a person gives a final answer at option; but, in order to make an answer conclusive, it must be satisfactory to all parties.

CONCLUSIVE, DECISIVE, CONVINCING.

Conclusive applies either to practical or argumentative matters; decisive to what is practical only; convincing to what is argumentative only.

It is necessary to be conclusive when we deliberate, and decisive when we command. What is conclusive puts an end to all discussion, and determines the judgement; 'I will not disguise that Dr. Bentley, whose criticism is so conclusive for the forgery of those tragedies quoted by Plutarch, is of opinion "Thespis himself published nothing in writing."—CUMBERLAND. What is decisive puts an end to all wavering, and determines the will; 'Is it not somewhat singular that Young preserved, without any palliation, this preface (to his Satire on Women) so bluntly decisive in favour of laughing at the world, in the same collection of his works which contains the mournful, angry, gloomy, Night Thoughts?'—CROFT. Negotiators have sometimes an interest in not speaking conclusively; commanders can never retain their authority without speaking decisively; conclusive, when compared to convincing, is general; the latter is particular: an argument is convincing, a chain of reasoning conclusive. There may be much that is convincing, where there is nothing conclusive: a proof may be convincing of a particular circumstance; but conclusive evidence will bear upon the main question; 'That religion is essential to the welfare of man, can be proved by the most convincing arguments.'—BLAIR.

CRITERION, STANDARD.

Criterion, in Greek κριτήριον, from κρίνω to judge, signifies the mark or rule by which one may judge; standard, from the verb to stand, signifies the point at which one must stand, or beyond which one must not go.

The criterion is employed only in matters of judgement; the standard is used in the ordinary concerns of life. The former serves for determining the characters and qualities of things; the latter for defining quantity and measure. The language and manners of a person is the best criterion for forming an estimate of his station and education;

But have we then no law besides our will,
No just criterion fix'd to good or ill?
As well at noon we may obstruct our sight,
Then doubt if such a thing exists as light.

JENYNS.

In order to produce a uniformity in the mercantile transactions of mankind, one with another, it is the custom of government to set up a certain standard for the regulation of coins, weights, and measures.

The word standard may likewise be used figuratively in the same sense. The Bible is a standard of excellence, both in morals and religion, which cannot be too closely followed. It is impossible to have the same standard in the arts and sciences, because all our performances fall short of perfection, and will admit of improvement;

Rate not th' extension of the human mind,
By the plebeian standard of mankind.—JENYNS.

TO CONFIRM, CORROBORATE.

Confirm, in French confirmer, Latin confirmo, which is compounded of con and firmo or firmitas, signifying to make additionally firm; corroborate, in Latin corroboratus, participle of corroboro, compounded of cor or con and roboro to strengthen, signifies to add to the strength.

The idea of strengthening is common to these terms, but under different circumstances: confirm is used generally; corroborate only in particular instances.

What confirms serves to confirm the minds of others: 'There is an Abyssinian here who knew Mr. Bruce at Givender. I have examined him, and he confirms Mr. Bruce's account.'—SIR WM. JONES. What corroborates strengthens one's self; 'The secrecy of this conference very much favours my conjecture, that Augustus made an attempt to persuade Tiberius from holding on the empire; and the length of time it took up corroborates the probability of that conjecture.'—CUMBERLAND. A testimony may be confirmed or corroborated; but all doubt is removed by a confirmation; the persuasion is strengthened by a corroboration; when the truth of a person's assertions is called in question, it is fortunate for him when circumstances present themselves that confirm the truth of what he has said, or, if he have respectable friends, to corroborate his testimony.

TO CONFIRM, ESTABLISH.

Confirm (v. To confirm, corroborate); establish, from the word stable, signifies to make stable or able to stand.

The idea of strengthening is common to these as to the former terms, but with a different application: confirm respects the state of a person's mind, and whatever acts upon the mind; establish is employed with regard to whatever is external: a report is confirmed; a reputation is established: a person is confirmed in the persuasion or belief of any truth or circumstance;

Trifles, light as air,
Are to the jealous, confirmations strong
As proofs of Holy Writ.—SHAKESPEARE

A thing is established in the publick estimation, or a principle is established in the mind; 'The silk worm, after having spun her task, lays her eggs and dies; but a man can never have taken in his full measure of knowledge, has not time to subdue his passions, or establish his soul in virtue, and come up to the perfection of his nature, before he is hurried off the stage.'—ADDISON.

The mind seeks its own means of confirming itself; things are established either by time or authority: no person should be hasty in giving credit to reports that are not fully confirmed, nor in giving support to measures that are not established upon the surest grounds: a reciprocity of good offices serves to confirm an alliance, or a good understanding between people and nations; interest or reciprocal affection serve to establish an intercourse between individuals, which has perhaps, been casually commenced.

UNDETERMINED, UNSETTLED, UNSTEADY, WAVERING.

Undetermined (v. To determine,) is a temporary state of the mind; unsettled is commonly more lasting; we are undetermined in the ordinary concerns of life; we are unsettled in matters of opinion: we may be undetermined whether we shall go or stay; we are unsettled in our faith or religious profession; 'Uncertain and unsettled as Cicero was, he seems fired with the contemplation of immortality.'—PEARSE.

Undetermined and unsettled are applied to particular objects; unsteady and wavering are habits of the mind: to be unsteady is, in fact, to be habitually unsettled in regard to all objects. An unsettled character is one that has no settled principles: an unsteady character has an unfitness in himself to settle: 'You will find soberness and truth in the proper teachers of religion, and much unsteadiness and vanity in others.'—EARL WENTWORTH. Undetermined describes one uniform state of mind, namely, the want of determination: wavering describes a changeable state, namely, the state of determining variously at different times. Undetermined is always taken in an indifferent, wavering mostly in a bad, sense: we may frequently be undetermined from the nature of the case, which does not present motives for determining; 'We suffer the last part of life to steal from us in weak hopes of some fortuitous occurrence or drowsy equilibrations of undetermined counsel.'—JOHNSON. A person is mostly wavering from a defect in his character, in cases where he might determine;

Yet such, we find, they are as can control
The servile actions of our wav'ring soul.

PRIOR.

A parent may with reason be undetermined as to the line of life which he shall choose for his son: men of soft and timid characters are always wavering in the most trivial, as well as the most important, concerns of life.

CONSTANCY, STABILITY, STEADINESS, FIRMNESS.

Constancy, in French constance, Latin constantia, from constans and consto, compounded of con and sto to stand by or close to a thing, signifies the quality of adhering to the thing that has been once chosen; stability, in French stabilité, Latin stabilitas, from stabilis and sto to stand, signifies the abstract quality of being able to stand; steadiness, from steady or staid, Saxon steig, high German stätig, Greek στέδος and ἵστυ to stand, signifies a capacity for standing; firmness, signifies the abstract quality of firm.

Constancy respects the affections; stability the opinions; steadiness the action or the motives of action; firmness the purpose or resolution.

* Constancy prevents from changing, and furnishes the mind with resources against weariness or disgust of the same object; it preserves and supports an attachment under every change of circumstances; 'Without constancy there is neither love, friendship, nor virtue in the world.'—ADDISON. Stability prevents from varying, it bears up the mind against the movements of levity or curiosity, which a diversity of objects might produce; 'With God there is no variability, with man there is no stability. Virtue and vice divide the empire of his mind, and wisdom and folly alternately rule him.'—BLAIR. Steadiness prevents from deviating; it enables the mind to bear up against the influence of humour, which temperament or outward circumstances might produce; it fixes on one course and keeps to it; 'A manly steadiness of conduct is the object we are always to keep in view.'—BLAIR. Firmness prevents from yielding; it gives the mind strength against all the attacks to which it may be exposed; it makes a resistance, and comes off triumphant; 'A corrupted and guilty man can possess no true firmness of heart.'—BLAIR.

Constancy, among lovers and friends, is the favourite theme of poets; the world has, however, afforded but few originals from which they could copy their pictures: they have mostly described what is desirable rather than what is real. Stability of character is essential for those who are to command; for how can they govern others who cannot govern their own thoughts? Steadiness of deportment is a great recommendation to those who have to obey: how can any one perform his part well who suffers himself to be perpetually interrupted? Firmness of character is indispensable in the support of principles: there are many occasions in which this part of a man's character is likely to be put to a severe test.

Constancy is opposed to fickleness; stability to changeableness; steadiness to flightiness; firmness to pliancy.

FIRM, FIXED, SOLID, STABLE.

Firm, in French ferme, Latin firmus, comes from fero to bear, signifying the quality of bearing, upholding, or keeping; fixed denotes the state of being fixed; solid, in Latin solidus, comes from solum the ground, which is the most solid thing existing; stable, in Latin stabilis, from sto, signifies the quality of being able to stand.

That is firm which is not easily shaken; that is fixed which is fastened to something else, and not easily torn; that is solid which is able to bear, and does not easily give way; that is stable which is able to make a stand against resistance, or the effects of time. A pillar which is firm on its base, fixed to a wall made of solid oak, is likely to be stable. A man stands firm in battle who does not flinch from the attack; he is fixed to a spot by the order of his commander. An army of firm men form a solid mass, and, by their heroism, may deserve the most stable monument that can be erected;

In one firm orb the bands were rang'd around,
A cloud of heroes blacken'd all the ground.

POPE.

* Girard: "Stabilité, constance, fermeté."

Unmov'd and silent, the whole war they wa-
Serenely dreadful, and as fix'd as fate.—POPE.

In the moral sense, firmness respects the purpose, or such actions as depend on the purpose; fixed is used either for the mind, or for outward circumstances; solid is applicable to things in general, in an absolute sense; stable is applicable to things in a relative sense. Decrees are more or less firm, according to the source from which they spring; none are firm, compared with those which arise from the will of the Almighty:

The man that's resolute and just

Firm to his principles and trust,

Nor hopes nor fears can bind.—WALSH.

Laws are fixed in proportion as they are connected with a constitution in which it is difficult to innovate; 'One loves fixed laws, and the other arbitrary power.'

—TEMPLE. That which is solid is so of its own nature, but does not admit of degrees: a solid reason has within itself an independent property, which can not be increased or diminished;

But these fantastick errors of our dream

Lead us to solid wrong.—COWLEY.

That which is stable is so by comparison with that which is of less duration; the characters of some men are more stable than those of others; youth will not have so stable a character as manhood; 'The prosperity of no man on earth is stable and assured.'—BLAIR.

A friendship is firm when it does not depend upon the opinion of others: it is fixed when the choice is made and grounded in the mind; it is solid when it rests on the only solid basis of accordancy in virtue and religion; it is stable when it is not liable to decrease or die away with time.

HARD, FIRM, SOLID.

The close adherence of the component parts of a body constitutes hardness. The close adherence of different bodies to each other constitutes firmness (or Fixed). That is hard which will not yield to a closer compression; that is firm which will not yield so as to produce a separation. Ice is hard, as far as it respects itself, when it resists every pressure; it is firm, with regard to the water which it covers, when it is so closely bound as to resist every weight without breaking.

Hard and solid respect the internal constitution of bodies, and the adherence of the component parts; but hard denotes a much closer degree of adherence than solid: the hard is opposed to the soft; the solid to the fluid: every hard body is by nature solid; although every solid body is not hard. Wood is always a solid body, but it is sometimes hard, and sometimes soft; water, when congealed, is a solid body, and admits of different degrees of hardness.

In the improper application, hardness is allied to insensibility: firmness to fixedness; solidity to substantiality: a hard man is not to be acted upon by any tender motives; a firm man is not to be turned from his purpose; a solid man holds no purposes that are not well founded. A man is hardened in that which is bad, by being made insensible to that which is good: a man is confirmed in any thing good or bad, by being rendered less disposed to lay it aside; his mind is consolidated by acquiring fresh motives for action.

TO FIX, FASTEN, STICK.

Fix (v. To fix, settle); fasten is to make fast; stick is to make to stick.

Fix is a generic term; fasten and stick are but modes of fixing. we fix whatever we make to remain in a given situation; we fasten if we fix it firmly; we stick when we fix a thing by means of sticking. A post is fixed in the ground; it is fastened to a wall by a nail; it is stuck to another board by means of glue. Shelves are fixed; a horse is fastened to a gate; bills are stuck up. What is fixed may be removed in various ways;

On mules and dogs the infection first began,
And fast the venom'd arrows fix'd in man.—POPE

What is fastened is removed by main force;

As the bold bound that gives the lion chase,
With beating bosom, and with eager pace,
Hangs on his haunch, or fastens on his heels,
Guards as he turns, and circles as he wheels.

POPE.

What is stuck must be separated by contrivance;

Some lines more moving than the rest,
Stuck to the point that pierc'd her breast.—SWIFT.

TO FIX, SETTLE, ESTABLISH.

To fix, in Latin fixum, perfect of figo, and in Greek ῥηγω, signifies simply to make to keep its place; settle, which is a frequentative of set, signifies to make to sit or be at rest; establish, from the Latin stabilis, signifies to make stable or keep its ground.

Fix is the general and indefinite term; to settle and establish are to fix strongly. Fix and settle are applied either to material or spiritual objects, establish only to moral objects. A post may be fixed in the ground in any manner, but it requires time for it to settle;

Hell heard the insufferable noise, hell saw
Heaven running from heav'n, and would have fled
Afrighted, but that fate had fix'd too deep
Her dark foundations.—MILTON.

Warm'd in the brain the brazen weapon lies,
And shades eternal settle o'er his eyes.—POPE.

A person may either fix himself, settle himself, or establish himself; the first case refers simply to his taking up his abode, or choosing a certain spot; the second refers to his permanency of stay; and the third to the business which he raises or renders permanent.

The same distinction exists between these words in their farther application to the conduct of men. We may fix one or many points, important or unimportant, it is a mere act of the will; we settle many points of importance; it is an act of deliberation: thus we fix the day and hour of doing a thing; we settle the affairs of our family;

While wavering counsels thus his mind engage,
Fluctuates in doubtful thought the Pylian sage,
To join the host or to the gen'ral haste,
Debating long, he fixes on the last.—POPE.

Justice submitted to what Abra pleas'd,
Her will alone could settle or revoke,
And law was fixed by what she latest spoke.

PRIOR.

So likewise to fix is properly the act of one; to settle may be the joint act of many: thus a parent fixes on a business for his child, or he settles the marriage contract with another parent. To fix and settle are personal acts, and the objects are mostly of a private nature, but to establish is an indirect action, and the object mostly of a public nature: thus we fix our opinions; we settle our minds; or we are instrumental in establishing laws, institutions, and the like. It is much to be lamented that any one should remain unsettled in his faith; and still more so, that the best form of faith is not universally established; 'A pamphlet that talks of slavery, France, and the pretender; they desire no more; it will settle the wavering and confirm the doubtful.'—SWIFT. 'I would establish but one general rule to be observed in all conversation, which is this, that men should not talk to please themselves, but those that hear them.'—STEELE.

TO FIX, DETERMINE, SETTLE, LIMIT.

To fix, as in the preceding article, is here the general term; to determine (v. To decide); to settle (v. To fix); to limit (v. To bound); are here modes of fixing. They all denote the acts of conscious agents, but differ in the object and circumstances of the action: we may fix any object by any means, and to any point, we may fix material objects or spiritual objects, we may either fix by means of our senses, or our thoughts; but we can determine only by means of our thoughts. To fix, in distinction from the rest, is said in regard to a single point or a line; but to determine is always said of one or more points, or a whole: we fix where a thing shall begin; but we determine where it shall begin, and where it shall end, which way, and how far it shall go, and the like: thus, we may fix our eye upon a star, or we fix our minds upon a particular branch of astronomy; 'In a rotund, whether it be a building or a plantation, you can no where fix a boundary.'—BURKE. We determine the distance of the heavenly bodies, or the specific gravity of bodies, and the like, upon philosophical principles. So in morals we may fix our minds on an object; but we determine the mode of accomplishing it; 'Your first care must be to acquire the power of fixing your thoughts.'—BLAIR. 'More particularly to determine the proper season for grammar, I do not see how it can be made a study, but as an introduction to rhetoric.'—LOCKE.

Determine is to settle as a means to the end; we commonly determine all subordinate matters, in order to settle a matter finally: thus, the determination of a single cause will serve to settle all other differences. 'One had better settle on a way of life that is not the very best we might have chosen, than grow old without determining our choice.'—ADDISON. The determination respects the act of the individual who fixes certain points and brings them to a term; the settlement respects simply the conclusion of the affair, or the termination of all dispute and question; 'Religion settles the pretensions and otherwise interfering in terests of mortal men.'—ADDISON.

How can we bind or limit his decree
But what our ear has heard or eye may see?

PRIOR.

To determine and limit both signify to fix boundaries; but the former respects, for the most part, such boundaries or terms as are formed by the nature of things; 'No sooner have they climbed that hill, which thus determines their view at a distance, but a new prospect is opened.'—ATTERBURY.

No mystic dreams could make their fates appear,
Though now determin'd by Tydides' spear.—POPE.

Limit, on the other hand, is the act of a conscious agent employed upon visible objects, and the process of the action itself is rendered visible, as when we limit a price, or limit our time, &c.

TO COMPOSE, SETTLE.

Compose, in Latin composui, perfect of compono to put together, signifies to put in due order; in which sense it is allied to settle.

We compose that which has been disjointed and separated, by bringing it together again; we settle that which has been disturbed and put in motion, by making it rest: we compose the thoughts which have been deranged and thrown into confusion;

Thy presence did each doubtful heart compose,
And factions wonder'd that they once arose.

TICKELL.

We settle the mind which has been fluctuating and distracted by contending desires;

Perhaps my reason may but ill defend
My settled faith, my mind with age impair'd.

SHENSTONE.

The mind must be composed before we can think justly; it must be settled before we can act consistently.

We compose the differences of others: we settle our own differences with others: it is difficult to compose the quarrels of angry opponents, or to settle the disputes of obstinate partisans.

COMPOSED, SEDATE.

Composed expresses the state of being composed (v. To compose); sedate, in Latin sedatus, participle of sedo to settle, signifies the quality of being settled.

Composed respects the air and looks externally, and the spirits internally; sedate relates to the deportment or carriage externally, and the fixedness of the purpose internally: composed is opposed to ruffled or hurried, sedate to buoyant or volatile.

Composure is a particular state of the mind; sedateness is an habitual frame of mind; a part of the character: a composed mien is very becoming in the season of devotion; 'Upon her nearer approach to Her cules she stepped before the other lady, who came forward with a regular composed carriage.'—ADDISON

A sedate carriage is becoming in youth who are engaged in serious concerns;

Let me associate with the serious night,
And contemplation, her sedate compeer.
THOMSON.

TO ASK, OR ASK FOR, CLAIM, DEMAND.

To ask, is here taken for something more than a simple expression of wishes, as denoted in the article under To ask, beg; claim, in Latin clamo to cry after, signifies to express an imperious wish for; demand, in French demande, Latin demando, compounded of de and mando, signifies to call for imperatively.

Ask, in the sense of beg, is confined to the expression of wishes on the part of the asker, without involving any obligation on the part of the person asked; all granted in this case is voluntary, or complied with as a favour: but ask for in the sense here taken is involuntary, and springs from the forms and distinctions of society. Ask is here, as before, generic or specific; claim and demand are specific; in its specific sense it conveys a less peremptory sense than either claim or demand. To ask for denotes simply the expressed wish to have what is considered as due;

Virtue, with them, is only to abstain
From all that nature asks, and covet pain.

JENYNS.

To claim is to assert a right, or to make it known;

My country claims me all, claims ev'ry passion.
MARTYN.

To demand is to insist on having without the liberty of a refusal;

Even mountains, vales,
And forests, seem impatient to demand
The promis'd sweetness. THOMSON.

Asking respects obligation in general, great or small; claim respects obligations of importance. Asking for supposes a right, not questionable; claim supposes a right hitherto unacknowledged; demand supposes either a disputed right, or the absence of all right, and the simple determination to have: a tradesman asks for what is owing to him as circumstances may require; a person claims the property he has lost; people are sometimes pleased to make demands, the legality of which cannot be proved. What is lent must be asked for when it is wanted; whatever has been lost and is found must be recovered by a claim; whatever a selfish person wants, he strives to obtain by a demand, whether just or unjust.

TO DEMAND, REQUIRE.

To demand, is here taken in the same sense as in the preceding article; require, in Latin requiro, compounded of re and quæro, signifies to seek for, or to seek to get back.

We demand that which is owing and ought to be given; we require that which we wish and expect to have done. A demand is more positive than a requisition; the former admits of no question; the latter is liable to be both questioned and refused: the creditor makes a demand on the debtor; the master requires a certain portion of duty from his servant: it is unjust to demand of a person what he has no right to give;

Hear, all ye Trojans! all ye Grecian bands,
What Paris, author of the war, *demand*s.

POPE.

It is unreasonable to require of a person what it is not in his power to do;

Now, by my sov'reign and his fate I swear,
Renown'd for faith in peace, and force in war,
Oft our alliance other lands desir'd,
And what we seek of you, of us requir'd.

DRYDEN.

A thing is commonly *demand*ed in express words; it is required by implication: a person *demand*s admission when it is not voluntarily granted; he requires respectful deportment from those who are subordinate to him.

In the figurative application the same sense is preserved: things of urgency and moment demand immediate attention; 'Surely the retrospect of life and the extirpation of lusts and appetites, deeply rooted and widely spread, may be allowed to demand some secession from business and folly.'—JOHNSON. Difficult matters require a steady attention;

O then how blind to all that truth requires,
Who think it freedom when a part aspires.
GOLDSMITH

RIGHT, CLAIM, PRIVILEGE.

Right signifies in this sense what it is right for one to possess, which is in fact a word of large meaning: for since the right and the wrong depend upon indeterminate questions, the right of having is equally indeterminate in some cases with every other species of right. A claim (v. To ask for) is a species of right to have that which is in the hands of another; the right to ask another for it. The privilege is a species of right peculiar to particular individuals or bodies.

Right, in its full sense, is altogether an abstract thing which is independent of human laws and regulations; claims and privileges are altogether connected with the establishments of civil society.

Liberty, in the general sense, is an unalienable right which belongs to man as a rational and responsible agent; it is not a claim, for it is set above all question, and all condition; nor is it a privilege, for it cannot be exclusively granted to one being, nor unconditionally be taken away from another.

Between the right and the power there is often as wide a distinction as between truth and falsehood; we have often a right to do that which we have no power to do, and the power to do that which we have no right to do; slaves have a right to the freedom which is enjoyed by all other creatures of the same species with themselves, but they have not the power to use this freedom as others do. In England men have the power of thinking for themselves as they please: but, by the abuse which they make of this power, we see that, in many cases, they have not the right, unless we admit the contradiction that men have a right to do what is wrong; they have the power therefore of exercising this right only, because no other person has the legal right of controlling them;

In ev'ry street a city bard
Rules, like an alderman, his ward:
His undisputed rights extend
Through all the lane from end to end.—SWIFT.

We have often a claim to a thing, which it is not in our power to substantiate; and, on the other hand, claims are set up in cases which are totally unfounded on any right;

Whence is this pow'r, this fondness of all arts,
Serving, adorning life through all its parts;
Which names impos'd, by letters mark'd those names,
Adjusted properly by legal claims?—JENYNS.

Privileges are rights granted to individuals, depending either upon the will of the grantor, or the circumstances of the receiver, or both; privileges are therefore partial rights, transferable at the discretion of persons individually or collectively;

A thousand bands thy rights disown,
And with rebellious arm pretend,
An equal privilege to descend.—SWIFT

PRIVILEGE, PREROGATIVE, EXEMPTION, IMMUNITY.

Privilege, in Latin privilegium, compounded of privus and lex, signifies a law made in favour of any individual or set of individuals; prerogative, comes from the Latin prærogativi, so called from præ and rogare to ask, because certain Roman tribes, so called, were first asked whom they would have to be consuls: hence applied in our language to the right of determining or choosing first in many particulars; exemption, from the verb to exempt, and immunity, from the Latin immunis free, are both employed for the object from which one is exempt or free.

Privilege and prerogative consist of positive advantages; exemption and immunity of those which are negative: by the former we obtain an actual good, by the latter the removal of an evil.

Privilege, in its most extended sense, comprehends all the rest: for every prerogative, exemption, and immunity, are privileges, inasmuch as they rest upon certain laws or customs, which are made for the benefit of certain individuals; but in the restricted sense the privilege is used only for the subordinate parts of society, and the prerogative for the superiour orders; as they respect the publick, privileges belong to, or are granted to, the subject: prerogatives belong to the crown. It is the privilege of a member of parliament to escape arrest for debt; it is the prerogative of the crown to be irresponsible for the conduct of its ministers: as respects private cases it is the privilege of females to have the best places assigned to them; it is the prerogative of the male to address the female.

Privileges are applied to every object which it is desirable to have; 'As the aged depart from the dignity, so they forfeit the privileges of gray hairs.'—BLAIR. Prerogative is confined to the case of making one's election, or exercising any special power; 'By the worst of usurpations, a usurpation on the prerogatives of nature, you attempt to force tailors and carpenters into the state.'—BURKE. Exemption is applicable to cases in which one is exempted from any tribute, or payment; 'Neither nobility nor clergy (in France) enjoyed any exemption from the duty on consumable commodities.'—BURKE. Immunity, from the Latin munitus an office, is peculiarly applicable to cases in which one is freed from a service: but it is figuratively applied to a privileged freedom from any thing painful; 'You claim an immunity from evil which belongs not to the lot of man.'—BLAIR. All chartered towns or corporations have privileges, exemptions, and immunities: it is the privilege of the city of London to shut its gates against the king.

PRETENSION, CLAIM.

Pretension (v. To affect) and claim (v. To ask for) both signify an assertion of rights, but they differ in the nature of the rights. The first refers only to the rights which are calculated as such by an individual; the latter to those which exist independently of his supposition: there cannot therefore be a pretension without one to pretend, but there may be a claim without any immediate claimant: thus we say a person rests his pretension to the crown upon the ground of being descended from the former king; in hereditary monarchies there is no one who has any claim to the crown except the next heir in succession. The pretension is commonly built upon one's personal merits, or the views of one's own merits;

But if to unjust things thou dost pretend,
Ere they begin, let thy pretensions end.

DENHAM.

The claim rests upon the laws of civil society; 'Will he not therefore, of the two evils, choose the least, by submitting to a master who hath no immediate claim upon him, rather than to another who hath already revived several claims upon him?'—SWIFT. A person makes high pretensions who estimates his merits and consequent deserts at a high rate; he judges of his claims according as they are supported by the laws of his country or the circumstances of the case: the pretension, when denied, can never be proved; the claim, when proved, can always be enforced. One is in general willing to dispute the pretensions of men who make themselves judges in their own cause; but one is not unwilling to listen to any claims which are modestly preferred. Those who make a pretension to the greatest learning are commonly men of shallow information; 'It is often charged upon writers, that, with all their pretensions to genius and discoveries, they do little more than copy one another.'—JOHNSON. Those who have the most substantial claims to the gratitude and respect of mankind are commonly found to be men of the fewest pretensions;

Poets have undoubted right to claim,
If not the greatest, the most lasting name.

CONGREVE.

PRETENCE, PRETENSION, PRETEXT, EXCUSE.

Pretence comes from pretend (v. To affect) in the sense of setting forth any thing independent of ourselves. Pretension comes from the same verb in the sense of setting forth any thing that depends upon ourselves. The pretence is commonly a misrepresentation; the pretension is frequently a miscalculation; the pre- tence is set forth to conceal what is bad in one's self; the pretension is set forth to display what is good: the former betrays one's falsehood, the latter one's conceit or self-importance; the former can never be employed in a good sense, the latter may sometimes be employed in an indifferent sense; a man of bad character may make a pretence of religion by adopting an outward profession;

Ovid had warn'd her to beware
Of strolling gods, whose usual trade is,
Under pretence of taking air,
To pick up sublunary ladies.—SWIFT.

Men of the least merit often make the highest pretensions;

Each thinks his own the best pretension.—GAY.

The pretence and pretext alike consist of what is unreal; but the former is not so great a violation of truth as the latter: the pretence may consist of truth and falsehood blended; the pretext, from prætego to cloak or cover over, consists altogether of falsehood: the pretence may sometimes serve only to conceal or palliate a fault; the pretext serves to hide something seriously culpable or wicked: a child may make indisposition a pretence for idleness;

Let not the Trojans, with a feigned pretence
Of proffer'd peace, delude the Latian prince.

DRYDEN.

A thief makes his acquaintance with the servants a pretext for getting admittance into houses; 'Justifying perfidy and murder for publick benefit, publick benefit would soon become the pretext, and perfidy and murder the end.'—BURKE.

The pretence and excuse (v. To apologise) are both set forth to justify one's conduct in the eyes of others; but the pretence always conceals something more or less culpable, and by a greater or less violation of truth; the excuse may sometimes justify that which is justifiable, and with strict regard to truth. To oblige one's self, under the pretence of obliging another, is a despicable trick; 'I should have dressed the whole with greater care; but I had little time, which I am sure you know to be more than pretence.'—WAKE. Illness is an allowable excuse to justify any omission in business;

Nothing but love this patience could produce,
And I allow your rage that kind excuse.

DRYDEN.

Although the excuse for the most part supposes what is groundless, yet it is moreover distinguished from the pretence, that it never implies an intentional falsehood; 'The last refuge of a guilty person is to take shelter under an excuse.'—SOUTH.

TO AFFECT, PRETEND TO.

Affect is here taken in the same sense as in the following article; pretend, in Latin prætendo, that is, præ and tendo, signifies to hold or stretch one thing before another by way of a blind.

These terms are synonymous only in the bad sense of setting forth to others what is not real: we affect by putting on a false air; we pretend by making a false declaration. Art is employed in affecting; assurance and self complacency in pretending. A person affects not to hear what it is convenient for him not to answer; he pretends to have forgotten what it is convenient for him not to recollect. One affects the manners of a gentleman, and pretends to gentility of birth. One affects the character and habits of a scholar; one pretends to learning.

To affect the qualities which we have not spoils those which we have;

Self, quite put off, affects with too much art
To put on Woodward in each mangled part.

CHURCHILL

To pretend to attainments which we have not made, obliges us to have recourse to falsehoods in order to escape detection; 'There is something so natively great and good in a person that is truly devout, that an awkward man may as well pretend to be genteel as a hypocrite to be pious.'—STEELE.

* Vide Trussler "To affect, pretend to."

TO AFFECT, ASSUME.

Affect, in this sense, derives its origin immediately from the Latin affecto to desire after eagerly, signifying to aim at or aspire after; assume, in Latin assumo, compounded of as or ad and sumo to take, signifies to take to one's self.

To affect is to use forced efforts to appear to have some quality; to assume is to appropriate something to one's self. One affects to have fine feelings, and assumes great importance.

Affectation springs from the desire of appearing better than we really are; assumption from the thinking ourselves better than we really are. We affect the virtues which we have not: 'It has been from age to age an affectation to love the pleasures of solitude, among those who cannot possibly be supposed qualified for passing life in that manner.'—SPECTATOR. We assume the character which does not belong to us;

Laughs not the heart when giants, big with pride,
Assume the pompous port, the martial part?

CHURCHILL.

An affected person is always thinking of others; an assuming person thinks only of himself. The affected man strives to gain applause by appearing to be what he is not; the assuming man demands respect upon the ground of what he supposes himself to be. Hypocrisy is often the companion of affectation; self-conceit always that of assumption.

To affect is mostly taken in a bad sense, but sometimes in an indifferent sense; to assume may be sometimes an indifferent action at least, if not justifiable. Men always affect that which is admired by others, in order to gain their applause; 'In conversation the medium is neither to affect silence nor eloquence.'—STERNE. Men sometimes assume an appearance, a name, or an authority, which is no more than their just right;

This when the various god had urg'd in vain,
He strait assum'd his native form again.—POPE.

TO APPROPRIATE, USURP, ARROGATE, ASSUME, ASCRIBE.

Appropriate, in French approprier, compounded of ap or ad and propriatus, participle of proprio, an old verb, from proprius proper or own, signifies to make one's own: usurp, in French usurper, Latin usurpo, from usus use, is a frequentative of utor, signifying to make use of as if it were one's own; arrogate, in Latin arrogatus, participle of arrogare, signifies to ask or claim to for one's self; assume, in French assumer, Latin assumo, compounded of as or ad and sumo to take, signifies to take to one's self; ascribe, in Latin ascribo, compounded of as or ad and scribo to write, signifies here to write down to one's own account.

The idea of taking something to one's self by an act of one's own, is common to all these terms.

To appropriate is to take to one's self either with or without right; to usurp is to take to one's self by violence, or in violation of right. Appropriating is applied in its proper sense to goods or possessions;

To themselves appropriating

The spirit of God, promis'd alike, and giv'n
To all believers.—MILTON.

Usurping is properly applied to power, publick or private; a usurper exercises the functions of government without a legitimate sanction; 'Not having the natural superiority of fathers, their power must be usurped, and then unlawful; or if lawful, then granted or consented unto by them over whom they exercise the same, or else given them extraordinarily from God.'—HOOKER. Appropriation is a matter of convenience; it springs from a selfish concern for ourselves, and a total unconcern for others: usurpation is a matter of self-indulgence; it springs from an inordinate ambition that is gratified only at the expense of others. Appropriation seldom requires an effort: a person appropriates that which casually falls into his hands. Usurpation mostly takes place in a disorganized state of society; when the strongest prevail, the most artful and the most vicious individual invests himself with the supreme authority. Appropriation is generally an act of injustice: usurpation is always an act of violence. To usurp is applied figuratively in the same sense; 'If any passion has so much usurped our understanding, as not to suffer us to enjoy advantages with the moderation prescribed by reason, it is not too late to apply this remedy: when we find ourselves sinking under sorrow, we may then usefully revolve the uncertainty of our condition, and the folly of lamenting that from which, if it had staid a little longer, we should ourselves have been taken away.'—JOHNSON. To appropriate may be applied in the sense of assigning to others their own, as well as taking to one's self; 'Things sanctified were thereby in such sort appropriated unto God, as that they might never afterward be made common.'—HOOKER. But in this sense it has nothing in common with the word usurp.

Arrogate, assume, and ascribe, denote the taking to one's self, but do not, like appropriate and usurp, imply taking from another. Arrogate is a more violent action than assume, and assume than ascribe. Arrogate and assume are employed either in the proper or figurative sense, ascribe only in the figurative sense. We arrogate distinctions, honours, and titles; we assume names, rights, privileges.

In the moral sense we arrogate pre-eminence, assume importance, ascribe merit. To arrogate is a species of moral usurpation; it is always accompanied with haughtiness and contempt for others: that is arrogated to one's self to which one has not the smallest title: an arrogant temper is one of the most odious features in the human character; it is a compound of folly and insolence; 'After having thus ascribed due honour to birth and parentage, I must however take notice of those who arrogate to themselves more honours than are due to them on this account.'—ADDISON. To assume is a species of moral appropriation; its objects are of a less serious nature than those of arrogating; and it does less violence to moral propriety: we assume in trifles, we arrogate only in important matters; 'It very seldom happens that a man is slow enough in assuming the character of a husband, or a woman quick enough in condescending to that of a wife.'—ADDISON. To ascribe is oftener an act of vanity than of injustice: many men are entitled to the merit which they ascribe to themselves; but by this very act they lessen the merit of their best actions; 'Sometimes we ascribe to ourselves the merit of good qualities, which, if justly considered, should cover us with shame.'—CRAIG. A conscientious man will appropriate nothing to himself which he cannot unquestionably claim as his own; 'A voice was heard from the clouds declaring the intention of this visit, which was to restore and appropriate to every one what was his due.'—ADDISON.

Usurpers, who violate the laws both of God and man, are as much to be pitied as dreaded: they generally pay the price of their crimes in a miserable life, and a still more miserable death. Nothing exposes a man to greater ridicule than arrogating to himself titles and distinctions which do not belong to him. Although a man may sometimes innocently assume to himself the right of judging for others, yet he can never, with any degree of justice, assume the right of oppressing them. Self-conceit leads many to ascribe great merit to themselves for things which are generally regarded as trifling.

Arrogating as an action, or arrogance as a disposition, is always taken in a bad sense: the former is always dictated by the most preposterous pride; the latter is associated with every unworthy quality. Assumption, as an action, varies in its character according to circumstances; it may be either good, bad, or indifferent: it is justifiable in certain exigencies to assume a command where there is no one else able to direct: it is often a matter of indifference what name a person assumes who does so only in conformity to the will of another; but it is always bad to assume a name as a mask to impose upon others.

As a disposition assumption is always bad, but still not to the same degree as arrogance. An arrogant man renders himself intolerable to society; an assuming man makes himself offensive: arrogance is the characteristic of men; assumption is peculiar to youths: an arrogant man can be humbled only by silent contempt; 'Humility is expressed by the stooping and bending of the head; arrogance when it is lifted up, or, as we say, tossed up.'—DRYDEN. An assuming youth must be checked by the voice of authority; 'This makes him over-forward in business, assuming in conversation, and peremptory in answers.'—COLLIER.

ARROGANCE, PRESUMPTION.

Arrogance signifies either the act of arrogating or the disposition to arrogate; presumption, from presume. Latin presumo, compounded of præ before, and sumo to take or put, signifies the disposition to put one's self forward.

Arrogance is the act of the great; presumption that of the little: the arrogant man takes upon himself to be above others; 'I must confess I was very much surprised to see so great a body of editors, critics, commentators, and grammarians, meet with so very ill a reception. They had formed themselves into a body, and with a great deal of arrogance demanded the first station in the column of knowledge; but the goddess, instead of complying with their request, clapped them into liveries.'—ADDISON. The presumptuous man strives to be on a level with those who are above him; 'In the vanity and presumption of youth, it is common to allege the consciousness of innocence as a reason for the contempt of censure.'—HAWKESWORTH. Arrogance is commonly coupled with haughtiness: presumption with meanness: men arrogantly demand as a right the homage which has perhaps before been voluntarily granted; the creature presumptuously arraigns the conduct of the Creator, and murmurs against the dispensations of his providence.

TO APPROPRIATE, IMPROPRIATE.

To appropriate (v. To appropriate) is to consign to some particular use;

Some they appropriated to the gods,
And some to publick, some to private ends.

ROSCOMMON.

But in a more particular manner to take to one's own private use; 'Why should people engross and appropriate the common benefits of fire, air, and water to themselves.'—L'ESTRANGE. To impropriate is in some cases used in this latter sense; 'For the pardon of the rest, the king thought it not fit it should pass by Parliament; the better, being matter of grace, to impropriate the thanks to himself.'—BACON. But for the most part this word has been employed to denote the lawless appropriation of the church lands by the laity, which took place at the Reformation; 'Those impropriate livings, which have now no settled endowment, and are therefore called not vicarages, but perpetual or sometimes arbitrary curacies; they are such, as belonged formerly to those orders who could serve the cure of them in their own persons.'—WHARTON.

PRELUDE, PREFACE.

Prelude, from the Latin præ before and ludo to play, signifies the game that precedes another; preface, from the Latin for to speak, signifies the speech that precedes.

The idea of a preparatory introduction is included in both these terms, but the former consists of actions; the latter of words; the throwing of stones and breaking of windows is the prelude on the part of a mob to a general riot; 'At this time there was a general peace all over the world, which was a proper prelude for ushering in his coming who was the Prince of peace.'—PRIDEAUX. An apology for one's ill-behaviour is sometimes the preface to soliciting a remission of punishment;

As no delay
Of preface brooking through his zeal of right.
MILTON.

The prelude is mostly preparatory to that which is in itself actually bad: the preface is mostly preparatory to something supposed to be objectionable. Intemperance in liquor is the prelude to every other extravagance; when one wishes to ensure compliance with a request that may possibly be unreasonable, it is necessary to pave the way by some suitable preface.

TO PREMISE, PRESUME.

Premise, from præ and mitto, signifies set down beforehand; presume, from præ and sumo to take, signifies to take beforehand.

Both these terms are employed in regard to our previous assertions or admissions of any circumstance; the former is used for what is theoretical or belongs to opinions; the latter is used for what is practical or belongs to facts: we promise that the existence of a Deity is unquestionable when we argue respecting his attributes; 'Here we must first promise what it is to enter into temptation.'—SOUTH. We presume that a person has a firm belief in divine revelation when we exhort him to follow the precepts of the Gospel; 'In the long Iambic metre, it does not appear that Chaucer ever composed at all; for I presume no one can imagine that he was the author of Gamelyn.'—TRAWHITT. No argument can be pursued until we have promised those points upon which both parties are to agree: we must be careful not to presume upon more than what we are fully authorized to take for certain.

PECULIAR, APPROPRIATE, PARTICULAR.

Peculiar, in Latin peculiaris, comes from pecus cattle, that is, the cattle which belonged to the slave or servant, in distinction from the master; and the epithet, therefore, designates in a strong manner private property, belonging exclusively to one's self; appropriate signifies appropriated (v. To ascribe); particular (v. Particular).

Peculiar is said of that which belongs to persons or things; appropriate is said of that which belongs to things only: the faculty of speech is peculiar to man, in distinction from all other animals; 'I agree with Sir William Temple, but not that the thing itself is peculiar to the English, because the contrary may be found in many Spanish, Italian, and French productions.'—SWIFT. An address may be appropriate to the circumstances of the individual who makes it; 'Modesty and diffidence, gentleness and meekness, were looked upon as the appropriate virtues of the sex.'—JOHNSON. Peculiar designates simple property; appropriate designates the right of propriety; there are advantages and disadvantages peculiar to every situation; the excellence of a discourse depends often on its being appropriate to the season. Peculiar and particular are both employed to distinguish objects; but the former distinguishes the object by showing its connexion with, or alliance to, others; particular distinguishes it by a reference to some acknowledged circumstance; hence we may say that a person enjoys peculiar privileges or particular privileges: in this case peculiar signifies such as are confined to him, and enjoyed by none else;

Great father Bacchus, to my song repair,
For clust'ring grapes are thy peculiar care.

DRYDEN.

Particular signifies such as are distinguished in degree and quality from others of the kind; 'This is true of actions considered in their general nature or kind, but not considered in their particular individual instances.'—SOUTH.

TO ASCRIBE, ATTRIBUTE, IMPUTE.

Ascribe signifies the same as in the article under To appropriate, Usurp; attribute, in Latin attributus, participle of attribuo, compounded of ad and tribuo, signifies to bestow upon, or attach to a thing what belongs to it; impute, compounded of im or in and pute, Latin puto to think, signifies to think or judge what is in a thing.

To ascribe is to assign any thing to a person as his property, his possession, or the fruit of his labour, &c.; to attribute is to assign things to others as their causes; to impute is to assign qualities to persons. Milton ascribes the first use of artillery to the rebel angels; the loss of a vessel is attributed to the violence of the storm; the conduct of the captain is imputed to his want of firmness. The letters of Junius have been falsely ascribed to many persons in succession, as the author to this day remains concealed, and out of the reach of even probable conjecture; the oracles of the heathens are ascribed by some theologians to the devil; 'Holiness is ascribed to the pope; majesty to kings; serenity or mildness to princes; excellence or perfection to ambassadors; grace to archbishops; honour to peers.'—ADDISON. The death of Alexander the Great is attributed to his intemperance; generosity has been imputed to him from his conduct on certain occasions, but particularly in his treatment of the Persian princesses, the relatives of Darius; 'Perhaps it may appear upon examination that the most polite ages are the least virtuous. This may be attributed to the folly of admitting wit and learning as merit in themselves, without considering the application of them.'—STEELE. 'Men in their innovations should follow the example of time, which innovateth, but quietly, and by degrees scarce to be perceived, for otherwise what is new and unlooked for, ever mends some and impairs others; and he that is hurt for a wrong imputeth it to the author.'—BACON.

Ascribe is mostly used in a favourable or indifferent sense; impute is either favourable or unfavourable. In the doxology of the church ritual, all honour, might, majesty, dominion, and power, are ascribed to the three persons in the Holy Trinity: the actions of men are often so equivocal that it is difficult to decide whether praise or blame ought to be imputed to them; 'I made it by your persuasion, to satisfy those who imputed it to folly.'—TEMPLE. 'We who are adepts in astrology can impute it to several causes in the planets, that this quarter of our great city is the region of such as either never had, or have lost, the use of reason.'—STEELE.

QUALITY, PROPERTY, ATTRIBUTE.

Quality, in Latin qualitas, from qualis such, signifies such as a thing really is; property, which is changed from propriety and proprius proper or one's own, signifies belonging to a thing as an essential ingredient; attribute, in Latin attributus, participle of attribuo to bestow upon, signifies the things bestowed upon or assigned to another.

The quality is that which is inherent in the object and co-existent; 'Humility and patience, industry and temperance, are very often the good qualities of a poor man.'—ADDISON. The property is that which belongs to it for the time being; 'No man can have sunk so far into stupidity, as not to consider the properties of the ground on which he walks, of the plants on which he feeds, or of the animals that delight his ear.'—JOHNSON. The attribute is the quality which is assigned to any object;

Man o'er a wider field extends his views,
God through the wonder of his works pursues,
Exploring thence his attributes and laws,
Adores, loves, imitates, th' Eternal Cause.

JENYNS.

We cannot alter the quality of a thing without altering the whole thing; but we may give or take away properties from bodies at pleasure, without entirely destroying their identity; and we may ascribe attributes at discretion.

PRESUMPTIVE, PRESUMPTUOUS, PRESUMING.

Presumptive comes from presume, in the sense of supposing or taking for granted; presumptuous, presuming (v. Arrogance), come from the same verb in the sense of taking upon one's self, or taking to one's self any importance: the former is therefore employed in an indifferent, the latter in a bad acception: a presumptive heir is one presumed or expected to be heir; presumptive evidence is evidence founded on some presumption or supposition; so likewise presumptive reasoning; 'There is no qualification for government but virtue and wisdom, actual or presumptive.'—BURKE. A presumptuous man, a presumptuous thought, a presumptuous behaviour, all indicate an unauthorized presumption in one's own favour; 'See what is got by those presumptuous principles which have brought your leaders (of the revolution) to despise all their predecessors.'—BURKE. Presumptuous is a stronger term than presuming, because it has a more definite use; the former designates the express quality of presumption, the latter the inclination; a man is presumptuous when his conduct partakes of the nature of presumption; he is presuming inasmuch as he shows himself disposed to presume: hence we speak of a presumptuous language, not a presuming language; a presuming temper, not a presumptuous temper. In like manner when one says it is presumptuous in a man to do any thing, this expresses the idea of presumption much more forcibly than to say it is presuming in him to do it. It would be presumptuous in a man to address a monarch in the language of familiarity and disrespect; it is presuming in a common person to address any one who is superior in station with familiarity and disrespect.

TO DENY, REFUSE.

Deny, in Latin denigo, or nego, that is, ne or non and ago, signifies to say no to a thing; refuse, in Latin refusus, from re and fundo to pour, signifies to throw back that which is presented.

To deny respects matters of fact or knowledge; to refuse matters of wish or request. We deny what immediately belongs to ourselves; we refuse what belongs to another. We deny as to the past; we refuse as to the future: we deny our participation in that which has been; we refuse our participation in that which may be: to deny must always be expressly verbal; a refusal may sometimes be signified by actions or looks as well as words. A denial affects our veracity; a refusal affects our good-nature.

To deny is likewise sometimes used in regard to one's own gratifications as well as to one's knowledge, in which case it is still more analogous to refuse, which regards the gratifications of another. In this case we say we deny a person a thing, but we refuse his request, or refuse to do a thing;

Jove to his Thetis nothing could deny,
Nor was the signal vain that shook the sky.

POPE.

O sire of Gods and men! Thy suppliant hear;
Refuse or grant; for what has Jove to fear?

POPE.

Some Christians think it very meritorious to deny themselves their usual quantity of food at certain times; they are however but sorry professors of Christianity if they refuse at the same time to give of their substance to the poor. Instances are not rare of misers who have denied themselves the common necessities of life, and yet have never refused to relieve those who were in distress, or assist those who were in trouble.

Deny is sometimes the act of unconscious agents; refuse is always a personal and intentional act. We are sometimes denied by circumstances the consolation of seeing our friends before they die;

Inquire you how these pow'rs we shall attain?
'T is not for us to know; our search is vain;
Can any one remember or relate
How he existed in the embryo state?
That light's deny'd to him which others see,
He knows perhaps you 'll say—and so do we

JENYNS

TO REFUSE, DECLINE, REJECT, REPEL, REBUFF.

Refuse signifies, as in the preceding article, simply to pour, that is, to send back, which is the common idea of all these terms; to decline, in Latin declino, is literally to turn aside; to reject, from facto to throw, is to cast back; repel, from pello to drive, to drive back; to rebuff, from buff or puff, signifies to puff one back, send off with a puff.

Refuse is an unqualified action, it is accompanied with no expression of opinion; decline is a gentle and indirect mode of refusal; reject is a direct mode, and conveys a positive sentiment of disapprobation: we refuse what is asked of us, for want of inclination to comply;

But all her arts are still employ'd in vain;
Again she comes, and is refus'd again.

DRYDEN.

We decline what is proposed from motives of discretion; 'Melissa, though she could not boast the apathy of Cato, wanted not the more prudent virtue of Scipio, and gained the victory by declining the contest.'—JOHNSON. We reject what is offered to us, because it does not fall in with our views;

Why should he then reject a suit so just?—DRYDEN.

We refuse to listen to the suggestions of our friends. 'Having most affectionately set life and death before them, and conjured them to choose one and avoid the other, he still leaves unto them, as to free and rational agents, a liberty to refuse all his calls, to let his talents lie by them unprofitable.'—HAMMOND We decline and offer of service; 'Could Caroline have been captivated with the glories of this world, she had them all laid before her; but she generously declined them, because she saw the acceptance of them was inconsistent with religion.'—ADDISON. We reject the insinuations of the interested and evil-minded; 'Whether it be a divine revelation or no, reason must judge, which can never permit the mind to reject a greater evidence, to embrace what is less evident.'—LOCKE. To refuse is properly the act of an individual; to reject is said of that which comes from any quarter: requests and petitions are refused by those who are solicited; opinions, propositions, and counsels, are rejected by particular communities: the king refuses to give his assent to a bill; 'If he should choose the right casket, you should refuse to perform his father's will, if you should refuse to accept him.'—SHAKESPEARE. The parliament rejects a bill; 'The House was then so far from being possessed with that spirit, that the utmost that could be obtained, upon a long debate upon that petition (for the total extirpation of episcopacy) was, that it should not be rejected.'—CLARENDON.

To repel is to reject with violence; to rebuff is to refuse with contempt. We refuse and reject that which is either offered, or simply presents itself, for acceptance: but we repel and rebuff that which forces itself into our presence, contrary to our inclination: we repel the attack of an enemy, or we repel the advances of one who is not agreeable;

Th' unwearied watch their listening leaders keep,
And, couching close, repel invading sleep.—POPE.

We rebuff those who put that in our way that is offensive. Importunate persons must necessarily expect to meet with rebuffs, and are in general less susceptible of them than others; delicate minds feel a refusal as a rebuff;

At length rebuff'd, they leave their mangled prey
DREYDEN.

TO TAKE, RECEIVE, ACCEPT.

To take, which in all probability comes from the Latin tactum, participle of tango to touch, is a general term; receive, from re and capio to take back, and accept, from ac or ad and capio to take to one's self, are specific.

To take signifies to make one's own by coming in exclusive contact with it; to receive is to take under peculiar circumstances. We take either from things or persons; we receive from persons only: we take a book from the table; we receive a parcel which is sent us: we take either with or without the consent of the person; we receive it with his consent, or according to his wishes;

Each takes his seat, and each receives his share.
POPE.

A robber takes money when he can find it; a friend receives the gift of a friend.

To receive is an act of right, we receive what is our own; to accept is an act of courtesy, we accept what is offered by another. To receive simply excludes the idea of refusal; to accept includes the idea of consent: we may receive with indifference or reluctance; but we accept with willingness: the idea of receiving is included in that of accepting, but not vice versa: what we receive may either involve an obligation or not; what we accept always involves the return of like courtesy at least: he who receives a debt is under no obligation, but he who receives a favour is bound by gratitude;

The sweetest cordia we receive at last
Is conscience of our virtuous actions past.

DENHAM.

He who accepts a present will feel himself called upon to make some return;

Unransom'd here receive the spotless fair,
Accept the hecatomb the Greeks prepare.—POPE

RECEIPT, RECEPTION.

Receipt comes from receive, in its application to inanimate objects, which are taken into possession; reception comes from the same verb, in the sense of treating persons at their first arrival: in the commercial intercourse of men, the receipt of goods or money must be acknowledged in writing; 'If a man will keep but of even hand, his ordinary expenses ought to be but to half of his receipts.'—BACON. In the friendly intercourse of men, their reception of each other will be polite or cold, according to the sentiments entertained towards the individual; 'I thank you and Mrs. Pope for my kind reception.'—ATTERBURY.

TO CHOOSE, PREFER

Choose, in French choisir, German kiesen from the French cher, Celtic choe dear or good, signifies to hold good; prefer, in French preferer, Latin præfero, compounded of præ and fero to take before, signifies to take one thing rather than another.

* To choose is to prefer as the genus to the species: we always choose in preferring, but we do not always prefer in choosing. To choose is to take one thing from among others; to prefer is to take one thing before or rather than another. We sometimes choose from the bare necessity of choosing; but we never prefer without making a positive and voluntary choice.

When we choose from a specific motive, the acts of choosing and preferring differ in the nature of the motive. The former is absolute, the latter relative. We choose a thing for what it is, or what we esteem it to be of itself; we prefer a thing for what it has, or what we suppose it has, superior to another; 'Judgement was wearied with the perplexity of choice where there was no motive for preference.'—JOHNSON.

Utility and convenience are grounds for choosing; comparative merit occasions the preference: we choose something that is good, and are contented with it until we see something better which we prefer.

We calculate and pause in choosing; we decide in preferring; the judgement determines in making the choice; it will determine in giving the preference. We choose things from an estimate of their merits or their fitness for the purpose proposed; we prefer them from their accordance with our tastes, habits, and pursuits. Books are chosen by those who wish to read; romances and works of fiction are preferred by general readers; learned works by the scholar.

One who wants instruction chooses a master, but he will mostly prefer a teacher whom he knows to a perfect stranger. Our choice is good or bad according to our knowledge; our preference is just or unjust, according as it is sanctioned by reason.

Our choice may be directed by our own experience or that of others; our preference must be guided by our own feelings. We make our choice; we give our preference: the first is the settled purpose of the mind, it fixes on the object; the latter is the inclining of the will, it yields to the object.

Choosing must be employed in all the important concerns of life; 'There is nothing of so great importance to us, as the good qualities of one to whom we join ourselves for life. When the choice is left to friends, the chief point under consideration is an estate; where the parties choose for themselves, their thoughts turn most upon the person.'—ADDISON. Preferring is admissible in subordinate matters only: 'When a man has a mind to venture his money in a lottery, every figure of it appears equally alluring; and no manner of reason can be given why a man should prefer one to the other before the lottery is drawn.'—ADDISON. There is but one thing that is right, and that ought to be chosen when it is discovered: there are many indifferent things that may suit our tastes and inclinations; these we are at liberty to prefer. But to prefer what we ought not to choose is to make our reason bend to our will. Our Saviour said of Mary that she chose the better part: had she consulted her feelings she would have preferred the part she had rejected. The path of life should be chosen; but the path to be taken in a walk may be preferred. It is advisable for a youth in the choice of a profession to consult what he prefers, as he has the greatest chance of succeeding when he can combine his pleasure with his duty. A friend should be chosen: a companion may be preferred. A wife should be chosen; but unfortunately lovers are most apt to give a preference in a matter where a good or bad choice may determine one's happiness or misery for life. A wise prince is careful in the choice of his ministers; but a weak prince has mostly favourites whom he prefers.

* The Abbe Girard, under the article choisir, preferer, has reversed this rule; but as I conceive, from a confusion of thought, which pervades the whole of his illustration on these words. The Abbe Roubaud has controverted his positions with some degree of accuracy. I have, however, given my own view of the matter in distinction from either.

TO CHOOSE, PICK, SELECT.

Choose signifies the same as in the preceding article; pick, in German picken, or bicken, French bicquer, Dutch becken, Icelandic picka, Swedish piacka, comes very probably from the old German bag, bich, to stick, corresponding to the Latin figo to fix, signifying to fix upon; select, Latin selectus, participle of seligo, that is, lego to gather or put, and se apart.

Choose is as in the former case the generic; the others are specific terms: pick and select are expressly different modes of choosing. We always choose when we pick and select; but we do not always pick and select when we choose.

To choose may be applied to two or more things; to pick and select can be used only for several things. We may choose one book out of two, but we pick and select out of a library or a parcel; pick may be said of one or many; select only of many.

To choose does not always spring from any particular design or preference; 'My friend, Sir Roger, being a good churchman, has beautified the inside of his church with several texts of his own choosing.'—ADDISON. To pick and select signify to choose with care. What is picked and selected is always the best of its kind, but the former is commonly something of a physical nature; the latter of a moral or intellectual description. Soldiers are sometimes picked to form a particular regiment; 'I know, by several experiments, that those little animals (the ants) take great care to provide themselves with wheat when they can find it, and always pick out the best.'—ADDISON. Pieces are selected in prose or verse for general purposes; 'The chief advantage which these fictions have over real life is, that their authors are at liberty, though not to invent, yet to select objects.'—JOHNSON.

TO CHOOSE, ELECT.

Both these terms are employed in regard to persons appointed to an office; the former in a general, the latter in a particular sense.

Choosing (v. To choose, prefer) is either the act of one man or of many; election, from eligo, or e and lego, signifying to take or gather out of or from, is always that of a number; it is performed by the concurrence of many voices.

A prince chooses his ministers; the constituents elect members of parliament. A person is chosen to serve the office of sheriff; he is elected by the corporation to be mayor.

Choosing is an act of authority; it binds the person chosen: election is a voluntary act; the elected have the power of refusal. People are obliged to serve in some offices when they are chosen, although they would gladly be exempt;

Wise were the kings who never chose a friend,
Till with full cups they had unmask'd his soul,
And seen the bottom of his deepest thoughts.

ROSCOMMON.

The circumstance of being elected is an honour after which men eagerly aspire; and for the attainment of which they risk their property, and use the most strenuous exertions; 'This prince, in gratitude to the people, by whose consent he was chosen, elected a hundred senators out of the commoners.'—SWIFT.

ELIGIBLE, PREFERABLE.

Eligible, or fit to be elected, and preferable, fit to be preferred, serve as epithets in the sense of choose and prefer (v. To choose, prefer); what is eligible is desirable in itself, what is preferable is more desirable than another. There may be many eligible situations, out of which perhaps there is but one preferable. Of persons however we say rather that they are eligible to an office than preferable; 'The middle condition is the most eligible to the man who would improve himself in virtue.'—ADDISON. The saying of Plato is, that labour is as preferable to idleness as brightness to rust!—HUGHES.

OPTION, CHOICE.

Option is immediately of Latin derivation, and is consequently a term of less frequent use than the word choice, which has been shown (v. To choose) to be of Celtic origin. The former term, from the Greek ὀπταί to see or consider, implies an uncontrolled act of the mind; the latter a simple leaning of the will. We speak of option only as regards one's freedom from external constraint in the act of choosing: one speaks of choice only as the simple act itself. The option or the power of choosing is given; the choice itself is made: hence we say a thing is at a person's option, or it is his own option, or the option is left to him, in order to designate his freedom of choice more strongly than is expressed by the word choice itself; 'While they talk we must make our choice, they or the Jacobins. We have no other option.'—BUREAU.

TO GATHER, COLLECT.

To gather, in Saxon gatharian, probably contracted from get here, signifies simply to bring to one spot. To collect, from colligo or col, cum, and lego to gather into one place, annexes also the idea of binding or forming into a whole; we gather that which is scattered in different parts: thus stones are gathered into a heap; vessels are collected so as to form a fleet. Gathering is a mere act of necessity or convenience;

As the small ant (for she instructs the man,
And preaches labour) gathers all she can,

CREECH.

Collecting is an act of design or choice;

The royal bee, queen of the rosy bower,
Collects her precious sweets from every flower
C. JOHNSON.

We gather apples from a tree, or a servant gathers the books from the table; the antiquarian collects coins, or the bibliomaniac collects rare books.

ACCEPTABLE, GRATEFUL, WELCOME.

Acceptable signifies worthy to be accepted; grateful, from the Latin gratus pleasing, signifies altogether pleasing; it is that which recommends itself. The acceptable is a relative good; the grateful is positive: the former depends upon our external condition, the latter on our feelings and taste: a gift is acceptable to a poor man, which would be refused by one less needy than himself; 'I cannot but think the following letter from the Emperor of China to the Pope of Rome, proposing a coalition of the Chinese and Roman Churches, will be acceptable to the curious.'—STEELE. Harmonious sounds are always grateful to a musical ear;

The kids with pleasure browse the bushy plain:
The showers are grateful to the swelling grain

DRYDEN.

Acceptable and welcome both apply to external circumstances, and are therefore relatively employed; but acceptable is confined to such things as are offered for our choice; but welcome, signifying come well or in season, refers to whatever happens according to our wishes: we may not always accept that which is acceptable, but we shall never reject that which is welcome: it is an insult to offer any thing by way of a gift to another which is not acceptable; it is a grateful task to be the bearer of welcome intelligence to our friends; 'Whatever is remote from common appearances is always welcome to vulgar as to childish crudity.'—JOHNSON

ACCEPTANCE, ACCEPTATION.

Though both derived from the verb accept, have this difference, that the former is employed to express the abstract action generally; the latter only in regard to particular objects. A book, or whatever else is offered to us, may be worthy of our acceptance or not; 'It is not necessary to refuse benefits from a bad man, when the acceptance implies no approbation of his crimes.'—JOHNSON. A word acquires its acceptation from the manner in which it is generally accepted by the learned; 'On the subject of dress I may add by way of caution that the ladies would do well not to forget themselves. I do not mean this in the common acceptation of the phrase, which it may be sometimes convenient and proper to do.'—MACKENZIE.

TO ADMIT,* RECEIVE.

Admit, in French admettre, Latin admitto, compounded of ad and mitto, signifies to send or suffer to pass into; receive, in French recevoir, Latin recipio, compounded of re and capio, signifies to take back or to one's self.

To admit is a general term, the sense of which depends upon what follows; to receive has a complete sense in itself: we cannot speak of admitting, without associating with it an idea of the object to which one is admitted; but receive includes no relative idea of the receiver or the received.

Admitting is an act of relative import; receiving is always a positive measure: a person may be admitted into a house, who is not prevented from entering;

Somewhat is sure design'd by fraud or force;
Trust not their presents, nor admit the horse.

DRYDEN.

A person is received only by the actual consent of some individual;

He star'd and roll'd his baggard eyes around;
Then said, 'Alas! what earth remains, what sea
Is open to receive unhappy me?'—DRYDEN.

We may be admitted in various capacities; we are received only as guests, friends, or inmates. Persons are admitted to the tables, and into the familiarity or confidence of others;

The Tyrian train, admitted to the feast,
Approach, and on the painted couches rest.

DRYDEN.

Persons are hospitably received by those who wish to be their entertainers;

Pretending to consult
About the great reception of their king
Thither to come.—MILTON.

We admit willingly or reluctantly; we receive politely or rudely. Foreign ambassadors are admitted to an audience, and received at court. It is necessary to be cautious not to admit any one into our society, who may not be agreeable and suitable companions; but still more necessary not to receive any one into our houses whose character may reflect disgrace on ourselves.

Whoever is admitted as a member of any community should consider himself as bound to conform to its regulations: whoever is received into the service of another should study to make himself valued and esteemed. A winning address, and agreeable manners, gain a person admittance into the genteel circles: the talent for affording amusement, procures a person a good reception among the mass of mankind.

When applied to unconscious agents there is a similar distinction between these terms: ideas are admitted into the mind by means of association and the like; 'There are some ideas which have admittance only through one sense, which is peculiarly adapted to receive them.'—LOCKE. Things are received by others in consequence of their adaptation to each other;

The thin-leav'd arbuté hazel-grafts receives,
And planes huge apples bare, that bore but leaves.

DRYDEN.

ADMITTANCE, ACCESS, APPROACH.

Admittance marks the act or liberty of admitting (v. To admit, receive); access, from accedo to approach or come up to, marks the act or liberty of approaching; approach, from ap or ad and proximus nearest, signifies coming near or drawing near.

We get admittance into a place or a society; we have access to a person; and make an approach either towards a person or a thing.

* Girard: "Amettre, recevoir."

Admittance may be open or excluded; access and approach may be free or difficult.

We have admittance when we enter; we have access to him whom we address. There can be no access where there is no admittance; but there may be admittance without access. Servants or officers may grant us admittance into the palaces of princes; 'As my pleasures are almost wholly confined to those of the sight, I take it for a peculiar happiness that I have always had an easy and familiar admittance to the fair sex.'—STEELE. The favourites of princes have access to their persons; 'Do not be surprised, most holy father, at seeing, instead of a coxcomb to laugh at, your old friend who has taken this way of access to admonish you of your own folly.'—STEELE.

Access and admittance are here considered as the acts of conscious agents; approach is as properly the act of unconscious as conscious agents. We may speak of the approach of an army, or the approach of a war;

'T is with our souls
As with our eyes, that after a long darkness
Are dazzled at th' approach of sudden light.

Admittance may likewise sometimes be taken figuratively, as when we speak of the admittance of ideas into the mind.

ADMITTANCE, ADMISSION.

These words differ according to the different acceptations of the primitive from which they are both derived: the former being taken in the proper sense or familiar style, and the latter in the figurative sense or in the grave style.

The admittance to publick places of entertainment is on particular occasions difficult; 'Assurance never failed to get admittance into the houses of the great.'—MOORE. The admission of irregularities, however trifling in the commencement, is mostly attended with serious consequences; 'The gospel has then only a free admission into the assent of the understanding, when it brings a passport from a rightly disposed will'—SOUTH.

IMPERVIOUS, IMPASSABLE, INACCESSIBLE

Impervious, from the Latin in, per, and via, signifies not having a way through; impassable, not to be passed through; inaccessible, not to be approached. A wood is impervious when the trees, branches, and leaves are entangled to such a degree as to admit of no passage at all;

The monster, Cacus, more than half a beast,
This hold impervious to the sun possess'd.

DRYDEN.

A river is impassable that is so deep that it cannot be forded.

But lest the difficulty of passing back
Stay his return perhaps over this gulf
Impassable, impervious, let us try
Advent'rous work.—MILTON.

A rock or a mountain is inaccessible the summit of which is not to be reached by any path whatever;

At least our envious foe hath fail'd who thought
All like himself rebellious, by whose aid
This inaccessible high strength, the seat
Of Deity Supreme, us disposess'd,
He trusted to have seiz'd.—MILTON.

What is impervious is for a permanency; what is impassable is commonly so only for a time: roads are frequently impassable in the winter that are passable in the summer, while a thicket is impervious during the whole of the year: impassable is likewise said only of that which is to be passed by living creatures, but impervious may be extended to inanimate objects; a wood may be impervious to the rays of the sun

TO APPROACH, APPROXIMATE.

Approach, in French approcher, compound of ap or ad and proche, or in Latin prope near, signifies to come near; approximate, compounded of ap and proximus to come nearest or next, signifies either to draw near or bring near.

To approach is intransitive only; a person approaches an object; 'Lambs push at those that approach them with their heads before the first budding of a horn appears.'—ADDISON. To approximate is both transitive and intransitive; a person approximates two objects; 'Shakspeare approximates the remote and far.'—JOHNSON.

To approach denotes simply the moving of an object towards another, but to approximate denotes the gradual moving of two objects towards each other: that which approaches may come into immediate conjunction; 'Comets, in their approaches towards the earth, are imagined to cause diseases, famines, and other such like judgements of God.'—DERHAM. But bodies may approximate for some time before they form a junction, or may never form a junction; 'The approximations and recesses of some of the little stars I speak of, suit not with the observations of some very ancient astronomers.'—DERHAM. An equivocation approaches to a lie. Minds approximate by long intercourse.

TO HOLD, KEEP, DETAIN, RETAIN.

Hold, in Saxon healden, Teutonic holden; is probably connected with the verb to have, in Latin habeo, &c.; keep in all probability comes from capio to lay hold of; detain and retain both come from the Latin teneo to hold; the first signifies, by virtue of the particle de, to hold from another; the second, by virtue of the particle re, signifies to hold back for one's self.

To hold is a physical act; it requires a degree of bodily strength, or at least the use of the limbs; to keep is simply to have by one at one's pleasure. The mode of the action is the leading idea in the signification of hold; the durability of the action is the leading idea in the word keep: we may hold a thing only for a moment: but what we keep we keep for a time. On the other hand, we may keep a thing by holding, although we may keep it by various other means: we may therefore hold without keeping, and we may keep without holding. A servant holds a thing in his hand for it to be seen, but he does not keep it; he gives it to his master who puts it into his pocket, and consequently keeps, but does not hold it. A thing may be held in the hand, or kept in the hand; in the former case, the pressure of the hand is an essential part of the action, but in the latter case it is simply a contingent part of the action: the hand holds, but the person keeps it.

What is held is fixed in position, but what is kept is left loose or otherwise, at the will of the individual. Things are held by human beings in their hands, by beasts in their claws or mouths, by birds in their beaks; things are kept by human beings either about their persons or in their houses, according to convenience;

France, thou mayst hold a serpent by the tongue,
A fasting tiger safer by the tooth,
Than keep in peace that hand which thou dost hold.

SHAKESPEARE.

Detain and retain are modes of keeping: the former signifies keeping back what belongs to another; the latter signifies keeping a long time for one's own purpose. A person may be either held, kept, detained, or retained: when he is held he is held contrary to his will by the hand of another; as suspected persons are held by the officers of justice, that they may not make their escape: he is kept, if he stops in any place, by the desire of another; as a man is kept in prison until his innocence is proved; or a child is kept at school, until he has finished his education: he is detained if he be kept away from any place to which he is going, or from any person to whom he belongs: as the servant of another is detained to take back a letter; or one is detained by business, so as to be prevented attending to an appointment: a person is retained, who is kept for a continuance in the service, the favour, or the power of another; as some servants are said to be retained while others are dismissed;

Too late it was for satyr to be told,
Or ever hope recover her again;
In vain he seeks, that having, cannot hold.

SPENSER.

That I may know what keeps you here with me.

DRYDEN.

'He has described the passion of Calypso, and the Indecent advances she made to detain him from his country.'—BROOME. 'Having the address to retain the conquest she (Roxalana) had made, she kept possession of his (Solyman's) love without any rival for many years.'—ROBERTSON.

These words bear a similar analogy to each other in an extended application. A money-lender holds the property of others in pledge; the idea of a temporary and partial action is here expressed by hold, in distinction from keep, which is used to express something definite and permanent; 'Assuredly it is more shame for a man to lose that which he holdeth, than to fail in getting that which he never had.'—HAYWARD. The money-lender keeps the property as his own, if the borrower forfeits it by breach of contract;

This charge I keep until my appointed day
Of rendering up.—MILTON.

When a person purchases any thing, he is expected to keep it, or pay the value of the thing ordered, if the tradesman fulfil his part of the engagement. What is detained is kept either contrary to the will, or without the consent, of the possessor: when things are suspected to be stolen, the officers of justice have the right of detaining them until inquiry be instituted;

Haste! goddess, haste! the flying host detain
Nor let one sail be hoisted on the main.—POPE.

What is retained is continued to be kept; it supposes, however, some alteration in the terms or circumstances under which it is kept; a person retains his seat in a coach, notwithstanding he finds it disagreeable; or a lady retains some of the articles of millinery, which are sent for her choice, but she returns the rest;

Let me retain
The name, and all th' addition to a king.

SHAKESPEARE

All are used in a moral application except detain; in this case they are marked by a similar distinction. A person is said to hold an office, by which simple possession is implied; he may hold it for a long or a short time, at the will of others, or by his own will, which are not marked; he keeps a situation, or he keeps his post, by which his continuance in the situation, or at the post, are denoted: he retains his office, by which is signified that he might have given it up, or lost it, had he not been led to continue in it. In like manner, with regard to one's sentiments, feelings, or external circumstances, a man is said to hold certain opinions, which are ascribed to him as a part of his creed; 'It is a certain sign of a wise government, when it can hold men's hearts by hopes.'—BACON. A person keeps his opinions when no one can induce him to give them up; 'The proof is best when men keep their authority towards their children, but not their purse.'—BACON. He retains his old attachments, notwithstanding the lapse of years, and change of circumstances, which have intervened, and were naturally calculated to wean him; 'Ideas are retained by renovation of that impression which time is always wearing away.'—JOHNSON.

TO HOLD, OCCUPY, POSSESS.

Hold has the same general meaning as in the preceding article; occupy, in Latin occupo, or oc and capio to hold or keep, signifies to keep so that it cannot be held by others; possess, in Latin possideo, or potis and sedeo, signifies to sit as master of.

We hold a thing for a long or a short time; we occupy it for a permanence: we hold it for ourselves or others; we occupy it only for ourselves: we hold it for various purposes; we occupy only for the purpose of converting it to our private use. Thus a person may hold an estate, or, which is the same thing, the title deeds to an estate pro tempore, for another person's benefit: but he occupies an estate if he enjoys the fruit of it. On the other hand, to occupy is only to hold under a certain compact; but to possess is to hold as one's own. The tenant occupies the farm when he holds it by a certain lease, and cultivates it for his subsistence; but the landlord possesses the farm who possesses the right to let it, and to receive the rent.

We may hold by force, or fraud, or right;

He (the eagle) drives them from his fort the towering seat,

For arcs of his empire which in peace
Unstain'd he holds.—THOMSON

We occupy either by force or right; 'If the title of occupiers be good in a land unpeopled, why should it be bad accounted in a country peopled thinly.'—RALEIGH.

We possess only by right;

But now the feather'd youth their former bounds
Ardent disdain, and weighing oft their wings,
Demand the free possession of the sky.

THOMSON.

Hence we say figuratively, to hold a person in esteem or contempt, to occupy a person's attention, to occupy a place, &c. or to possess one's affection;

I, as a stranger to my heart and me,
Hold thee from this for ever.—SHAKESPEARE.

'He must assert infinite generations before that first deluge, and then the earth could not receive them, but the infinite bodies of men must occupy an infinite space.'—BENTLEY.

Of fortune's favour long possess'd,
He was with one fair daughter only bless'd.

DRYDEN.

TO HOLD, SUPPORT, MAINTAIN.

Hold is here, as in the former article, a term of very general import; to support, from sub and porto to carry, signifying to bear the weight of a thing; and to maintain, from the French maintenir, and the Latin manus a hand, and teneo to hold, signifying to hold firmly, are particular modes of holding.

Hold and support are employed in the proper sense, maintain in the improper sense. To hold is a term unqualified by any circumstance; we may hold a thing in any direction, hold up or down, straight or crooked: support is a species of holding up; to hold up, however, is a personal act, or a direct effort of the individual; to support may be an indirect and a passive act; he who holds any thing up keeps it in an upright posture, by the exertion of his strength; he who supports a thing only bears its weight, or suffers it to rest upon himself: persons or voluntary agents can hold up; inanimate objects may support: a servant holds up a child that it may see; a pillar supports a building.

Hold, maintain, and support are likewise employed still farther in a moral application, as it respects the different opinions and circumstances of men; opinions are held and maintained as one's own; they are supported when they are another's. We hold and maintain when we believe; we support the belief or doctrine of another, or what we ourselves have asserted and maintained at a former time. What is held is held by the act of the mind within one's self; what is maintained and supported is openly declared to be held. To hold marks simply the state of one's own mind; 'It was a notable observation of a wise father, that those which held and persuaded pressure of consciences were commonly interested therein themselves for their own ends.'—BACON. To maintain indicates the effort which one makes to inform others of this state; 'If any man of quality will maintain upon Edward, Earl of Gloucester, that he is a manifold traitor, let him appear.'—SHAKESPEARE. To support indicates the efforts which one makes to justify that state. We hold an opinion only as it regards ourselves; we maintain and support it as it regards others; that is, we maintain it either with others, for others, or against others: we support it in an especial manner against others: we maintain it by assertion; we support it by argument. Bad principles do harm only to the individual when they are held; they will do harm to all over whom our influence extends when we maintain them; they may do harm to all the world, when we undertake to support them. Good principles need only be held, or at most maintained, unless where adversaries set themselves up against them, and render it necessary to support them. Infidel principles have been held occasionally by individuals in all ages, but they were never maintained with so much openness and effrontery at any time, as at the close of the eighteenth century, when supporters of such principles were to be found in every tap-room.

Hold is applied not only to principles and opinions, but also to sentiments; maintain and support are confined either to abstract and speculative opinions, or to the whole mind: we hold a thing dear or cheap, we hold it in abhorrence, or we hold it sacred, 'As Chaucer is the father of English poetry, so I hold him in the same degree of veneration as the Grecians held Homer or the Romans Virgil.'—DRYDEN. We maintain or support truth or error; we maintain an influence over ourselves, or maintain a cause;

Who then is free? The wise, who well maintains
An empire o'er himself.—FRANCIS.

We support our resolution or our minds; 'Nothing can support the minds of the guilty from drooping.'—SOUTH.

TO HAVE, POSSESS.

Have, in German haben, Latin habeo, not improbably from the Hebrew אָחַב to desire, or אָהַב he loved, because those who have most, desire most, or because men love worldly possessions above every thing else: possess has the same meaning as in the preceding article; have is the general, possess is the particular term have designates no circumstance of the action; possess expresses a particular species of having.

To have is sometimes to have in one's hand or within one's reach; but to possess is to have as one's own: a clerk has the money which he has fetched for his employer; the latter possesses the money, which he has the power of turning to his use. To have is sometimes to have the right to, to belong; to possess is to have by one and at one's command: a debtor has the property which he has surrendered to his creditor; but he cannot be said to possess it, because he has it not within his reach, and at his disposal: * we are not necessarily masters of that which we have; although we always are of that which we possess: to have is sometimes only temporary; to possess is mostly permanent: we have money which we are perpetually disposing of; we possess lands which we keep for a permanency: a person has the good graces of those whom he pleases; he possesses the confidence of those who put every thing in his power: the stoutest heart may have occasional alarms, but will never lose its self-possession: a husband has continual torments who is possessed by the demon of jealousy: a miser has goods in his coffers, but he is not master of them; they possess his heart and affections: we have things by halves when we share them with others; we possess them only when they are exclusively ours and we enjoy them undividedly;

That I spent, that I had;
That I gave, that I have;
That I left, that I lost.

EPITAPH ON A CHARITABLE MAN

A lover has the affections of his mistress by whom he is beloved; he possesses her whole heart when she loves him only: one has an interest in a mercantile concern in which he is a partner; the lord of a manor possesses all the rights annexed to that manor; 'The various objects that compose the world were by nature formed to delight our senses; and as it is this alone that makes them desirable to an uncorrupted taste, a man may be said naturally to possess them when he possesseth those enjoyments which they are fitted by nature to yield.'—BERKELEY

TO LAY OR TAKE HOLD OF, CATCH, SEIZE, SNATCH, GRASP, GRIPE.

To lay or take hold of is here the generic expression: it denotes simply getting into the possession, which is the common idea in the signification of all these terms, which differ chiefly in regard to the motion in which the action is performed. To catch is to lay hold of with an effort. To seize is to lay hold of with violence. To snatch is to lay hold of by a sudden and violent effort. One is said to lay hold of that on which he places his hand; he takes hold of that which he secures in his hand. We lay hold of any thing when we see it falling; we take hold of any thing when we wish to lift it up; 'Sometimes it happens that a corn slips out of their paws when they (the ants) are climbing up; they take hold of it again when they can find it, otherwise they look for another.'—ADDISON. We catch the thing which attempts to escape; 'One great genius

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Avoir, posséder" often catches the flame from another.'—ADDISON. We seize a thing when it makes resistance;

Furious he said, and tow'rd the Grecian crew,
(Seiz'd by the crest) th' unhappy warrior drew.
POPE.

We snatch that which we are particularly afraid of not getting otherwise;

The hungry harpies fly,
They snatch the meat, defiling all they find.
DRYDEN.

A person, who is fainting, lays hold of the first thing which comes in his way; a sick person or one that wants support takes hold of another's arm in walking; various artifices are employed to catch animals; the wild beasts of the forest seize their prey the moment they come within their reach; it is the rude sport of a schoolboy to snatch out of the hand of another that which he is not willing to let go.

To lay hold of is to get in the possession. To grasp and to gripe signify to have or keep in the possession: an eagerness to keep or not to let go is expressed by that of grasping;

Like a miser 'midst his store,
Who grasps and grasps till he can hold no more.
DRYDEN.

A fearful anxiety of losing and an earnest desire of keeping is expressed by the act of gripping;

They gripe their oaks; and every panting breast
Is rais'd by turns with hope, by turns with fear depress'd.
DRYDEN.

When a famished man lays hold of food, he grasps it, from a convulsive kind of fear lest it should leave him; when a miser lays hold of money he gripes it from the love he bears to it; and the fear he has that it will be taken from him.

OCCUPANCY, OCCUPATION,

Are words which derive their meaning from the different acceptations of the primitive verb occupy: the former being used to express the state of holding or possessing any object; the latter to express the act of taking possession of, or keeping in possession. He who has the occupancy of land enjoys the fruits of it; 'As occupancy gave the right to the temporary use of the soil; so it is agreed on all hands, that occupancy gave also the original right to the permanent property in the substance of the earth itself.'—BLACKSTONE. The occupation of a country by force of arms is of little avail, unless one has an adequate force to maintain one's ground; 'The unhappy consequences of this temperament is, that my attachment to any occupation seldom outlives its novelty.'—COWPER.

POSSESSOR, PROPRIETOR, OWNER, MASTER.

The possessor has the full power, if not the right, of the present disposal over the object of possession; 'I am convinced that a poetick talent is a blessing to its possessor.'—SEWARD. The proprietor and owner has the unlimited right of transfer, but not always the power of immediate disposal. The proprietor and the owner are the same in signification, though not in application; the first term being used principally in regard to matters of importance; the latter on familiar occasions; the proprietor of an estate is a more suitable expression than the owner of an estate;

Death! great proprietor of all! 'T is thine
'To tread out empire and to quench the stars.
YOUNG.

The owner of a book is a more becoming expression than the proprietor; 'One cause of the insufficiency of riches (to produce happiness) is, that they very seldom make their owner rich.'—JOHNSON. The possessor and the master are commonly the same person, when those things are in question which are subject to possession; but the terms are otherwise so different in their original meaning, that they can scarcely admit of comparison: the possessor of a house is naturally the master of the house; and, in general, whatever a man possesses, that he has in his power, and is consequently master of; but we may have, legally, the right of possessing a thing, over which we have actually no power of control: in this case, we are nominally possessor, but virtually not master. A minor, or insane person, may be both possessor and proprietor of that over which he has no control; a man is, therefore, on the other hand, appropriately denominated master, not possessor of his actions;

There, Cæsar, grac'd with both Min' rvas, shone,
Cæsar, the world's great master, and his own.
POPE.

TO SUSTAIN, SUPPORT, MAINTAIN.

The idea of exerting one's self to keep an object from sinking is common to all these terms, which vary either in the mode or the object of the action. To sustain, from the Latin sustineo, i. e. sus or sub and teneo to hold, signifying to hold from underneath; and support, from sub and porto to bear, signifying to bear from underneath, are passive actions, and imply that we bear the weight of something pressing upon us; maintain (v. To assert) is active, and implies that we exert ourselves so as to keep it from pressing upon us. We sustain a load; we support a burden; we maintain a contest. The principal difficulty in an engagement is often to sustain the first shock of the attack;

With labour spent, no longer can he wield
The heavy falchion, or sustain the shield,
O'erwhelm'd with darts.—DRYDEN.

A soldier has not merely to support the weight of his arms, but to maintain his post; 'Let this support and comfort you, that you are the father of ten children, among whom there seems to be but one soul of love and obedience.'—LYTTLETON. What is sustained is often temporary; what is supported is mostly permanent: a loss or an injury is sustained; pain, distress, and misfortunes, are supported; maintain, on the other hand, is mostly something of importance or advantage; credit must always be maintained;

As compass'd with a wood of spears around,
The lordly lion still maintains his ground,
So Turnus fares.—DRYDEN.

We must sustain a loss with tranquillity; we must support an affliction with equanimity; we must maintain our own honour, and that of the community to which we belong, by the rectitude of our conduct

STAFF, STAY, PROP, SUPPORT.

From staff in the literal sense (v. Staff) comes staff in the figurative application: any thing may be denominated a staff which holds up after the manner of a staff, particularly as it respects persons; bread is said to be the staff of life; one person may serve as a staff to another. The staff serves in a state of motion; 'Let shame and confusion then cover me if I do not abhor the intolerable anxiety I well understand to wait inseparably upon that staff of going about beguilefully to supplant any man.'—LORD WENTWORTH. The stay and prop are employed for objects in a state of rest: the stay makes a thing stay for the time being, it keeps it from falling; it is equally applied to persons and things; we may be a stay to a person who is falling by letting his body rest against us; in the same manner buttresses against a wall, and shores against a building, serve the purpose of a stay, while it is under repair. For the same reason that part of a female's dress which serves as a stay to the body is denominated stays; the prop keeps a thing up for a permanency; every pillar on which a building rests is a prop; whatever therefore requires to be raised from the ground, and kept in that state, may be set upon props; between the stay and the prop there is this obvious distinction, that as the stay does not receive the whole weight, it is put so as to receive it indirectly, by leaning against the object; but the prop, for a contrary reason, is put upright underneath the object so as to receive the weight directly: the derivation of this word prop, from the Dutch proppe a plug, and the German pfropfen a cork, does not seem to account very clearly for its present use in English.

Stay and prop may be figuratively extended in their application with the same distinction in their sense; a crust of bread may serve as a stay to the stomach

It hope precarious, and of things when gain'd
Of little moment, and as little stay,
Can sweeten toils and dangers into joys,
When then that hope which nothing can defeat ?
YOUNG.

A person's money may serve as a prop for the credit of another. Support is altogether taken in the moral and abstract sense: whatever supports, that is, bears the weight of an object, is a support, whether in a state of motion like a staff, or in a state of rest like a stay; whether to bear the weight in part like a stay, or altogether like a prop, it is still a support: but the term is likewise employed on all occasions in which the other terms are not admissible. Whatever supports existence, whether directly or indirectly, is a support: food is the support of the animal body; labour or any particular employment is likewise one's support, or the indirect means of gaining the support; hope is the support of the mind under the most trying circumstances; religion, as the foundation of all our hopes, is the best and surest support under affliction;

Whate'er thy many fingers can entwine,
Proves thy support and all its strength is thine,
Tho' nature gave not legs, it gave thee hands,
By which thy prop, thy prouder cedar stands.
DENHAM.

STAFF, STICK, CRUTCH

Staff, in Low German staff, &c., in Latin stipes, in Greek στυπη, comes from στυπη stipo to fix; stick signifies that which can be stuck in the ground; crutch, as changed from cross, is a staff or stick which has a cross bar at the top.

The ruling idea in a staff is that of firmness and fixedness; it is employed for leaning upon: the ruling idea in the stick is that of sharpness with which it can penetrate, it is used for walking and ordinary purposes; the ruling idea in the crutch is its form, which serves the specific purpose of support in case of lameness; a staff can never be small, but a stick may be large; a crutch is in size more of a staff than a common stick.

LIVELIHOOD, LIVING, SUBSISTENCE, MAINTENANCE, SUPPORT, SUSTENANCE.

The means of living or supporting life is the idea common to all these terms, which vary according to the circumstances of the individual and the nature of the object which constitutes the means: the livelihood is the thing sought after by the day; a labourer earns a livelihood by the sweat of his brow: living is obtained by more respectable and less severe efforts than the two former; tradesmen obtain a good living by keeping shops; artists procure a living by the exercise of their talents; 'A man may as easily know where to find one to teach to debauch, whore, game, and blasphemy, as to teach him to write or cast accounts; 'tis the very profession and livelihood of such people, getting their living by those practices for which they deserve to forfeit their lives.'—SOUTH. A subsistence is obtained by irregular efforts of various descriptions; beggars meet with so much that they obtain something better than a precarious and scanty subsistence: 'Just the necessities of a bare subsistence are not to be the only measure of a parent's care for his children.'—SOUTH. Maintenance, support, and sustenance, differ from the other three inasmuch as they do not comprehend what one gains by one's own efforts, but by the efforts of others: the maintenance is that which is permanent; it supplies the place of a living: the support may be casual, and vary in degree; the object of most public charities is to afford a maintenance to such as cannot obtain a livelihood or living for themselves; 'The Jews, in Babylonia, honoured Hyrcanus their king, and supplied him with a maintenance suitable thereto.'—PRIDEAUX. It is the business of the parish to give support, in time of sickness and distress, to all who are legal parishioners; 'If it be a curse to be forced to toil for the necessary support of life, how does he lighten the curse who toils for superfluities.'—SOUTH. The maintenance and support are always granted; but the sustenance is that which is taken or received: the former comprehends the means of obtaining food; the sustenance comprehends that which sustains the body which supplies the place of food; 'Besides, man has a claim also to a promise for his support and sustenance which none have ever missed of who come up to the conditions of it.'—SOUTH.

LIVING, BENEFICE.

Living signifies literally the pecuniary resource by which one lives; benefice, from benefacio, signifies whatever one obtains as a benefit: the former is applicable to any situation of life, but particularly to that resource which a parish affords to the clergyman; the latter is applicable to no other object: we speak of the living as a resource immediately derived from the parish, in distinction from a curacy, which is derived from an individual; 'In consequence of the Pope's interference, the best livings were filled by Italian, and other foreign, clergy.'—BLACKSTONE. We speak of a benefice in respect to the terms by which it is held, according to the ecclesiastical law: there are many livings which are not benefices, although not vice versa; 'Estates held by feudal tenure, being originally gratuitous donations, were at that time denominated beneficia; their very name, as well as constitution, was borrowed, and the care of the souls of a parish thence came to be denominated a benefice.'—BLACKSTONE.

TO BE, EXIST, SUBSIST.

Be, with its inflections, is to be traced through the northern and Oriental languages to the Hebrew היה the name of God, and נשׂה to be. From the derivation of exist, as given under the article To Exist, Live, arises the distinction in the use of the two words. To be is applicable either to the accidents of things, or to the substances or things themselves; to exist only to substances or things that stand or exist of themselves.

* We say of qualities, of forms, of actions, of arrangement, of movement, and of every different relation, whether real, ideal, or qualificative, that they are; 'He does not understand either vice or virtue who will not allow that life without the rules of morality is a wayward uneasy being.'—STEELE. We say of matter, of spirit, of body, and of all substances, that they exist; 'When the soul is freed from all corporeal alliance, then it truly exists.'—HUGHES AFTER XENOPHON. Man is man, and will be man under all circumstances and changes of life: he exists under every known climate and variety of heat or cold in the atmosphere.

Being and existence as nouns have this farther distinction, that the former is employed not only to designate the abstract state of being, but is metaphorically employed for the sensible object that is; the latter is confined altogether to the abstract sense. Hence we speak of human beings; beings animate or inanimate, the Supreme Being: but the existence of a God; existence of innumerable worlds; the existence of evil. Being may in some cases be indifferently employed for existence, particularly in the grave style: when speaking of animate objects, as the being of a God; our frail being; and when qualified in a compound form is preferable, as our well-being.

Subsist is properly a species of existing; from the Latin prepositive sub, signifying for a time, it denotes temporary or partial existence. Every thing exists by the creative and preservative power of the Almighty: that which subsists depends for its existence upon the chances and changes of this mortal life;

Forlorn of thee,
Whither shall I betake me? where subsist?
MILTON.

To exist therefore designates simply the event of being or existing; to subsist conveys the accessory ideas of the mode and duration of existing. Man exists while the vital or spiritual part of him remains; he subsists by what he obtains to support life. Friendships exist in the world, notwithstanding the prevalence of selfishness; but it cannot subsist for any length of time between individuals in whom this base temper prevails.

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Etre exister subsister"

TO BE, BECOME, GROW.

Be (v. To be, exist); become signifies to come to be, that is, to be in course of time; grow is, in all probability, changed from the Latin crevi, perfect of cresco to increase or grow.

Be (v. To be, exist) is positive; become, that is to come to be, or to be in course of time is relative: a person is what he is without regard to what he was; he becomes that which he was not before;

To be or not to be? that is the question.

SHAKESPEARE.

We judge of a man by what he is, but we cannot judge of him by what he will become: this year he is immoral and irreligious, but by the force of reflection on himself he may become the contrary in another year: 'About this time Savage's nurse, who had always treated him as her own son, died; and it was natural for him to take care of those effects which by her death were, as he imagined, become his own.'—JOHNSON.

To become includes no idea of the mode or circumstance of becoming; to grow is to become by a gradual process: a man may become a good man from a vicious one, in consequence of a sudden action on his mind; but he grows in wisdom and virtue by means of an increase in knowledge and experience;

Authors, like coins, grow dear, as they grow old.

POPE.

TO EXIST, LIVE.

Exist, in French exister, Latin existo, compounded of e or ex and sisto, signifies to place or stand by itself or of itself; live, through the medium of the Saxon libban, and the other northern dialects, comes in all probability from the Hebrew לָבַד the heart, which is the seat of animal life.

Existence is the property of all things in the universe; life, which is the inherent power of motion, is the particular property communicated by the Divine Being to some parts only of his creation: exist, therefore, is the general, and live the specific, term: whatever lives, exists according to a certain mode; but many things exist without living: when we wish to speak of things in their most abstract relation, we say they exist;

Can any now remember or relate

How he existed in an embryo state?—JENYNS.

When we wish to characterize the form of existence we say they live; 'Death to such a man is rather to be looked upon as the period of his mortality, than the end of his life.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Pliny).

Existence, in its proper sense, is the attribute which we commonly ascribe to the Divine Being, and it is that which is immediately communicable by himself; life is that mode of existence which he has made to be communicable by other objects besides himself: existence is taken only in its strict and proper sense, independent of all its attributes and appendages; but life is regarded in connexion with the means by which it is supported, as animal life, or vegetable life. In like manner, when speaking of spiritual objects, exist retains its abstract sense, and live is employed to denote an active principle: animosities should never exist in the mind; and every thing which is calculated to keep them alive should be kept at a distance.

TO OUTLIVE, SURVIVE.

To outlive is literally to live out the life of another, to live longer: to survive, in French survivre, is to live after: the former is employed to express the comparison between two lives; the latter to denote a protracted existence beyond any given term: one person is said properly to outlive another who enjoys a longer life; but we speak of surviving persons or things, in an indefinite or unqualified manner: it is not a peculiar blessing to outlive all our nearest relatives and friends; 'A man never outlives his conscience, and that for this cause only, he cannot outlive himself.'—SOUTH. No man can be happy in surviving his honour; 'Of so vast, so lasting, so surviving an extent is the malignity of a great guilt.'—SOUTH.

TO DELIVER, RESCUE, SAVE.

To deliver, in French delivrer, compounded of de and livrer, in Latin libera, signifies literally to make free; to rescue, contracted from the French re and secourir, and indirectly from the Latin re and curro to run, signifies to run to a person's assistance in the moment of difficulty; to save is to make safe.

The idea of taking or keeping from danger is common to these terms; but deliver and rescue signify rather the taking from, save the keeping from danger: we deliver and rescue from the evil that is; we save from evils that may be, as well as from those that are. Deliver and rescue do not convey any idea of the means by which the end is produced; save commonly includes the idea of some superiour agency: a man may be delivered or rescued by any person without distinction; he is commonly saved by a superiour.

Deliver is an unqualified term, it is applicable to every mode of the action or species of evil; to rescue is a species of delivering, namely, delivering from the power of another; to save is applicable to the greatest possible evils: a person may be delivered from a burden, from an oppression, from disease, or from danger by any means; 'In our greatest fears and troubles we may ease our hearts by reposing ourselves upon God, in confidence of his support and deliverance'—TILLOTSON. A prisoner is rescued from the hands of an enemy;

My household gods, companions of my woes,

With pious care I rescu'd from our foes.—DRYDEN

A person is saved from destruction;

Now shameful flight alone can save the host,

Our blood, our treasure, and our glory lost.—POPE.

'He who feareth God and worketh righteousness, and perseveres in the faith and duties of our religion, shall certainly be saved.'—ROGERS.

DELIVERANCE, DELIVERY,

Are drawn from the same verb (v. To deliver) to express its different senses of taking from or giving to; the former denotes the taking of something from one's self the latter implies giving something to another.

To wish for a deliverance from that which is hurtful or painful is to a certain extent justifiable;

Whate'er befalls your life shall be my care,

One death, or one deliverance, we will share.

DRYDEN.

The careful delivery of property into the hands of the owner will be the first object of concern with a faithful agent; 'With our Saxon ancestors the delivery of a turf was a necessary solemnity to establish the conveyance of lands.'—BLACKSTONE.

TO FREE, SET FREE, DELIVER, LIBERATE

To free is properly to make free, in distinction from set free; the first is employed in what concerns ourselves, and the second in that which concerns another. A man frees himself from an engagement; he sets another free from his engagement: we free or set ourselves free, from that which has been imposed upon us by ourselves or by circumstances; we are delivered or liberated from that which others have imposed upon us; the former from evils in general, the latter from the evil of confinement. I free myself from a burden; I set my own slave free from his slavery; I deliver another man's slave from a state of bondage; I liberate a man from prison. A man frees an estate from rent, service, taxes, and all incumbrances; a king sets his subjects free from certain imposts or tribute, he delivers them from a foreign yoke, or he liberates those who have been taken in war. We free either by an act of the will, or by contrivance and method; we set free by an act of authority; we deliver or liberate by active measures and physical strength. A man frees himself from impertinence by escaping the company of the impertinent; he sets others free from all apprehensions by assuring them of his protection; he delivers them out of a perilous situation by his presence of mind. A country is freed from the horrors of a revolution by the vigorous councils of a determined statesman; in this manner was England freed from a counterpart of the French evolution by the vigour of the government ; a country set free from the exactions and hardships of usurpation and tyranny by the mild influence of established government : in this manner is Europe set free from the iron yoke of the French usurper by its ancient rulers. A country is delivered from the grasp and oppression of the invader ; in this manner has Spain been delivered, by the wisdom and valour of an illustrious British general at the head of a band of British heroes.

When applied in a moral sense free is applied to sin, or any other moral evil ;

She then
Sent Iris down to free her from the strife
Of labouring nature, and dissolve her life.

DRYDEN.

Set free is employed for ties, obligation, and responsibility ;

When heav'n would kindly set us free,
And earth's enchantment end ;
It takes the most effectual means,
And robs us of a friend.—YOUNG.

Deliver is employed for external circumstances ; 'However desirous Mary was of obtaining deliverance from Darnley's caprices, she had good reasons for rejecting the method by which they proposed to accomplish it.'—ROBERTSON. God, as our Redeemer, frees us from the bondage and consequences of sin, by the dispensations of his atoning grace ; but he does not set us free from any of our moral obligations or moral responsibility as free agents ; as our Preserver he delivers us from dangers and misfortunes, trials and temptations.

FREE, LIBERAL.

Free is here considered as it respects actions and sentiments. In all its acceptations free is a term of dispraise, and liberal that of commendation. To be free, signifies to act or think at will ; to be liberal is to act according to the dictates of an enlarged heart and an enlightened mind. A clown or a fool may be free with his money, and may squander it away to please his humour, or gratify his appetite ; but the nobleman and the wise man will be liberal in rewarding merit, in encouraging industry, and in promoting whatever can contribute to the ornament, the prosperity, and improvement of his country. A man who is free in his sentiments thinks as he pleases ; the man who is liberal thinks according to the extent of his knowledge. The free-thinking man is wise in his own conceit, he despises the opinions of others ; the liberal-minded thinks modestly on his own personal attainments, and builds upon the wisdom of others.

The freethinker circumscribes all knowledge within the conceptions of a few superlatively wise heads ; 'The freethinkers plead very hard to think freely ; they have it ; but what use do they make of it ? Do their writings show a greater depth of design, or more just and correct reasoning, than those of other men ?'—BERKELEY. 'Their pretensions to be freethinkers is no other than rakes have to be freelivers, and savages to be freemen.'—ADDISON. The liberal-minded is anxious to enlarge the boundaries of science by making all the thinking world in all ages to contribute to the advancement of knowledge ;

For me, for whose well-being
So amply, and with hands so liberal,
Thou hast provided all things.—MILTON.

The desire of knowledge discovers a liberal mind.'—BLAIR. With the freethinker nothing is good that is old or established ; with the liberal man nothing is good because it is new, nothing bad because it is old. Men of the least knowledge and understanding are the most free in their opinions, in which description of men this age abounds above all others ; such men are exceedingly anxious to usurp the epithet liberal to themselves ; but the good sense of mankind will prevail against partial endeavours, and assign this title to none but men of comprehensive talents, sound judgments, extensive experience, and deep erudition.

It seems as if freedom of thought was that aberration of the mind which is opposed to the two extremes of superstition and bigotry ; and that liberality is the happy medium. The freethinker holds nothing sacred, and is attached to nothing but his own conceits ; the superstitious man holds too many things sacred, and is attached to every thing that favours this bent of his mind. A freethinker accommodates his duties to his inclinations ; he denies his obligation to any thing which comes across the peculiar fashion of his sentiment. A man of free sentiments rejects the spirit of Christianity, with the letter or outward formality ; the superstitious man loses the spirit of Christianity in his extravagant devotion to its outward formalities.

On the other hand bigotry and liberality are opposed to each other, not in regard to what they believe, so much as in regard to the nature of their belief. The bigoted man so narrows his mind to the compass of his belief as to exclude every other object ; the liberal man directs his views to every object which does not directly interfere with his belief. It is possible for the bigoted and the liberal man to have the same faith, but the former mistakes its true object and tendency, namely, the improvement of his rational powers, which the latter pursues.

It is evident, therefore, from the above, that the freethinker, the superstitious man, and the bigot, are alike the offspring of ignorance ; and that liberality is the handmaid of science, and the daughter of truth. Of all the mental aberrations freedom of thinking is the most obnoxious, as it is fostered by the pride of the heart, and the vanity of the imagination. In superstition we sometimes see the anxiety of a well-disposed mind to discharge its conscience : with bigotry we often see associated the mild virtues which are taught by Christianity ; but in the freethinker we only see the bad passions and the unruly will set free from all the constraints of outward authority, and disengaged from the control of reason and judgement : in such a manner the amiable qualities of the natural disposition become corrupted, and the evil humours triumph.

FREE, FAMILIAR.

Free has already been considered as it respects the words, actions, and sentiments (v. Free) ; in the present case it is coupled with familiarity, inasmuch as they respect the outward behaviour or conduct in general of men one to another.

To be free is to be disengaged from all the constraints which the ceremonies of social intercourse impose ; to be familiar is to be upon the footing of a familiar, of a relative, or one of the same family. Neither of these terms can be admitted as unexceptionable ; but freedom is that which is in general totally unauthorized ; familiarity sometimes shelters itself under the sanction of long, close, and friendly intercourse.

Free is a term of much more extensive import than familiar ; a man may be free towards another in a thousand ways ; but he is familiar towards him only in his manners and address. A man who is free looks upon every thing as his which he chooses to make use of ; a familiar man only wants to share with another and to stand upon an equal footing. A man who is free will take possession of another man's house or room in his absence, and will make use of his name or his property as it suits his convenience ; his freedom always turns upon that which contributes to his own indulgence ; 'Being one day very free at a great feast, he suddenly broke forth into a great laughter.'—HAKESWELL. A man who is familiar will smile upon you, take hold of your arm, call you by some friendly or common name, and seek to enjoy with you all the pleasures of social intercourse ; his familiarity always turns upon that which will increase his own importance ; 'Kalandar streight thought he saw his niece Parthenia, and was about in such familiar sort to have spoken unto her ; but she in grave and honourable manner, gave him to understand he was mistaken.'—SIDNEY. There cannot be two greater enemies to the harmony of society than freedom and familiarity ; both of which it is the whole business of politeness to destroy ; for no man can be free without being in danger of infringing upon what belongs to another, nor familiar without being in danger of obtruding himself to the annoyance of others.

When these words are used figuratively in reference to things, they do not bear that objectionable feature ;

Free and familiar with misfortune grow,
Be us'd to sorrow, and inur'd to wo.—PRIOR

FREE, EXEMPT.

To free is as general in its signification as in the preceding articles; to exempt, in Latin exemptus, participle of eximo, signifies set out or disengaged from a part.

The condition and not the conduct of men is here considered. Freedom is either accidental or intentional; the exemption is always intentional: we may be free from disorders, or free from troubles; we are exempt, that is exempted by government, from serving in the militia. Free is applied to every thing from which any one may wish to be free; but exempt, on the contrary, to those burdens which we should share with others: we may be free from imperfections, free from inconveniences, free from the interruptions of others;

O happy, if he knew his happy state,
The swain who, free from business and debate,
Receives his easy food from nature's hand!

DRYDEN.

A man is exempt from any office or tax; 'To be exempt from the passions with which others are tormented, is the only pleasing solitude.'—ADDISON. We may likewise be said to be exempt from troubles when speaking of these as the dispensations of Providence to others.

FREEDOM, LIBERTY.

Freedom, the abstract noun of free, is taken in all the senses of the primitive; liberty, from the Latin liber free, is only taken in the sense of free from external constraint, from the action of power.

Freedom is personal and private; liberty is public. The freedom of the city is the privilege granted by any city to individuals; the liberty of the city are the immunities enjoyed by the city. By the same rule of distinction we speak of the freedom of the will, the freedom of manners, the freedom of conversation, or the freedom of debate; 'The ends for which men unite in society, and submit to government, are to enjoy security to their property, and freedom to their persons, from all injustice or violence.'—BLAIR. 'I would not venture into the world under the character of a man who pretends to talk like other people, until I had arrived at a full freedom of speech.'—ADDISON. We speak of the liberty of conscience, the liberty of the press, the liberty of the subject; 'The liberty of the press is a blessing when we are inclined to write against others, and a calamity when we find ourselves overborne by the multitude of our assailants.'—JOHNSON. A slave obtains his freedom;

O freedom! first delight of human kind!
Not that which bondmen from their masters find,
The privilege of doles.—DRYDEN.

A captive obtains his liberty.

Freedom serves moreover to qualify the action; liberty is applied only to the agent: hence we say, to speak or think with freedom; but to have the liberty of speaking, thinking, or acting. Freedom and liberty are likewise employed for the private conduct of individuals towards each other; but the former is used in a qualified good sense, the latter in an unqualified bad sense. A freedom may sometimes be licensed or allowed; liberty is always taken in a bad sense. A freedom may be innocent and even pleasant; a liberty always does more or less violence to the decencies of life, or the feelings of individuals. There are little freedoms which may pass between youth of different sexes, so as to heighten the pleasures of society; but a modest woman will be careful to guard against any freedoms which may admit of misinterpretation, and resent every liberty offered to her as an insult.

TO GIVE UP, DELIVER, SURRENDER, YIELD, CEDE, CONCEDE.

We give up (v. To give, grant) that which we wish to retain; we deliver that which we wish not to retain. Deliver does not include the idea of a transfer; but give up implies both the giving from, and the giving to: we give up our house to the accommodation of our friends; 'A popish priest threatens to excommunicate a Northumberland esquire if he did not give up to him the church lands.'—ADDISON. We deliver property into the hands of the owner; 'It is a wonder that they who at such a time could be corrupted to frame and deliver such a petition, would not be reformed by such an answer.'—DRYDEN. We may give up with reluctance, and deliver with pleasure; 'Such an expectation will never come to pass; therefore I will e'en give it up and go and fret myself.'—COLLIER.

On my experience, Adam, freely taste,
And fear of death deliver to the winds.—MILTON

To give up is a colloquial substitute for either surrender or yield; as it designates no circumstance of the action, it may be employed in familiar discourse, in almost every case for the other terms: where the action is compulsory, we may either say an officer gives up or surrenders his sword; when the action is discretionary, we may either say he gives up, or yields a point of discussion: give up has, however, an extensiveness of application which gives it an office distinct from either surrender or yield. When we speak of familiar and personal subjects, give up is more suitable than surrender, which is confined to matters of public interest or great moment, unless when taken figuratively: a man gives up his place, his right, his claim, and the like; he surrenders a fortress, a vessel, or his property to his creditors, or figuratively he surrenders his judgement or opinions. When give up is compared with yield, they both respect personal matters; but the former expresses a much stronger action than the latter: a man gives up his whole judgement to another; he yields to the opinion of another in particular cases: he gives himself up to sensual indulgences; he yields to the force of temptation; 'The peaceable man will give up his favourite schemes; he will yield to an opponent rather than become the cause of violent embroilments.'—BLAIR. 'The young, half-seduced by persuasion, and half-compelled by ridicule, surrender their convictions, and consent to live as they see others around them living.'—BLAIR.

Cede, from the Latin cedo to give, is properly to surrender by virtue of a treaty: we may surrender a town as an act of necessity; but the cession of a country is purely a political transaction: thus, generals frequently surrender such towns as they are not able to defend; and governments cede such countries as they find it not convenient to retain. To concede, which is but a variation of cede, is a mode of yielding which may be either an act of discretion or courtesy: as when a government concedes to the demands of the people certain privileges, or when an individual concedes any point in dispute for the sake of peace: 'As to the magic power which the devil imparts for these concessions of his votaries, theologians have different opinions.'—CUMBERLAND.

TO GIVE UP, ABANDON, RESIGN, FOREGO.

These terms differ from the preceding (v. To give up), inasmuch as they designate actions entirely free from foreign influence. A man gives up, abandons, and resigns, from the dictates of his own mind, independent of all control from others. To give up and abandon both denote a positive decision of the mind; but the former may be the act of the understanding or the will, the latter is more commonly the act of the will and the passions: to give up is applied to familiar cases; abandon to matters of importance: one gives up an idea, an intention, a plan, and the like; 'Upon his friend telling him, he wondered he gave up the question, when he had visibly the better of the dispute; I am never ashamed, says he, to be confuted by one who is master of fifty legions.'—ADDISON. One abandons a project, a scheme, a measure of government;

For Greece we grieve, abandoned by her fate,
To drink the dregs of thy unmeasur'd hate.

POPE.

To give up and resign are applied either to the outward actions, or merely to the inward movements; but the former is active, it determinately fixes the conduct; the latter seems to be rather passive, it is the leaning of the mind to the circumstances: a man gives up his situation by a positive act of his choice; he resigns his office when he feels it inconvenient to hold it: so, likewise, we give up what we expect or lay claim to; 'He declares himself to be now satisfied to the contrary, in which he has given up the cause.—

 DRYDEN. We resign what we hope or wish for;

The praise of artful numbers I resign,

And hang my pipe upon the sacred pine.—DRYDEN.

In this sense, forego, which signifies to let go or let pass by, is comparable with resign, inasmuch as it expresses a passive action; but we resign that which we have, and we forego that which we might have: thus, we resign the claims which we have already made; we forego the claim if we abstain altogether from making it; the former may be a matter of prudence: the latter is always an act of virtue and forbearance;

Desirous to resign and render back
 All I receiv'd.—MILTON.

'What they have enjoyed with great pleasure at one time, has proved insipid or nauseous at another; and they see nothing in it, for which they should forego a present enjoyment.'—LOCKE.

Then, pilgrim, turn, thy cares forego;

All earth-born cares are wrong.—GOLDSMITH.

When applied reflectively, to give up is used either in a good, bad, or indifferent sense; abandon always in a bad sense; resign always in a good sense: a man may give himself up, either to studious pursuits, to idle vagaries, or vicious indulgencies; he abandons himself to gross vices; he resigns himself to the will of Providence, or to the circumstances of his condition: a man is said to be given up to his lusts who is without any principle to control him in the gratification; he is said to be abandoned, when his outrageous conduct bespeaks an entire insensibility to every honest principle; he is said to be resigned when he discovers composure and tranquillity in the hour of affliction.

TO ABANDON, DESERT, FORSAKE, RELINQUISH.

The idea of leaving or separating one's self from an object is common to these terms, which differ in the circumstances or modes of leaving. The two former are more solemn acts than the two latter. Abandon, from the French abandonner, is a concretion of the words donner à ban, to give up to a public ban or outlawry. To abandon then is to expose to every misfortune which results from a formal and public denunciation; to set out of the protection of law and government; and to deny the privileges of citizenship; desert, in Latin desertus, participle of desero, that is, de privative and sero to sow, signifies to lie unsown, unplanted, cultivated no longer. To desert then is to leave off cultivating; and as there is something of idleness and improvidence in ceasing to render the soil productive, ideas of disapprobation accompany the word in all its metaphorical applications. He who leaves off cultivating a farm usually removes from it; hence the idea of removal and blameworthy removal, which usually attaches to the term; forsake, in Saxon forsecan, is compounded of the primitive for and sake, seek, secan, signifying to seek no more, to leave off seeking that which has been an object of search; relinquish, in Latin relinquo, is compounded of re or retro behind, and linquo to leave, that is, to leave what we would fain take with us, to leave with reluctance.

To abandon is totally to withdraw ourselves from an object; to lay aside all care and concern for it; to leave it altogether to itself; to desert is to withdraw ourselves at certain times when our assistance or co-operation is required, or to separate ourselves from that to which we ought to be attached: to forsake is to withdraw our regard for and interest in an object, to keep at a distance from it; to relinquish is to leave that which has once been an object of our pursuit.

Abandon and desert are employed for persons or things; forsake for persons or places; relinquish for things only.

With regard to persons these terms express moral culpability in a progressive ratio downwards: abandon comprehends the violation of the most sacred ties, desert, a breach of honour and fidelity; forsake, a rupture of the social bond.

We abandon those who are entirely dependent for protection and support; they are left in a helpless state exposed to every danger; a child is abandoned by its parent; 'He who abandons his offspring or corrupts them by his example, perpetrates a greater evil than a murderer.'—HAWKSWORTH. We desert those with whom we have entered into a coalition; they are left to their own resources: a soldier deserts his comrades; a partisan deserts his friends; 'After the death of Stella, Swift's benevolence was contracted, and his severity exasperated: he drove his acquaintance from his table, and wondered why he was deserted.'—JOHNSON. We forsake those with whom we have been in habits of intimacy; they are deprived of the pleasures and comforts of society; a man forsakes his companions; a lover forsakes his mistress, or a husband his wife;

Forsake me not thus, Adam!—MILTON.

We are bound by every law human and divine not to abandon; we are called upon by every good principle not to desert; we are impelled by every kind feeling not to forsake. Few animals except man will abandon their young until they are enabled to provide for themselves. Interest, which is but too often the only principle that brings men together, will lead them to desert each other in the time of difficulty. We are enjoined in the gospel not to forsake the poor and needy.

When abandoned by our dearest relatives, deserted by our friends, and forsaken by the world, we have always a resource in our Maker.

With regard to things (in which sense the word relinquish is synonymous) the character of abandoning varies with the circumstances and motives of the action according to which it is either good, bad, or indifferent, deserting is always taken in an unfavourable or bad sense; the act of forsaking is mostly indifferent, but implies a greater or less breach of some tie; that of relinquishing is prudent or imprudent.

A captain may abandon his vessel when he has no means of saving it, except at the risk of his life;

He boldly spake, sir knight, if knight thou be,
Abandon this forestalled place at erst,
 For fear of further harm, I counsel thee.

SPENSER

—neglected nature pines

Abandoned.—COWPER.

An upright statesman will never desert his post when his country is in danger, nor a true soldier desert his colours; 'He who at the approach of evil betrays his trust, or deserts his post, is branded with cowardice.'—HAWKSWORTH. Birds will mostly forsake their nests when they discover them to have been visited, and most animals will forsake their haunts when they find themselves discovered; 'Macdonald and Macleod of Skie have lost many tenants and labourers, but Raarsa has not yet been forsaken by any of its inhabitants.'—JOHNSON. So likewise figuratively; 'When learning, abilities, and what is excellent in the world, forsake the church, we may easily foretell its ruin without the gift of prophecy.'—SOUTH. Men often inadvertently relinquish the fairest prospects in order to follow some favourite scheme which terminates in their ruin; 'Men are wearied with the toil which they bear, but cannot find in their hearts to relinquish it.'—STEELE.

Having abandoned their all, they forsook the place which gave them birth, and relinquished the advantages which they might have obtained from their rank and family.

TO ABANDON, RESIGN, RENOUNCE, ABDICATE.

The idea of giving up is common to these terms, which signification, though analogous to the former, admits, however, of a distinction; as in the one case we separate ourselves from an object, in the other we send or cast it from us. In this latter sense the terms abandon and resign have been partially considered in the preceding articles; renounce, in Latin renuncio, from nuncio to tell or declare, is to declare off from a thing; abdicate, from dico to speak, signifies likewise to call or cry off from a thing.

We abandon and resign by giving up to another; we renounce by sending away from ourselves; we abandon a thing by transferring our power over to another; in this manner a debtor abandons his goods to his creditors: we resign a thing by transferring our possession of it to another; in this manner we resign a place to a friend: we renounce a thing by simply ceasing to hold it; in this manner we renounce a claim or a profession. As to renounce signified originally to give up by word of mouth, and to resign to give up by signature, the former is consequently a less formal action than the latter: we may renounce by implication; we resign in direct terms. we renounce the pleasures of the world when we do not seek to enjoy them; we resign a pleasure, a profit, or advantage, of which we expressly give up the enjoyment.

To abdicate is a species of informal resignation. A monarch abdicates his throne who simply declares his will to cease to reign; but a minister resigns his office when he gives up the seals by which he held it.

A humane commander will not abandon a town to the rapine of the soldiers;

The passive Gods beheld the Greeks defile
Their temples, and abandon to the spoil
Their own abodes.—DRYDEN.

The motives for resignations are various. Discontent, disgust, and the love of repose, are the ordinary inducements for men to resign honourable and lucrative employments; 'It would be a good appendix to "the art of living and dying," if any one would write "the art of growing old," and teach men to resign their pretensions to the pleasures of youth.'—STEELE. Men are not so ready to renounce the pleasures that are within their reach, as to seek after those which are out of their reach; 'For ministers to be silent in the cause of Christ is to renounce it, and to fly is to desert it.'—SOUTH. The abdication of a throne is not always an act of magnanimity, it may frequently result from caprice or necessity; 'Much gratitude is due to the nine from their favoured poets, and much hath been paid: for even to the present hour they are invoked, and worshipped by the sons of verse, while all the other deities of Olympus have either abdicated their thrones, or been dismissed from them with contempt.'—CUMBERLAND.

Charles the Fifth abdicated his crown, and his minister resigned his office on the very same day, when both renounced the world with its allurements and its troubles.

We abandon nothing but that over which we have had an entire and lawful control; we abdicate nothing but that which we have held by a certain right; but we may resign or renounce that which may be in our possession only by an act of violence. A usurper cannot abandon his people, because he has no people over whom he can exert a lawful authority; still less can he abdicate a throne, because he has no throne to abdicate, but he may resign supreme power, because power may be unjustly held; or he may renounce his pretensions to a throne, because pretensions may be fallacious or extravagant.

Abandon and resign are likewise used in a reflective sense; the former to express an involuntary or culpable action, the latter that which is voluntary and proper. The soldiers of Hannibal abandoned themselves to effeminacy during their winter quarters at Cumæ; 'It is the part of every good man's religion to resign himself to God's will.'—CUMBERLAND.

TO ABSTAIN, FORBEAR, REFRAIN.

Abstain, in French abstenir, Latin abstineo, is compounded of ab or abs from and teneo to keep, signifying to keep one's self from a thing; forbear is compounded of the preposition for, or from, and the verb to bear or carry, signifying to carry or take one's self from a thing; refrain, in French refrèner, Latin refreno, is compounded of re back and fræno, from frænū a bridle, signifying to keep back as it were by a bridle, to bridle in.

The first of these terms marks the leaving a thing, and the two others the omission of an action. We abstain from any object by not making use of it; we forbear to do or refrain from doing a thing by not taking any part in it.

Abstaining and forbearing are outward actions, but refraining is connected with the operations of the mind. We may abstain from the thing we desire, or forbear to do the thing which we wish to do; but we can never refrain from any action without in some measure losing our desire to do it.

We abstain from whatever concerns our food and clothing; we forbear to do what we may have particular motives for doing; refrain from what we desire to do, or have been in the habits of doing.

It is a part of the Mahometan faith to abstain from the use of wine; but it is a Christian duty to forbear doing an injury even in return for an injury: and to refrain from all swearing and evil speaking.

Abstinence is a virtue when we abstain from that which may be hurtful to ourselves or injurious to another; 'Though a man cannot abstain from being weak, he may from being vicious.'—ADDISON. Forbearance is essential to preserve peace and good will between man and man. Every one is too liable to offend, not to have motives for forbearing to deal harshly with the offences of his neighbour; 'By forbearing to do what may be innocently done, we may add hourly new vigour and resolution, and secure the power of resistance when pleasure or interest shall lend their charms to guilt.'—JOHNSON. If we refrain from uttering with the lips the first dictates of an angry mind, we shall be saved much repentance in future; 'If we conceive a being, created with all his faculties and senses, to open his eyes in a most delightful plain, to view for the first time the serenity of the sky, the splendour of the sun, the verdure of the fields and woods, the glowing colours of the flowers, we can hardly believe it possible that he should refrain from bursting into an ecstasy of joy, and pouring out his praises to the Creator of those wonders.'—SIR WILLIAM JONES.

ABSTINENT, SOBER, ABSTEMIOUS, TEMPERATE.

The first of these terms is generic, the rest specific; Abstinent (v. To abstain) respects every thing that acts on the senses, and in a limited sense applies particularly to solid food; sober, from the Latin sobrius, or sobrius, that is, sine ebrius, not drunk, implies an abstinence from excessive drinking; abstemious, from the Latin abstemius, compounded of abs and temetum wine, implies the abstaining from wine or strong liquor in general; temperate, in Latin temperatus, partiple of tempero to moderate or regulate, implies a well regulated abstinence in all manner of sensual indulgence.

We may be abstinent without being sober, sober without being abstemious, and all together without being temperate.

An abstinent man does not eat or drink so much as he could enjoy; a sober man may drink much without being affected.* An abstemious man drinks nothing strong. A temperate man enjoys all in a due proportion.

A particular passion may cause us to be abstinent, either partially or totally: sobriety may often depend upon the strength of the constitution, or be prescribed by prudence: necessity may dictate abstemiousness, but nothing short of a well disciplined mind will enable us to be temperate. Diogenes practised the most rigorous abstinence: some men have unjustly obtained a character for sobriety, whose habit of body has enabled them to resist the force of strong liquor even when taken to excess: it is not uncommon for persons to practise abstemiousness to that degree, as not to drink anything but water all their lives: Cyrus was distinguished by his temperance as his other virtues; he shared all hardships with his soldiers, and partook of their frugal diet.

Unlimited abstinence is rather a vice than a virtue, for we are taught to enjoy the things which Providence has set before us; 'To set the mind above the appetites is the end of abstinence, which one of the fathers observes to be not a virtue, but the groundwork of virtue.'—JOHNSON. Sobriety ought to be highly esteemed among the lower orders, where the abstinence from vice is to be regarded as positive virtue; 'Cratinus carried his love of wine to such an excess, that he got the name of φλοιστος, launching out in praise of drinking, and rallying all sobriety out of countenance.'—CUMBERLAND. Abstemiousness is sometimes the only means of preserving health;

The strongest oaths are straws
To th' fire t' th' blood; be more abstemious,
Or else good night your vow.—SHAKESPEARE.

Habitual temperance is the most efficacious means of keeping both body and mind in the most regular state; 'If we consider the life of these ancient sages, a great part of whose philosophy consisted in a temperate and abstemious course of life, one would think the life of a philosopher and the life of a man were of two different dates.'—ADDISON.

* Vide Trusler: "Sober, temperate, abstemious."

MODESTY, MODERATION, TEMPERANCE, SOBRIETY.

Modesty, in French modestie, Latin modestia, and moderation, in Latin moderatio and moderor, both come from modus a measure, limit, or boundary: that is, forming a measure or rule; temperance, in Latin temperantia, from tempus time, signifies fixing a time or term (v. Abstinent); sobriety (v. Abstinent).

Modesty lies in the mind, and in the tone of feeling; moderation respects the desires: modesty is a principle that acts discretionally; moderation is a rule or line that acts as a restraint on the views and the outward conduct.

Modesty consists in a fair and medium estimate of one's character and qualification; it guards a man against too high an estimate; it recommends to him an estimate below the reality: moderation consists in a suitable regulation of one's desires, demands, and expectations; it consequently depends very often on modesty as its groundwork: he who thinks modestly of his own acquirements, his own performances, and his own merits, will be moderate in his expectations of praise, reward, and recompense: he, on the other hand, who overrates his own abilities and qualifications, will equally overrate the use he makes of them, and consequently be immoderate in the price which he sets upon his services: in such cases, therefore, modesty and moderation are to each other as cause and effect; but there may be modesty without moderation, and moderation without modesty. Modesty is a sentiment confined to one's self as the object, and consisting solely of one's judgement of what one is, and what one does. Moderation, as is evident from the above, extends to objects that are external of ourselves: modesty, rather than moderation, belongs to an author; moderation, rather than modesty, belongs to a tradesman, or a man who has gains to make and purposes to answer; 'I may modestly conclude, that whatever errors there may be in this play, there are not those which have been objected to.'—DRYDEN.

Equally inur'd
By moderation either state to bear,
Prosperous or adverse.—MILTON.

Modesty shields a man from mortification and disappointments which assail the self-conceited man in every direction: a modest man conciliates the esteem even of an enemy and a rival; he disarms the resentments of those who feel themselves most injured by his superiority; he makes all pleased with him by making them at ease with themselves: the self-conceited man, on the contrary, sets the whole world against himself, because he sets himself against every body; every one is out of humour with him, because he makes them ill at ease with themselves while in his company;

There's a proud modesty in merit!—DRYDEN.

Moderation protects a man equally from injustice on the one hand, and imposition on the other: he who is moderate himself makes others so; for every one finds his advantage in keeping within that bound which is as convenient to himself as to his neighbour: the world will always do this homage to real goodness, that they will admire it if they cannot practise it, and they will practise it to the utmost extent that their passions will allow them. Modesty, as a female virtue, has regard solely to the conduct of females with the other sex, and is still more distinguished from moderation than in the former case.

Moderation is the measure of one's desires, one's habits, one's actions and one's words; temperance is the adaptation of the time or season for particular feelings, actions, or words: a man is said to be moderate in his principles, who adopts the medium or middle course of thinking; it rather qualifies the thing than the person: he is said to be temperate in his anger, if he do not suffer it to break out into any excesses; temperance characterizes the person rather than the thing; 'These are the tenets which the *moderate*st of the Romanists will not venture to affirm.'—SMALRIDGE.

She's not forward, but modest as the dove,
She's not hot, but temperate as the morn.

SHAKESPEARE.

A moderate man in politicks endeavours to steer clear of all party spirit, and is consequently so temperate in his language as to provoke no animosity; 'Few harangues from the pulpit, except in the days of your league in France, or in the days of our solemn league and covenant in England, have ever breathed less of the spirit of moderation than this lecture in the Old Jewry.'—BURKE. 'Temperate mirth is not extinguished by old age.'—BLAIR. Moderation in the enjoyment of every thing is essential in order to obtain the purest pleasure: and temperance, which absolutely taken is habitual moderation, is always attended with the happiest effects to one's constitution; as, on the contrary, any deviation from temperance, even in a single instance, is always punished with bodily pain and sickness.

Temperance and sobriety have already been considered in their proper application, which will serve to illustrate their improper application (v. Abstinent). Temperance is an action; it is the tempering of our words and actions to the circumstances: sobriety is a state in which one is exempt from every stimulus to deviate from the right course; as a man who is intoxicated with wine runs into excesses, and loses that power of guiding himself which he has when he is sober or free from all intoxication, so is he who is intoxicated with any passion, in like manner, hurried away into irregularities which a man in his right senses will not be guilty of: sobriety is, therefore, the state of being in one's right or sober senses; and sobriety is with regard to temperance, as a cause to the effect; sobriety of mind will not only produce moderation and temperance, but extend its influence to the whole conduct of a man in every relation and circumstance, to his internal sentiments and his external behaviour: hence we speak of sobriety in one's mien or deportment, sobriety in one's dress and manners, sobriety in one's religious opinions and observances; 'The vines give wine to the drunkard as well as to the sober man.'

—TAYLOR. 'Another, who had a great genius for tragedy, following the fury of his natural temper, made every man and woman in his plays stark raging mad there was not a sober person to be had.'—DRYDEN.

Spread thy close curtains, love-performing night,
Thou sober-suited matron, all in black.—SHAKESPEARE.

CHASTITY, CONTINENCE, MODESTY.

Chastity, in French chastité, Latin casti as, comes from castus pure, and the Hebrew קִישׁ sacred; continence, in French continence, Latin continentia, from contineo and contineo, signifies the act of keeping one's self within bounds.

These two terms are equally employed in relation to the pleasures of sense: both are virtues, but sufficiently distinct in their characteristics.

* Chastity prescribes rules for the indulgence of these pleasures; continence altogether interdicts their use. Chastity extends its views to whatever may bear the smallest relation to the object which it proposes to regulate; it controls the thoughts, words, looks, attitudes, food, dress, company, and in short the whole mode of living: continence simply confines itself to the privations of the pleasures themselves: it is possible, therefore, to be chaste without being continent, and continent without being chaste.

Chastity is suited to all times, ages, and conditions; continence belongs only to a state of celibacy: the Christian religion enjoins chastity, as a positive duty on all its followers; the Romish religion enjoins continence on its clerical members: old age renders men continent, although it seldom makes them chaste;

It fails me here to write of chastity,
That fairest virtue far above the rest.—SPENSER.

'When Pythagoras enjoined on his disciples an abstinence from beans, it has been thought by some an injunction only of continence.'—BROWN (Vulgar Errors).

Chastity and continence have special regard to the outward conduct, modesty goes farther, it is an habitual frame of mind, which prescribes a limit to all the desires. When modesty shows itself by an external sign, it is to be seen mostly in the behaviour; but chastity shows itself more commonly in the conduct. We speak of a modest blush, not of a chaste blush. When the term chastity is applied to the mind it denotes a chastened mind, or a chastened tone of feeling, which has been evidently acquired; but modesty results from the natural character, or from early formed habits. Modesty is the peculiar characteristic of a virtuous female, and is the safeguard of virtue. When a woman has laid aside her modesty, she will not long retain her chastity; 'Of the general character of women, which is modesty, he has taken a most becoming care: for his amorous expressions go no farther than virtue may allow.'—DRYDEN.

* Beauzée: "Chastité, continence"

MODERATION, MEDIOCRITY.

Moderation (v. Modesty) is the characteristic of the person; mediocrity, implying the mean or medium, characterizes the condition: moderation is a virtue of no small importance for beings who find excess in every thing to be an evil;

Such moderation with thy bounty join,
That thou may'st nothing give that is not thine.
DENHAM.

Mediocrity in external circumstances is exempt from all the evils which attend either poverty or riches; 'Mediocrity only of enjoyment is allowed to man.'—BLAIR.

MEAN, MEDIUM.

Mean is but a contraction of medium, which signifies in Latin the middle path. The term mean is used abstractedly in all speculative matters: there is a mean in opinions between the two extremes; this mean is doubtless the point nearest to truth, and has been denominated the golden mean, from its supposed excellence;

The man within the golden mean,
Who can his boldest wish contain,
Securely views the ruin'd cell
Where sordid want and sorrow dwell.

FRANCIS.

Medium is employed in practical matters; computations are often erroneous from being too high or too low: the medium is in this case the one most to be preferred. The moralist will always recommend the mean in all opinions that widely differ from each other: our passions always recommend to us some extravagant conduct either of insolent resistance or mean compliance; but discretion recommends the medium or middle course in such matters. This term is however mostly used to denote any intervening object, which may serve as a middle point; 'He who looks upon the soul through its outward actions, often sees it through a deceitful medium.'—ADDISON.

BECOMING, DECENT, SEEMLY, FIT, SUITABLE.

Becoming, from become, compounded of be and come, signifies coming in its place; decent, in French decent, in Latin deceus, participle of deceo, from the Greek δέκεω, and the Chaldee דקע to beseech, signifies the quality of beseeching and befitting; seemly, compounded of seem to appear, and ly or like, signifies likely or pleasant in appearance; fit and suitable are explained under the article FIT.

What is becoming respects the manner of being in society, such as it ought to be, as to person, time, and place. Decency regards the manner of displaying one's self, so as to be approved and respected. Seemliness is very similar in sense to decency: but its application is confined only to such things as immediately strike the observer. Fitness and suitableness relate to the disposition, arrangement, and order of either being or doing, according to persons, things, or circumstances.

The becoming consists of an exterior that is pleasing to the view: decency involves moral propriety; it is regulated by the fixed rules of good breeding: seemliness is decency in the minor morals, or in our behaviour to or in the presence of others: fitness is regulated by local circumstances, and suitableness by the established customs and usages of society. The dress of a woman is becoming when it renders her person more agreeable to the eye; it is decent if it in no wise offend modesty; it is unseemly if in any degree, however trivial, it violates decorum; it is fit if it be what the occasion requires; it is suitable if it be according to the rank and character of the wearer. What is becoming varies for every individual; the age, the complexion, the stature, and the habits of the person must be consulted in order to obtain the appearance which is becoming; what becomes a young female, or one of fair complexion, may not become one who is farther advanced in life, or who has dark features: decency and seemliness are one and the same for all; all civilized nations have drawn the exact line between the decent and indecent, although fashion may sometimes draw females aside from this line, and cause them to be unseemly if not expressly indecent: fitness varies with the seasons, or the circumstances of persons, what is fit for the winter is unfit for the summer, or what is fit for dry weather is unfit for the wet; what is fit for town is not fit for the country, what is fit for a healthy person is not fit for one that is infirm: suitableness accommodates itself to the external circumstances and conditions of persons; the house, the furniture, and equipage of a prince, must be suitable to his rank; the retinue of an ambassador must be suitable to the character which he has to maintain, and to the wealth, dignity, and importance of the nation, whose monarch he represents; 'Raphael, amid his tenderness and friendship for man, shows such a dignity and condescension in all his speech and behaviour, as are suitable to a superiour nature.'—ADDISON.

Gravity becomes a judge, or a clergyman, at all times: an unassuming tone is becoming in a child when he addresses his superiours; 'Nothing ought to be held laudable or becoming, but what nature itself should prompt us to think so.'—STEELE. Decency requires a more than ordinary gravity when we are in the house of mourning or prayer; it is indecent for a child on the commission of a fault to affect a careless unconcern in the presence of those whom he has offended; 'A Gothick bishop, perhaps, thought it proper to repeat such a form in such particular shoes or slippers; another fancied it would be very decent if such a part of publick devotions was performed with a mitre on his head.'—ADDISON. Seemliness is an essential part of good manners; to be loud in one's discourse, to use expressions not authorized in cultivated society, or to discover a capacious or tenacious temper in one's social intercourse with others are unseemly things;

I am a woman lacking wit
To make a seemly answer to such persons.

SHAKESPEARE.

There is a fitness or unfitness in persons for each other's society: education fits a person for the society of the noble, the wealthy, the polite, and the learned. There is also a fitness of things for persons according to their circumstances; 'To the wisser judgement of God it must be left to determine what is fit to be bestowed, and what to be withheld.'—BLAIR. There is a suitableness in people's tempers for each other; such a suitability is particularly requisite for those who are destined to live together: selfish people, with opposite taste and habits, can never be suitable companions; 'He creates those sympathies and suitableness of nature that are the foundation of all true friendship, and by his providence brings persons so affected together'—SOUTH.

DECENCY, DECORUM.

Though decency and decorum are both derived from the same word (v. Becoming), they have acquired a distinction in their sense and application. Decency respects a man's conduct; decorum his behaviour: a person conducts himself with decency; he behaves with decorum.

Indecency is a vice; it is the violation of publick or private morals: indecorum is a fault; it offends the feelings of those who witness it. Nothing but a depraved mind can lead to indecent practices; indiscretion and thoughtlessness may sometimes give rise to that which is indecorous. Decency enjoins upon all relatives, according to the proximity of their relationship, to show certain marks of respect to the memory of the dead; 'Even religion itself, unless decency be the handmaid which waits upon her, is apt to make people appear guilty of sourness and ill-humour.'—SPECTATOR. Regard for the feelings of others enjoins a certain outward decorum upon every one who attends a funeral; 'I will admit that a fine woman of a certain rank cannot have too many real virtues; but at the same time I do insist upon it, that it is essentially her interest not to have the appearance of any one. This decorum, I confess, will conceal her conquests: but on the other hand, if she will be pleased to reflect that those conquests are known sooner or later, she will not upon an average find herself a loser.'—CHESTERFIELD.

IMMODEST, IMPUDENT, SHAMELESS.

Immodest signifies the want of modesty; impudent and shameless signify without shame.

The immodest is less than either the impudent or shameless: an immodest girl lays aside the ornament of her sex, and puts on another garb that is less becoming; but her heart need not be corrupt until she becomes impudent: she wants a good quality when she is immodest; she is possessed of a positively bad quality when she is impudent. There is always hope that an immodest woman may be sensible of her error, and amend; but of an impudent woman there is no such chance, she is radically corrupt; 'Music diffuses a calm all around us, and makes us drop all those immodest thoughts which would be a hindrance to us in the performance of the great duty of thanksgiving.'—SPECTATOR. 'I am at once equally fearful of sparing you, and of being too impudent a corrector.'—POPE.

Impudent may characterize the person or the thing; shameless characterizes the person. A person's air, look, and words, are impudent, when contrary to all modesty: the person himself is shameless who is devoid of all sense of shame;

The sole remorse his greedy heart can feel
Is if one life escapes his murdering steel;
Shameless by force or fraud to work his way,
And no less prompt to flatter than betray.

CUMBERLAND.

INDECENT, IMMODEST, INDELIcate.

Indecent is the contrary of decent (v. Becoming), immodest the contrary of modest (v. Modest), indelicate the contrary of delicate (v. Fine).

Indecency and immodesty violate the fundamental principles of morality: the former however in external matters, as dress, words, and looks; the latter in conduct and disposition. A person may be indecent for want of either knowing or thinking better; but a female cannot be habitually immodest without radical corruption of principle. Indecency may be a partial, immodesty is a positive and entire breach of the moral law. Indecency belongs to both sexes; immodesty is peculiarly applicable to the misconduct of females; 'The Dubistan contains more ingenuity and wit, more indecent and blasphemy, than I ever saw collected in one single volume.'—SIR WM. JONES.

Immodest words admit of no defence,
For want of decency is want of sense.

ROSCOMMON.

Indecency is less than immodesty, but more than indelicate: they both respect the outward behaviour; but the former springs from illicit or uncurbed desire; indelicate from the want of education. It is a great indecent for a man to marry again very quickly after the death of his wife; but a still greater indecent for a woman to put such an affront on her deceased husband: it is a great indelicate in any one to break in upon the retirement of such as are in sorrow and mourning. It is indecent for females to expose their persons as many do whom we cannot call immodest women; it is indelicate for females to engage in masculine exercises; 'Your papers would be chargeable with something worse than indelicate, did you treat the detestable sin of uncleanness in the same manner as you rally self-love.'—SPECTATOR.

TO ABJURE, RECENT, RETRACT, REVOKE, RECALL.

Abjure, in Latin abjuro, is compounded of the privative ab and juro to swear, signifying to swear to the contrary or give up with an oath; recent, in Latin recanto, is compounded of the privative re and canto to sing or declare, signifying to unsay, to contradict by a counter declaration; retract, in Latin retractus, participle of retraho, is compounded of re back and traho to draw, signifying to draw back what has been let go; revoke and recall have the same original sense as recent, with this difference only, that the word call, which is expressed also by voke, or in Latin voco, implies an action more suited to a multitude than the word canto to sing, which may pass in solitude.

We abjure a religion, we recent a doctrine, we retract a promise, we revoke a command, we recall an expression.

What has been solemnly professed is renounced by abjuration;

The pontiff saw Britannia's golden fleece,
Once all his own, invest her worthier sons!
Her verdant valleys, and her fertile plains,
Yellow with grain, abjure his hateful sway.

SHENSTONE.

What has been publicly maintained as a settled point of belief is given up by recanting; 'A false satire ought to be recanted for the sake of him whose reputation may be injured.'—JOHNSON. What has been pledged so as to gain credit is contradicted by retracting; 'When any scholar will convince me that these were futile and malicious tales against Socrates, I will retract all credit in them, and thank him for the conviction.'—CUMBERLAND. What has been pronounced by an act of authority is rendered null by revocation; 'What reason is there, but that those grants and privileges should be revoked or reduced to their first intention.'—SPENSER. What has been mis spoken through inadvertence or mistake is rectified by recalling the words;

'T is done, and since 't is done 't is past recall,
And since 't is past recall must be forgotten.

DRYDEN.

Although Archbishop Cranmer recanted the principles of the reformation, yet he soon after recalled his words, and died boldly for his faith. Henry IV. of France abjured Calvinism, but he did not retract the promise which he had made to the Calvinists of his protection. Louis XIV. drove many of his best subjects from France by revoking the edict of Nantes.

Interest but too often leads men to abjure their faith; the fear of shame or punishment leads them to retract their opinions; the want of principle dictates the retracting of one's promise; instability is the ordinary cause for revoking decrees; a love of precision commonly induces a speaker or writer to recall a false expression.

TO ABOLISH, ABROGATE, REPEAL, REVOKE, ANNUL, CANCEL.

Abolish, in French abolir, Latin aboleo, is compounded of ab and oleo to lose the smell, signifying to lose every trace of former existence; abrogate, in French abroger, Latin abrogatus, participle of abrogo, compounded of ab and rogo to ask, signifies literally to ask away, or to ask that a thing may be done away; in allusion to the custom of the Romans, among whom no law was valid unless the consent of the people was obtained by asking, and in like manner no law was unmade without asking their consent; repeal, in French rappele, from the Latin words re and appello, signifies literally to call back or unsay what has been said, which is in like manner the original meaning of revoke; annul, in French annuller, comes from nulle, in Latin nihil, signifying to reduce to nothing; cancel, in French canceller, comes from the Latin cancello to cut crosswise, signifying to strike out crosswise, that is, to cross out.

Abolish is a more gradual proceeding than abrogate or any of the other actions. Disuse abolishes; a positive interference is necessary to abrogate. The former is employed with regard to customs: the latter with regard to the authorized transactions of mankind; 'The long-continued wars between the English and the Scots, had then raised invincible jealousies and hate, which long-continued peace hath since abolished.'—SIR JOHN HAYWARD. 'Solon abrogated all Draco's sanguinary laws, except those that affected murder.'—CUMBERLAND.

Laws are repealed or abrogated; but the former of these terms is mostly in modern use, the latter is applied to the proceedings of the ancients. Edicts are revoked. Official proceedings, contracts, &c. are annulled. Deeds, bonds, obligations, debts, &c. are cancelled.

The introduction of new customs will cause the abolition of the old. 'On the parliament's part it was proposed that all the bishops, deans, and chapters might be immediately taken away and abolished.'—CLARENDON. None can repeat, but those that have the power to make laws; 'If the Presbyterians should obtain their ends, I could not be sorry to find them mistaken in the point which they have most at heart, by the repeal of the test; I mean the benefit of employments.'—SWIFT. The revocation of any edict is the individual act of one who has the power to publish it; 'When we abrogate a law as being ill made, the whole cause for which it has been made still remaining, do we not herein revoke our own deed, and upbraid ourselves with folly?'—HOOKER. To annul may be the act of superiour authority, or an agreement between the parties from whom the act emanated; a reciprocal obligation is annulled by the mutual consent of those who have imposed it on each other; but if the obligation be an authoritative act, the annulment must be so too;

I will annul

By the high power with which the laws invest me,
Those guilty forms in which you have entrapp'd,
Basely entrapp'd, to thy detested nuptials,
My queen betroth'd.—THOMSON

To cancel is the act of an individual towards another on whom he has a legal demand; an obligation may be cancelled, either by a resignation of right on the part of the one to whom it belonged, or a satisfaction of the demand on the part of the obliged person;

This hour makes friendships which he breaks the next,

And every breach supplies a vile pretext,
Basely to cancel all concessions past,
If in a thousand you deny the last.

CUMBERLAND.

A change of taste, aided by political circumstances, has caused the abolition of justs and tournaments and other military sports in Europe. The Roman people sometimes abrogated from party spirit what the magistrates enacted for the good of the republic; the same restless temper would lead many to wish for the repeal of the most salutary acts of our parliament.

Caprice, which has often dictated the proclamation of a decree in arbitrary governments, has occasioned its revocation after a short interval.

It is sometimes prudent to annul proceedings which have been decided upon hastily.

A generous man may be willing to cancel a debt; but a grateful man preserves the debt in his mind, and will never suffer it to be cancelled.

TO BLOT OUT, EXPUNGE, RAISE OR ERASE, EFFACE, CANCEL, OBLITERATE.

Blot is in all probability a variation of spot, signifying to cover over with a blot; expunge, in Latin expungo, compounded of ex and pungo to prick, signifies to put out by pricking with the pen; erase, comes from the Latin erasus, participle of erado, that is, er and rado to scratch out; efface, in French effacer, compounded of the Latin e and facio to make, signifies literally to make or put out; cancel, in French canceller, Latin cancello, from cancelli lattice-work, signifies to strike out with cross lines; obliterate, in Latin obliteratus, participle of oblitero, compounded of ob and littera, signifies to cover over letters.

All these terms obviously refer to characters that are impressed on bodies: the first three apply in the proper sense only to that which is written with the hand, and bespeak the manner in which the action is performed. Letters are blotted out, so that they cannot be seen again; they are expunged, so as to signify that they cannot stand for any thing; they are erased, so that the space may be reoccupied with writing. The last three are extended in their application to other characters formed on other substances: efface is general, and does not designate either the manner or the object: inscriptions on stone may be effaced, which are rubbed off so as not to be visible: cancel is principally confined to written or printed characters; they are cancelled by striking through them with the pen; in this manner, leaves or pages of a book are cancelled which are no longer to be used as a part of a work; obliterate is said of all characters, but without defining the mode in which they are put out; letters are obliterated, which are in any way made illegible.

Efface applies to images, or the representations of things; in this manner the likeness of a person may be effaced from a statue; cancel respects the subject which is written or printed; obliterate respects the single letters which constitute words.

Effacing is the consequence of some direct action on the thing which is effaced; in this manner writing may be effaced from a wall by the action of the elements: cancel is the act of a person, and always the fruit of design: obliterate is the fruit of accident and circumstances in general; time itself may obliterate characters on a wall or on paper.

The metaphorical use of these terms is easily deducible from the preceding explanation; what is figuratively described, as written in a book, may be said to be blotted; thus our sins are blotted out by the atoning blood of Christ, and in the same manner things may be blotted out from the mind or the recollection; 'If virtue is of this amiable nature, what can we think of those who can look upon it with an eye of hatred and ill-will, and can suffer themselves, from their aversion for a party, to blot out all the merit of the person who is engaged in it.'—ADDISON. When the contents of a book are in part rejected, they are aptly described as being expunged; in this manner, the free-thinking sects expunge every thing from the Bible which does not suit their purpose, or they expunge from their creed what does not humour their passions; 'I believe that any person who was of age to take a part in public concerns forty years ago (if the intermediate space were expunged from his memory) would hardly credit his senses when he should hear that an army of two hundred thousand men was kept up in this island.'—BURKE. When the memory is represented as having characters impressed, they are said to be erased, when they are, as it were, directly taken out and occupied by others; in this manner, the recollection of what a child has learned is easily erased by play; and with equal propriety sorrows may be said to efface the recollection of a person's image from the mind;

Yet the best blood by learning is refin'd,
And virtue arms the solid mind;
While vice will stain the noblest race,
And the paternal stamp efface.—OLDISWORTH

From the idea of striking out or cancelling a debt in an account book, a debt of gratitude, or an obligation, is said to be cancelled;

Yet these are they the world pronounces wise;
The world, which cancels nature's right and wrong,
And new casts wisdom.—YOUNG.

As the lineaments of the face correspond to written characters, we may say that all traces of his former greatness are obliterated; 'The transferring of the scene from Sicily to the Court of King Arthur, must have had a very pleasing effect, before the fabulous majesty of that court was quite obliterated.'—TYR. WHITT.

FORSAKEN, FORLORN, DESTITUTE.

To be forsaken, (v. To abandon) is to be deprived of the company and assistance of others; to be forlorn, from the German verlohren lost, is to be forsaken in time of difficulty, to be without a guide in an unknown road; to be destitute, from the Latin destitutus, is to be deprived of the first necessities of life.

To be forsaken is a partial situation; to be forlorn and destitute are permanent conditions. We may be forsaken by a fellow-traveller on the road; we are forlorn when we get into a deserted path, with no one to direct us; we are destitute when we have no means of subsistence, nor the prospect of obtaining the means. It is particularly painful to be forsaken by the friend of our youth, and the sharer of our fortunes.

But fearful for themselves, my countrymen
Left me forsaken in the Cyclops' den.

DRYDEN.

The orphan, who is left to travel the road of life without counsellor or friend, is of all others in the most forlorn condition; 'Conscience made them (Joseph's brethren) recollect, that they who had once been deaf to the supplications of a brother, were now left friendless and forlorn.'—BLAIR. If poverty be added to forlornness, a man's misery is aggravated by his becoming destitute; 'Friendless and destitute, Mr. Goldsmith was exposed to all the miseries of indigence in a foreign country.'—JOHNSON.

PROFLIGATE, ABANDONED, REPROBATE.

Profligate, in Latin profligatus, participle of profligo, compounded of the intensive pro and fligo to dash or beat, signifies completely ruined and lost to every thing; abandoned signifies given up to one's lusts and vicious indulgences; reprobate (v. To reprove) signifies one thoroughly rejected.

These terms, in their proper acceptation, express the most wretched condition of fortune into which it is possible for any human being to be plunged, and consequently in their improper application they denote that state of moral desertion and ruin which cannot be exceeded in wickedness or depravity. 'A profligate man has lost all by his vices, consequently to his vices alone he looks for the regaining those goods of fortune which he has squandered; as he has nothing to lose, and every thing to gain in his own estimation, by pursuing the career of his vices, he surpasses all others in his unprincipled conduct; 'Aged wisdom can check the most forward, and abash the most profligate.'—BLAIR. An abandoned man is altogether abandoned to his passions, which, having the entire sway over him, naturally impel him to every excess; 'To be negligent of what any one thinks of you, does not only show you arrogant but abandoned.'—HUGHES. The reprobate man is one who has been reprov'd until he becomes insensible to reproof, and is given up to the malignity of his own passions;

And here let those who boast in mortal things,
Learn how their greatest monuments of fame,
And strength, and art, are easily outdone
By reprobate spirits.—MILTON.

The profligate man is the greatest enemy to society; the abandoned man is a still greater enemy to himself; the profligate man lives upon the publick, whom he plunders or defrauds; the abandoned man lives for the indulgence of his own unbridled passions; the reprobate man is little better than an outcast both by God and man: unprincipled debtors, gamblers, sharper, swindlers, and the like, are profligate characters; whoremasters, drunkards, spendthrifts, seducers, and debauchees of all descriptions, are abandoned characters; although the profligate and abandoned are commonly the same persons, yet the young are in general abandoned, and those more hackneyed in vice are profligate: none can be reprobate but those who have been long inured to profligate courses.

HEINOUS, FLAGRANT, FLAGITIOUS, ATROCIOUS.

Heinous, in French heinous, Greek αλγος or δεινός terrible; flagrant, in Latin flagrans burning, is a figurative expression for what is excessive and violent in its nature; flagitious, in Latin flagitiosus, from flagitium infamy, signifies peculiarly infamous; atrocious, in Latin atrox cruel, from ater black, signifies exceeding-ly black.

These epithets, which are applied to crimes, seem to rise in degree. A crime is heinous which seriously offends against the laws of men; a sin is heinous which seriously offends against the will of God; 'There are many authors who have shown wherein the malignity of a lie consists, and set forth in proper colours the heinousness of the offence.'—ADDISON. An offence is flagrant which is in direct defiance of established opinions and practice; 'If any flagrant deed occur to smite a man's conscience, on this he cannot avoid resting with anxiety and terror.'—BLAIR. An act is flagitious if it be a gross violation of the moral law, or coupled with any grossness; 'It is recorded of Sir Matthew Hale, that he for a long time concealed the consecration of himself to the stricter duties of religion, lest by some flagitious action he should bring piety into disgrace.'—JOHNSON. A crime is atrocious which is attended with any aggravating circumstances; 'The wickedness of a loose or profane author is more atrocious than that of the giddy libertine.'—JOHNSON. Lying is a heinous sin; gaming and drunkenness are flagrant breaches of the Divine law; the murder of a whole family is in the fullest sense atrocious.

BARE, NAKED, UNCOVERED.

Bare, in Saxon bare, German bar, Hebrew פָּרֵץ to lay bare; naked, in Saxon naced, German nackt or nakt, low German naakt, Swedish nakot, Danish nogen, &c. comes from the Latin nudus, compounded of ne not, and datus or indatus clothed, and the Greek δύω to clothe.

Bare marks the condition of being without some necessary appendage; 'Though the lords used to be covered while the commons were bare, yet the commons would not be bare before the Scottish commissioners; and so none were covered.'—CLARENDON. Naked denotes the absence of an external covering or something essential; bare is therefore often substituted for naked although not vice versâ: we speak of bareheaded, barefoot, to expose the bare arm; but a figure is said to be naked, or the body is naked.

When applied to other objects, bare conveys the idea of want in general; naked simply the want of something exterior: when we speak of sitting upon the bare ground, of laying any place bare, of bare walls, a bare house, the idea of want in essentials is strongly conveyed; but naked walls, naked fields, a naked appearance, all denote something wanting to the eye. Bare in this sense is frequently followed by the object that is wanted; naked is mostly employed as an ad-junct; a tree is bare of leaves; this constitutes it a naked tree; 'The story of Æneas, on which Virgil founded his poem, was very bare of circumstances.'—ADDISON.

Why turn'st thou from me? I'm alone already;
Methinks I stand upon a naked beach,
Sighing to winds and to the seas complaining.

OTWAY.

They preserve the same analogy in their figurative application: a bare sufficiency is that which scarcely suffices; 'Christ and the Apostles did most earnestly inculcate the belief of his Godhead, and accepted mer upon the bare acknowledgement of this.'—SOUTH. The naked truth is that which has nothing about it to intercept the view of it from the mind;

The truth appears so naked on my side,
That any purblind eye may find it out.

SHAKESPEARE.

Sometimes the word naked may be applied in the exact sense of bare to imply the want of some necessary addition, when it expresses the idea more strongly than bare; 'Not that God doth require nothing unto happiness at the hands of men, saving only a naked belief, for hope and charity we may not exclude.'—HOOKER.

Naked and uncovered bear a strong resemblance to each other; to be naked is in fact to have the body uncovered, but many things are uncovered which are not naked: nothing is said to be naked but what in the nature of things, or according to the usages of men, ought to be covered;

He pitying how they stood
Before him naked to the air, that now
Must suffer change;—

As father of his family, he clad
Their nakedness with skins of beasts.—MILTON

Every thing is uncovered from which the covering is removed; 'In the eye of that Supreme Being to whom our whole internal frame is uncovered, dispositions hold the place of actions.'—BLAIR. According to our natural sentiments of decency, or our acquired sentiments of propriety, we expect to see the naked body covered with clothing, the naked tree covered with leaves; the naked walls covered with paper or paint; and the naked country covered with verdure or habitations: on the other hand, plants are left uncovered to receive the benefit of the sun or rain: furniture or articles of use or necessity are left uncovered to suit the convenience of the user: or a person may be uncovered, in the sense of bare-headed, on certain occasions.

BARE, SCANTY, DESTITUTE.

Bare (v. Bare, naked): scanty, from to scant, signifies the quality of scanting; scant is most probably changed from the Latin scindo to clip or cut; destitute, in Latin destitutus, participial of destituō, compounded of de privative and statuo to appoint or provide for, signifies unprovided for or wanting.

All these terms denote the absence or deprivation of some necessary. Bare and scanty have a relative sense: bare respects what serves for ourselves; scanty that which is provided by others. A subsistence is bare; a supply is scanty. An imprudent person will estimate as a bare competence what would supply an economist with superfluities; 'Were it for the glory of God, that the clergy should be left as bare as the apostles when they had neither staff nor scrip, God would, I hope, endure them with the self-same affection.'—HOOKER. A hungry person will consider as a scanty allowance what would more than suffice for a moderate eater; 'So scanty is our present allowance of happiness, that in many situations life could scarcely be supported, if hope were not allowed to relieve the present hour, by pleasures borrowed from the future.'—JOHNSON.

Bare is said of those things which belong to the corporeal sustenance; destitute is said of one's outward circumstances in general. A person is bare of clothes or money; he is destitute of friends, of resources, or of comforts; 'Destitute of that faithful guide, the compass, the ancients had no other method of regulating their course than by observing the sun and stars.'—ROBERTSON.

BARE, MERE.

Bare (v. Bare, naked); mere, in Latin merus mere, properly solus alone, from the Greek μετρω to divide, signifies separated from others.

Bare is used in a positive sense: mere, negatively. The bare recital of some events brings tears. The mere circumstance of receiving favours ought not to bind any person to the opinions of another.

The bare idea of being in the company of a murderer is apt to awaken horror in the mind; 'He who goes no farther than bare justice, stops at the beginning of virtue.'—BLAIR. The mere attendance at a place of worship is the smallest part of a Christian's duty; 'I would advise every man, who would not appear in the world a mere scholar or philosopher, to make himself master of the social virtue of complaisance.'—ADDISON.

SCARCITY, DEARTH.

Scarcity (v. Rare) is a generic term to denote the circumstance of a thing being scarce: dearth, which is the same as dearness, is a mode of scarcity applied in the literal sense to provisions mostly, as provisions are mostly dear when they are scarce; the word dearth therefore denotes scarcity in a high degree: whatever men want, and find it difficult to procure, they complain of its scarcity; when a country has the misfortune to be visited with a famine, it experiences the frightfullest of all dearths.

RARE, SCARCE, SINGULAR.

Rare, in Latin rarus, comes from the Greek ἀραιός; thin; scarce, in Dutch schaers sparing, comes from scheren to cut or clip, signifying cut close; singular (v. Particular.)

Rare and scarce both respect number and quantity, which admits of expansion or diminution: rare is a thinned number, a diminished quantity; scarce is a short quantity.

Rare is applied to matters of convenience or luxury; scarce to matters of utility or necessity: that which is rare becomes valuable, and fetches a high price; that which is scarce becomes precious, and the loss of it is seriously felt. The best of every thing is in its nature rare; there will never be a superfluity of such things; there are, however, some things, as particularly curious plants, or particular animals, which, owing to circumstances, are always rare: that which is most in use, will, in certain cases, be scarce; when the supply of an article fails, and the demand for it continues, it naturally becomes scarce. An aloe in blossom is a rarity, for nature has prescribed such limits to its growth as to give but very few of such flowers; 'A perfect union of wit and judgement is one of the rarest things in the world.'—BURKE. The paintings of Raphael, and other distinguished painters, are daily becoming more scarce, because time will diminish their quantity, although not their value; 'When any particular piece of money grew very scarce, it was often received by a succeeding emperor.'—ADDISON.

What is rare will often be singular, and what is singular will often, on that account, be rare; but they are not necessarily applied to the same object: fewness is the idea common to both; but rare is said of that of which there might be more; but singular is applied to that which is single, or nearly single, in its kind. The rare is that which is always sought for; the singular is not always that which one esteems: a thing is rare which is difficult to be obtained; a thing is singular for its peculiar qualities, good or bad; 'We should learn, by reflecting on the misfortunes which have attended others, that there is nothing singular in those which befall ourselves.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero). Indian plants are many of them rare in England, because the climate will not agree with them; the sensitive plant is singular, as its quality of yielding to the touch distinguishes it from all other plants.

Scarce is applied only in the proper sense to physical objects; rare and singular are applicable to moral objects. One speaks of a rare instance of fidelity of which many like examples cannot be found; of a singular instance of depravity, when a parallel case can scarcely be found.

SIMPLE, SINGLE, SINGULAR.

Simple, in Latin simplex or sine plicā without a fold, is opposed to the complex, which has many folds, or to the compound which has several parts involved or connected with each other; 'To make the compound for the rich metal simple, is an adulteration or counterfeiting.'—BACON. Single and singular (v. One) are opposed, one to double, and the other to multifarious;

Mankind with other animals compare,
Single how weak and impotent they are

JENYNS

'These busts of the emperours and empresses are all very scarce, and some of them almost singular in their kind.'—ADDISON. We may speak of a simple circumstance as independent of any thing; of a single instance or circumstance as unaccompanied by any other; and a singular instance as one that rarely has its like. In the moral application to the person, simplicity, as far as it is opposed to duplicity in the heart, can never be excessive; but when it lies in the head, so that it cannot penetrate the folds and doublings of other persons, it is a fault; 'Nothing extraneous must cleave to the eye in the act of seeing; its bare object must be as naked as truth, as simple and unminged as sincerity.'

—SOUTH. Singleness of heart and intention is that species of simplicity which is altogether to be admired; singularity may be either good or bad according to circumstances: to be singular in virtue is to be truly good; but to be singular in manner is affectation, which is at variance with genuine simplicity, if not directly opposed to it; 'From the union of the crowns to the Revolution in 1688, Scotland was placed in a political situation the most singular and most unhappy'—ROBERTSON.

SOME, ANY.

Some, probably contracted from so a one or such a one, is altogether restrictive in its sense: any, from a one, is altogether universal and indefinite. Some applies to one particular part in distinction from the rest. Any to every individual part without distinction. Some think this, and others that: any person might believe if he would; any one can conquer his passions who calls in the aid of religion. In consequence of this distinction in sense, some can only be used in particular affirmative propositions; but any, which is equivalent to all, may be either in negative, interrogative, or hypothetical propositions: some say so: does any one believe it? He will not give to any.

SOLITARY, SOLE, ONLY, SINGLE.

Solitary and sole are both derived from solus alone or whole; only, that is only, signifies the quality of unity; single is an abbreviation of singular (v. Simple).

All these terms are more or less opposed to several or many. Solitary and sole signify one left by itself; the former mostly in application to particular sensible objects, the latter in regard mostly to moral objects: a solitary shrub expresses not only one shrub, but one that has been left to itself;

The cattle in the fields and meadows green,
Those rare and solitary, these in flocks.—MILTON.

The sole cause or reason signifies that reason or cause which stands unsupported by any thing else; 'All things are but insipid to a man in comparison of that one, which is the sole minion of his fancy.'—SOUTH. Only does not include the idea of desertion or deprivation, but it comprehends that of want or deficiency: to say of a person that he has only one shilling in his pocket, means to imply, that he wants more or ought to have more. Single signifies simply one or more detached from others, without conveying any other collateral idea: a single sheet of paper may be sometimes more convenient than a double one; a single shilling may be all that is necessary for the present purpose: there may be single ones, as well as a single one; but the other terms exclude the idea of there being any thing else,

Thy fear

Will save us trial, what the least can do,
Single against the wicked.—MILTON.

A solitary act of generosity is not sufficient to characterize a man as generous: with most criminals the sole ground of their defence rests upon their not having learned to know and do better: harsh language and severe looks are not the only means of correcting the faults of others: single instances of extraordinary talents now and then present themselves in the course of an age.

In the adverbial form, solely, only, and singly are employed with a similar distinction. The disasters which attend an unsuccessful military enterprise are seldom to be attributed solely to the incapacity of the general: there are many circumstances both in the natural and moral world which are to be accounted for only by admitting a providence as presented to us in Divine revelation: there are many things which men could not effect singly that might be effected by them conjointly

ONE, SINGLE, ONLY.

Unity is the common idea of all these terms; and at the same time the whole signification of one, which is opposed to none; single, in Latin singulus each or one by itself, probably contracted from sine angulo without an angle, because what is entirely by itself cannot form an angle, signifies that one which is abstracted from others, and is particularly opposed to two, or a double which may form a pair; only, contracted from only, signifying in the form of unity, is employed for that of which there is no more. A person has one child, is a positive expression that bespeaks its own meaning: a person has a single child, conveys the idea that there ought to be or might be more, that more was expected, or that once there were more: a person has an only child, implies that he never had more;

For shame, Rutilians, can you bear the sight
Of one exposed for all, in single fight?—DRYDEN.

Homely but wholesome roots
My daily food, and water from the nearest spring
My only drink.—FILMER.

BESIDES, MOREOVER.

Besides that is, by the sidé, next to, marks simply the connexion which subsists between what goes before and what follows; moreover, that is, more than all else, marks the addition of something particular to what has already been said.

Thus in enumerating the good qualities of an individual, we may say, "he is besides of a peaceable disposition." On concluding any subject of question we may introduce a farther clause by a moreover: "Moreover we must not forget the claims of those who will suffer by such a change;" "Now, the best way in the world for a man to seem to be any thing, is really to be what he would seem to be. Besides, that it is many times as troublesome to make good the pretence of a good quality as to have it."—TILLOTSON. 'It being granted that God governs the world, it will follow also that he does it by means suitable to the natures of the things that he governs; and moreover man being by nature a free, moral agent, and so capable of deviating from his duty, as well as performing it, it is necessary that he should be governed by laws'—SOUTH.

BESIDES, EXCEPT.

Besides (v. Moreover), which is here taken as a preposition, expresses the idea of addition; except expresses that of exclusion.

There were many there besides ourselves; no one except ourselves will be admitted; ' Besides impiety discontent carries along with it as its inseparable concomitants, several other sinful passions.'—BLAIR. 'Neither jealousy nor envy can dwell with the Supreme Being. He is a rival to none, he is an enemy to none, except to such as, by rebellion against his laws seek enmity with him.'—BLAIR.

UNLESS, EXCEPT.

Unless, which is equivalent to if less, if not, or if one fail, is employed only for the particular case; but except has always a reference to some general rule, of which an exception is hereby signified: I shall not do it unless he ask me; no one can enter except those who are provided with tickets; ' Unless money can be borrowed, trade cannot be carried on.'—BLACKSTONE. 'If a wife continues in the use of her jewels till her husband's death, she shall afterward retain them against his executors and administrators, and all other persons except creditors.'—BLACKSTONE.

HOWEVER, YET, NEVERTHELESS.
NOTWITHSTANDING.

These conjunctions are in grammar termed adversative, because they join sentences together that stand more or less in opposition to each other. However is the most general and indefinite; it serves as a conclusive deduction drawn from the whole.

The truth is however not yet all come out: by which is understood that much of the truth has been told, and much yet remains to be told: so likewise in similar sentences; I am not, however, of that opinion; where it is implied either that many hold the opinion, or much may be said of it; but be that as it may, I am not of that opinion: however you may rely on my assistance to that amount; that is, at all events, let whatever happen, you may rely on so much of my assistance: however, as is obvious from the above examples, connects not only one single proposition, but many propositions either expressed or understood; ' However it is but just sometimes to give the world a representation of the bright side of human nature.'—HUGHES. Yet, nevertheless, and notwithstanding, are mostly employed to set two specific propositions either in contrast or direct opposition to each other; the two latter are but species of the former, pointing out the opposition in a more specific manner.

There are cases in which yet is peculiarly proper: others in which nevertheless, and others in which not withstanding, is preferable. Yet bespeaks a simple contrast; Addison was not a good speaker, yet he was an admirable writer; Johnson was a man of uncouth manners, yet he had a good heart and a sound head: 'He had not that reverence for the queen as might have been expected from a man of his wisdom and breeding; yet he was impertinently solicitous to know what her Majesty said of him in private.'—CLAREN

DO. Nevertheless and notwithstanding could not in these cases have been substituted. Nevertheless and notwithstanding are mostly used to imply effects or consequences opposite to what might naturally be expected to result. He has acted an unworthy part; nevertheless I will be a friend to him as far as I can; that is, although he has acted an unworthy part, I will be no less his friend as far as lies in my power; 'There will always be something that we shall wish to have finished, and be nevertheless unwilling to begin.'—JOHNSON. Notwithstanding all I have said, he still persists in his own imprudent conduct, that is, all I have said notwithstanding or not restraining him from it, he still persists. He is still rich notwithstanding his loss; that is, his loss notwithstanding, or not standing in the way of it, he is still rich; 'Notwithstanding there is such infinite room between man and his Maker for the creative power to exert itself in, it is impossible that it ever should be filled up.'—ADDISON. From this resolution of the terms, more than from any specific rule, we may judge of their distinct applications, and clearly perceive that in such cases as those above-cited the conjunctions nevertheless and notwithstanding could not be substituted for each other, nor yet for either: in other cases, however, where the objects are less definitely pointed out, they may be used indifferently. The Jesuits piqued themselves always upon their strict morality, and yet (notwithstanding, or nevertheless) they admitted of many things not altogether consonant with moral principle: you know that these are but tales, yet (notwithstanding, nevertheless) you believe them.

ALL, WHOLE.

All and whole are derived from the same source, that is, in German all and heil whole or sound, Dutch all, hel, or heel, Saxon al, wal, Danish al, ald, Greek ἅλος, Hebrew כָּל.

All respects a number of individuals; whole respects a single body with its components: we have not all, if we have not the whole number; we have not the whole, if we have not all the parts of which it is composed. It is not within the limits of human capacity to take more than a partial survey of all the interesting objects which the whole globe contains.

When applied to spiritual objects in a general sense, all is preferred to whole; but when the object is specific, whole is preferable: thus we say, all hope was lost; but, our whole hope rested in this; 'It will be asked how the drama moves if it be not credited. It is credited with all the credit due to a drama.'—JOHNSON. 'The whole story of the transactions between Edward Harold and the Duke of Normandy is told so differently by ancient writers, that there are few important passages of the English history liable to so great uncertainty.'—HUME.

ALL, EVERY, EACH.

All is collective; every single or individual; each distributive.

All and every are universal in their signification; each is restrictive: the former are used in speaking of great numbers; the latter is applicable to small numbers. All men are not born with the same talent, either in degree or kind; but every man has a talent peculiar to himself: a parent divides his property among his children, and gives to each his due share; 'Harold by his marriage broke all measures with the Duke of Normandy.'—HUME. 'Every man's performances, to be rightly estimated, must be compared to the state of the age in which he lived.'—JOHNSON. 'Taken singly and individually, it might be difficult to conceive how each event wrought for good. They must be viewed in their consequences and effects.'—BLAIR.

NUMEROUS, NUMERAL, NUMERICAL.

Numerous signifies literally containing a number, and is taken to denote a great many or a great number; numeral and numerical both imply belonging to number. Numeral is applied to a class of words in grammar, as a numeral adjective, or a numeral noun: numerical is applied to whatever other objects respect number as a numerical difference, where the difference subsists between any two numbers, or is expressed by numbers.

SPECIAL, SPECIFIC, PARTICULAR.

Special, in Latin specialis, signifies belonging to the species; particular, belonging to a particle or small part; specific, in Latin specificus, from species a species, and facio to make, signifies making a species. The special is that which comes under the general; the particular is that which comes under the special: hence we speak of a special rule; but a particular case; 'God claims it as a special part of his prerogative to have the entire disposal of riches.'—SOUTH. Particular and specific are both applied to the properties of individuals; but particular is said of the contingent circumstances of things, specific of their inherent properties; every plant has something particular in itself different from others, it is either longer or shorter, weaker or stronger; 'Every state has a particular principle of happiness, and this principle may in each be carried to a mischievous excess.'—GOLDSMITH. The specific property of a plant is that which it has in common with its species; 'The imputation of being a fool is a thing which mankind, of all others, is the most impatient of, it being a blot upon the prime and specific perfection of human nature.'—SOUTH. Particular is, therefore, a term adapted to loose discourse; specific is a scientific term which describes things minutely.

The same may be said of particularize and specify: we particularize for the sake of information; we specify for the sake of instruction: in describing a man's person and dress we particularize if we mention every thing singly which can be said upon it; in delineating a plan it is necessary to specify time, place, distance, materials, and every thing else which may be connected with the carrying of it into execution.

PARTICULAR, INDIVIDUAL.

Particular (v. Peculiar); individual, in French individuel, Latin individuus, signifies that which cannot be divided.

Both these terms are employed to express one object; but particular is much more specific than individual; the particular confines us to one object only of many, but individual may be said of any one object among many. A particular object cannot be misunderstood for any other, while it remains particular; but the individual object can never be known from other individual objects, while it remains only individual. Particular is a term used in regard to individuals, and is opposed to the general: individual is a term used in regard to collectives; and is opposed to the whole or that which is divisible into parts; 'Those particular speeches, which are commonly known by the name of rants, are blemishes in our English tragedy.'—ADDISON.

To give thee being, I lent

Out of my side to thee, nearest my heart,

Substantial life, to have thee by my side,

Henceforth an individual solace dear.—MILTON

ALONE, SOLITARY, LONELY.

Alone, compounded of all and one, signifies altogether one, or single; that is, by one's self; solitary, in French solitaire, Latin solitarius, from solus alone, signifies the quality of being alone; lonely signifies in the manner of alone.

Alone marks the state of a person; solitary the quality of a person or thing; lonely the quality of a thing only. A person walks alone, or takes a solitary walk in a lonely place.

Whoever likes to be much alone is of a solitary turn;

Here we stand alone,

As in our form distinct, pre-eminent.—YOUNG.

Wherever a man can be most and oftenest alone, that is a solitary or lonely place; 'I would wish no man to deceive himself with opinions which he has not thoroughly reflected upon in his solitary hours.'—CUMBERLAND

Within an ancient forest's ample verge
There stands a lonely, but a healthful dwelling,
Built for convenience and the use of life.—ROWE.

ALSO, LIKEWISE, TOO.

Also, compounded of all and so, signifies literally all in the same manner; likewise, compounded of like and wise or manner, signifies in like manner; too, a variation of the numeral two, signifies what may be added or joined to another thing from its similarity.

These adverbial expressions obviously convey the same idea of including or classing certain objects together upon a supposed ground of affinity. Also is a more general term, and has a more comprehensive meaning, as it implies a sameness in the whole; 'Let us only think for a little of that reproach of modern times, that gulf of time and fortune, the passion for gaining, which is so often the refuge of the idle sons of pleasure, and often also the last resource of the ruined.'—BLAIR. Likewise is more specific and limited in its acceptance; 'All the duties of a daughter, a sister, a wife, and a mother, may be well performed, though a lady should not be the finest woman at an opera. They are likewise consistent with a moderate share of wit, a plain dress, and a modest air.'—STEELE.

Too is still more limited than either, and refers only to a single object; 'Long life is of all others the most general, and seemingly the most innocent object of desire. With respect to this, too, we so frequently err, that it would have been a blessing to many to have had their wish denied.'—BLAIR.

'He also was among the number' may convey the idea of totality both as respects the person and the event: 'he writes likewise a very fine hand' conveys the idea of similar perfection in his writing as in other qualifications: 'he said so too,' signifies he said so in addition to the others; he said it likewise would imply that he said the same thing, or in the same manner.

SOLITARY, DESERT, DESOLATE.

Solitary is derived from the Latin solus alone; desert is the same as deserted; desolate, in Latin desolatus, signifies made solitary.

All these epithets are applied to places, but with different modifications of the common idea of solitude which belongs to them. The solitary simply denotes the absence of all beings of the same kind: thus a place is solitary to a man, where there is no human being but himself; and it is solitary to a brute, when there are no brutes with which it can hold society: 'The first time we beheld the hero (Ulysses), we find him disconsolately sitting on the solitary shore, sighing to return to Ithaca.'—WHARTON. Desert conveys the idea of a place made solitary by being shunned, from its unfitness as a place of residence; all deserts are places of such wildness as seems to frighten away almost all inhabitants;

A peopled city made a desert place.—DRYDEN.

Desolate conveys the idea of a place made solitary, or bare of inhabitants, and all traces of habitation, by violent means; every country may become desolate which is exposed to the inroads of a ravaging army;

Supporting and supported, polish'd friends
And dear relations mingle into bliss;
But this the rugged savage never felt,
E'en desolate in crowds.—THOMSON

TO RECEDE, RETREAT, RETIRE, WITHDRAW, SECEDE.

To recede is to go back; to retreat is to draw back; the former is a simple action, suited to one's convenience; the latter is a particular action, dictated by necessity: we recede by a direct backward movement; we retreat by an indirect backward movement: we recede a few steps in order to observe an object more distinctly; we retreat from the position we have taken, in order to escape danger: whoever can advance can recede; but in general those only retreat whose advance is not free: receding is the act of every one; retreating is peculiarly the act of soldiers, or those who make hostile movements. To retire and withdraw originally signify the same as retreat, that is, draw back or off; but they agree in application mostly with recede: to recede is to go back from a given spot; but to retire and withdraw have respect to the place or the presence of the persons: we may recede on an open plain; but we retire or withdraw from a room, or from some company. In this application withdraw is the more familiar term: retire may likewise be used for an army; but it denotes a much more leisurely action than retreat: a general retreats, by compulsion, from an enemy; but he may retire from an enemy's country when there is no enemy present.

Recede, retire, withdraw, and retreat, are also used in a moral application; secede is used only in this sense: a person recedes from his engagement, which is seldom justifiable; or he may recede from his pretensions, which is mostly commendable; 'We were soon brought to the necessity of receding from our imagined equality with our cousins.'—JOHNSON. A person retires from business when he ceases to carry it on any longer; 'Retirement from the world's cares and pleasures has been often recommended as useful to repentance.'—JOHNSON. A person withdraws from a society either for a time or altogether; 'A temptation may withdraw for awhile, and return again.'—SOUTH. As life is religiously considered as a warfare with the world, they are said to retreat from the contest who do not enter into its pleasures; 'How certain is our ruin, unless we sometimes retreat from this pestilential region (the world of pleasure).'—BLAIR. To secede is a public act: men secede from a religious or political body: withdraw is a private act; they withdraw themselves as individual members from any society; 'Pisistratus and his sons maintained their usurpations during a period of sixty-eight years, including those of Pisistratus's secessions from Athens.'—CUMBERLAND.

PRIVACY, RETIREMENT, SECLUSION.

Privacy literally denotes the abstract quality of private; but when taken by itself it signifies the state of being private: retirement literally signifies the abstract act of retiring; and seclusion that of secluding one's self: but retirement by itself frequently denotes a state of being retired, or a place of retirement; seclusion, a state of being secluded; hence we say a person lives in privacy, in retirement, in seclusion; privacy is opposed to publicity; he who lives in privacy, therefore, is one who follows no public line, who lives so as to be little known;

Fly with me to some safe, some sacred privacy.
ROWE

Retirement is opposed to openness or freedom of access; he, therefore, who lives in retirement, withdraws from the society of others, he lives by himself; 'In our retirements every thing disposes us to be serious.'—ADDISON. Seclusion is the excess of retirement; he who lives in seclusion bars all access to himself; he shuts himself from the world;

What can thy imag'ry of sorrow mean?
Secluded from the world, and all its care,
Hast thou to grieve or joy, to hope or fear?

PRIOR

Privacy is most suitable for such as are in circumstances of humiliation, whether from their misfortune or their fault: retirement is peculiarly agreeable to those who are of a reflective turn; but seclusion is chosen only by those who labour under some strong affection of the mind, whether of a religious or physical nature.

TO ABDICATE, DESERT

The following celebrated speech of Lord Somers, in 1688, on King James's vacating the throne, may be admitted as a happy elucidation of these two important words; but I am not inclined to think that they come sufficiently close in signification to render any comparison necessary.

'What is appointed me to speak to is your Lordships' first amendment by which the word abdicated in the Commons' vote is changed into the word deserted, and I am to acquaint your Lordships what some of the grounds are that induced the Commons to insist on the word abdicated, and not to agree to your amendment.

'The first reason your Lordships are pleased to deliver for your changing the word is, that the word abdicated your Lordships do not find is a word known to the common law of England, and therefore ought not to be used. The next is that the common application of the word amounts to a voluntary express renunciation, which is not in this case, nor will follow from the premises.

"My Lords, as to the first of these reasons, if it be an objection that the word abdicated hath not a known sense in the common law of England, there is the same objection against the word deserted; so that your Lordships' first reason hath the same force against your own amendment, as against the term used by the Commons.

"The words are both Latin words, and used in the best authors, and both of a known signification; their meaning is very well understood, though it be true their meaning is not the same. The word abdicate doth naturally and properly signify, entirely to renounce, throw off, disown, relinquish any thing or person, so as to have no further to do with it; and that whether it be done by express words or in writing (which is the sense your Lordships put upon it, and which is properly called resignation or cession), or by doing such acts as are inconsistent with the holding and retaining of the thing, which the Commons take to be the present case, and therefore make choice of the word abdicate, as that which they thought did above all others express that meaning. And in this latter sense it is taken by others; and that this is the true signification of the word I shall show your Lordships out of the best authors.

"The first I shall mention is Grotius, De Jure Belli et Pacis, l. 2, c. 4, § 4. Venit enim hoc non ex jure civili, sed ex jure naturali, quo quisque suum potest abdicare, et ex naturali præsumptione, quâ voluisse quis creditur quod sufficienter significavit. And then he goes on: Recusari hereditas, non tantum verbis sed etiam re, potest, et quovis indicio voluntatis.

"Another instance which I shall mention, to show that for abdication a thing it is sufficient to do an act which is inconsistent with retaining it, though there be nothing of express renunciation, is out of Calvin's Lexicon Juridicum, where he says, Generum abdicat qui sponsam repudiât. Here is an abdication without express words, but it is by doing such an act as doth sufficiently signify his purpose.

"The next author I shall quote is Brissonius, De Verborum Significatione, who hath this passage: Homo liber qui seipsum vendit abdicat se statu suo. That is, he who sells himself hath thereby done such an act as cannot consist with his former state of freedom, and is thereby said properly se abdicasse statu suo.

"Budæus, in his Commentaries Ad Legem Secundam de Origine Juris, expounds the words in the same sense. Abdicare se magistratu est idem quod abire penitus magistratu. He that goes out of his office of magistracy, let it be in what manner he will, has abdicated the magistracy.

"And Grotius, in his Book de Jure Belli et Pacis, l. 1, c. 4, § 9, seems to expound the word abdicare by manifeste habere pro derelicto; that is, he who hath abdicated any thing hath so far relinquished it, that he hath no right of return to it. And that is the sense the Commons put upon the word. It is an entire alienation of the thing abdicated, and so stands in opposition to dicare. Dicat qui proprium aliquot facit, abdicat qui alienat; so says Praeleus in his Lexicon Juris. It is therefore insisted on as the proper word by the Commons.

"But the word deserted (which is the word used in the amendment made by your Lordships) hath not only a very doubtful signification, but in the common acceptance both of the civil and canon law, doth signify only a bare withdrawing, a temporary quitting of a thing, and neglect only, which leaveth the party at liberty of returning to it again. Desertum pro neglecto, says Spigelius in his Lexicon. But the difference between deserere and derelinquere is expressly laid down by Bartolus on the 8th law of the 58th title of the 11th book of the Code, and his words are these: Nota diligenter ex hac lege, quod aliud est agrum deserere, aliud derelinquere; qui enim derelinquit ipsum ex penitentia non revocare, sed qui deserit, intra biennium potest.

"Whereby it appears, my lords, that is called desertion which is temporary and relievable; that is called dereliction where there is no power or right to return.

"So in the best Latin authors, and in the civil law deserere exercitum is used to signify soldiers leaving their colours; and in the canon law to desert a benefice signifies no more than to be a non-resident.

"In both cases the party hath not only a right of returning, but is bound to return again; which, my Lords, as the Commons do not take to be the present case, so they cannot think that your Lordships do, because it is expressly said, in one of your reasons given in defence of the last amendment, that your Lordships have been and are willing to secure the nation against the return of King James, which your Lordships would in justice do, if you did look upon it to be no more than a negligent withdrawing, which leaveth a liberty to the party to return.

"For which reasons, my Lords, the Commons cannot agree to the first amendment, to insert the word deserted instead of abdicated; because it doth not in any sort come up to their sense of the thing, so they apprehend it doth not reach your Lordships' meaning as it is expressed in your reasons, whereas they look upon the word abdicated to express properly what is to be inferred from that part of the vote to which your Lordships have agreed, viz. 'That King James II., by going about to subvert the constitution, and by breaking the original contract between king and people, and by violating the fundamental laws, and withdrawing himself out of the kingdom, hath thereby renounced to be a king according to the constitution.' By avowing to govern according to a despotic power unknown to the constitution, and inconsistent therewith, he hath renounced to be a king according to the law; such a king as he swore to be at the coronation; such a king to whom the allegiance of an English subject is due; and hath set up another kind of dominion; which is to all intents an abdication or abandoning of his legal title as fully as if it had been done by express words.

"And, my Lords, for these reasons the Commons do insist upon the word abdicated, and cannot agree to the word deserted."

Without all this learned verbosity it will be obvious to every person that the two words are widely distinct from each other; abdication being a pure act of discretion for which a man is answerable to himself only; but desertion an act which involves more or less a breach of moral obligation.

TO DISMISS, DISCHARGE, DISCARD.

Dismiss, in Latin dimissus, participle of amitto, compounded of di and mitto, signifies to send away or away; discharge, signifies to release from a charge; discard, in Spanish descartar, compounded of des and cartar, signifies to lay cards out or aside, to cast them off.

The idea of removing to a distance is included in all these terms; but with various collateral circumstances. Dismiss is the general term; discharge and discard are modes of dismissing: dismiss is applicable to persons of all stations, but is used more particularly for the higher orders: discharge on the other hand is confined to those in a subordinate station. A clerk, or an officer, or a minister, is dismissed; 'In order to an accommodation, they agreed upon this preliminary, that each of them should immediately dismiss his privy counsellor.'—ADDISON. A menial servant or a soldier is discharged; 'Mr. Pope's errands were so frequent and frivolous that the footman in time avoided and neglected him, and the Earl of Oxford discharged some of his servants for their obstinate refusal of his messages.'—JOHNSON.

Neither dismiss nor discharge define the motive of the action; they are used indifferently for that which is voluntary, or the contrary: discard, on the contrary, always marks a dismissal that is not agreeable to the party discarded. A person may request to be dismissed or discharged, but never to be discarded. The dismissal, or discharge frees a person from the obligation or necessity of performing a certain duty;

Dismiss the people then, and give command

With strong repeat to hearten every band.—POPE

The discarding throws him out of a desirable rank or station: 'I am so great a lover of whatever is French, that I lately discarded an humble admirer because he neither spoke that tongue nor drank c'ertel.'—BURTON.

They are all applied to things in the moral sense, and with the same distinction: we are said to dismiss our fears, to discharge a duty, and to discard a sentiment from the mind:

Resume your courage, and dismiss your care.

DRYDEN.

If I am bound to pay money on a certain day, I discharge the obligation if I pay it before twelve o'clock at night.—BLACKSTONE. 'Justice discards party friendship and kindred.'—ADDISON.

TO LET, LEAVE, SUFFER.

Let, through the medium of the Gothick letan, and other changes in the French laisser, German lassen, &c. comes in all probability from the Latin lazo, to loosen, or set loose, free; leave (v. To leave); suffer, from the Latin suffero to bear with, signifies not to put a stop to.

The removal of hindrance or constraint on the actions of others, is implied by all these terms; but let is a less formal action than leave, and this than suffer. I let a person pass in the road by getting out of his way: I leave a person to decide on a matter according to his own discretion, by declining to interfere: I suffer a person to go his own way, over whom I am expected to exercise a control. It is in general most prudent to let things take their own course; 'Where there is a certainty and an uncertainty, let the uncertainty go, and hold to that which is certain.'—SAUNDERSON. In the education of youth, the greatest art lies in leaving them to follow the natural bent of their minds and turn of disposition without at the same time suffering them to do any thing prejudicial to their character or future interests;

This crime I could not leave unpunished.

DENHAM.

If Pope had suffered his hear: to be alienated from her, he could have found nothing that might fill her place.—JOHNSON.

TO LEAVE, QUIT, RELINQUISH.

Leave, in Saxon leavefe, in old German laube, Latin linguo, Greek λεγω, signifies either to leave or be wanting, because one is wanting in the place which one leaves; quit, in French quitter, from the Latin quietus rest, signifies to rest or remain, to give up the hold; the sense of relinquish is given under the head of Abandon.

We leave that to which we may intend to return; we quit that to which we return no more: we may leave a place voluntarily or otherwise; but we relinquish it unwillingly. We leave persons or things; we quit and relinquish things only. I leave one person in order to speak to another; I leave my house for a short time;

Why leave we not the fatal Trojan shore,
And measure back the seas we cross'd before?

POPE.

I quit it not to return to it; 'At last he (Savage) quitted the house of his friend.'—JOHNSON.

They preserve the same distinction in the moral application. A prudent man leaves all questions about minor matters in religion and politics to men of busy, restless tempers; 'We have no better materials to compound the priesthood of, than the mass of mankind, which, corrupted as it is, those who receive orders, must have some vices to leave behind them.'—SWIFT. It is a source of great pleasure to a contemplative mind to revisit the scenes of early childhood, which have been long quitted for the busy scenes of active life;

The sacred wrestler, till a blessing's giv'n,
Quits not his hold, but halting, conquers heav'n.

WALLER.

A miser is loath to relinquish the gain which has added so greatly to his stores and his pleasures; 'Although Charles relinquished almost every power for the crown, he would neither give up his friends to punishment, nor desert what he esteemed his religious duty.'—HUME

TO LEAVE, TAKE LEAVE, BID FAREWELL, OR ADIEU.

Leave is here general as before (v. To leave); it expresses simply the idea of separating one's self from an object, whether for a time or otherwise; to take leave and bid farewell imply a separation for a perpetuity.

To leave is an unqualified action, it is applied to objects of indifference, or otherwise, but supposes in general no exercise of one's feelings. We leave persons as convenience requires;

Self alone, in nature rooted fast,
Attends us first and leaves us last.—SWIFT.

We leave them on the road, in the field, in the house, or wherever circumstances direct; we leave them with or without speaking; to take leave is a parting ceremony between friends, on their parting for a considerable time; 'Now I am to take leave of my readers, I am under greater anxiety than I have known for the work of any day since I undertook this province.'—

STEELE. To bid farewell or adieu is a still more solemn ceremony, when the parting is expected to be final. When applied to things, we leave such as we do not wish to meddle with; we take leave of those things which were agreeable to us, but which we find it prudent to give up; and we bid farewell to those for which we still retain a great attachment; 'Anticipate the awful moment of your bidding the world an eternal farewell.'—BLAIR. It is better to leave a question undecided, than to attempt to decide it by altercation or violence; it is greater virtue in a man to take leave of his vices, than to let them take leave of him; when a man engages in schemes of ambition, he must bid adieu to all the enjoyments of domestic life.

LEAVE, LIBERTY, PERMISSION, LICENSE.

Leave has here the sense of freedom granted, because what is left to itself is left free; liberty, in Latin libertas, from liber free, denotes the state of being free from external restraint; permission signifies the act of permitting, or the thing permitted; license, in Latin licentia, from licet to be lawful, signifies the state of being permitted by law, or the act of the law in permitting.

Leave and liberty are either given or taken: permission is taken only; license is granted, and that in a special manner: leave is employed only on familiar occasions; 'I must have leave to be grateful to any one who serves me, let him be ever so obnoxious to any party.'—POPE. Liberty is given in more important matters; 'I am for the full liberty of diversion (for children), as much as you can be.'—LOCKE. The master gives leave to his servant to go out for his pleasure; a gentleman gives his friends the liberty of shooting on his grounds; leave is taken in indifferent matters, particularly as it respects leave of absence, liberty is taken by a greater, and in general an unauthorized stretch of one's powers, and is, therefore, an infringement on the rights of another. What is done without the leave may be done without the knowledge, though not contrary to the will, of another; but liberties which are taken without offering an apology are always calculated to give offence.

Leave is granted by private individuals, but license is granted by public authority: a parent gives leave to a child to take a walk; the government grants licenses for selling different commodities. The word license is however sometimes used figuratively;

Leaving the wits the spacious air,
With license to build castles there.—SWIFT.

Leave and permission are said to be asked for, but not liberty; we beg leave to offer our opinions; we request permission, but not liberty, to speak; 'The repeated permissions you give me of dealing freely with you will, I hope, excuse what I have done.'—POPE.

LEAVINGS, REMAINS, RELICKS.

Leavings are the consequence of a voluntary act they signify what is left: remains are what follow in the course of things; they are what remain; the former is therefore taken in the bad sense to signify what has been left as worthless; the latter is never taken in this bad sense. When many persons of good taste have the liberty of choosing, it is fair to expect that the leavings will be worth little or nothing, after all have made their choice;

Scales, fins, and bones, the leavings of the feast.

SOMERVILLE.

By the remains of beauty which are discoverable in the face of a female, we may be enabled to estimate what her personal charms had been;

So midnight tapers waste their last remains.

SOMERVILLE.

Remains signify literally what remains: relics, from the Latin relinquo to leave, that which is left. The former is a term of general and familiar application; the latter is specific. What remains after the use or consumption of any thing is termed the remains; what is left of any thing after a lapse of years is the relic or relics. There are remains of buildings mostly after a conflagration; there are relics of antiquity in most monasteries and old churches.

Remains are of value, or not, according to the circumstances of the cases; relics always derive a value from the person to whom they were supposed originally to belong. The remains of a person, that is, what corporeally remains of a person, after the extinction of life, will be respected by his friend;

Upon these friendly shores, and flow'ry plains,
Which hide Anchises, and his blest remains.

DRYDEN.

A bit of a garment that belonged, or is supposed to have belonged, to some saint, will be a precious relic in the eyes of a superstitious Roman Catholic; 'All those arts, rarities, and inventions, which the ingenious pursue, and all admire, are but the relic of an intellect defaced with sin and time.'—SOUTH. All nations have agreed to respect the remains of the dead; religion, under most forms, has given a sacredness to relics in the eyes of its most zealous votaries; the veneration of genius, or the devotedness of friendship, has in like manner transferred itself, from the individual himself, to some object which has been his property or in his possession, and thus fabricated for itself relics equally precious.

LOOSE, VAGUE, LAX, DISSOLUTE, LICENTIOUS.

Loose, in German los, &c., Latin laxus, Greek ἀλυσαι, and Hebrew לָחַץ to make free; vague, in Latin vagus, signifies wandering; lax, in Latin laxus, has a similar origin with loose; dissolute, in Latin dissolutus, participle of dissolvo, signifies dissolved or set free; licentious, i. e. having the license or power to do as one pleases (v. Leave, liberty).

Loose is the generic, the rest are specific terms; they are all opposed to that which is bound or adheres closely: loose is employed either for moral or intellectual subjects; vague only for intellectual objects; lax sometimes for what is intellectual, but oftener for the moral; dissolute and licentious only in moral matters: whatever wants a proper connexion, or linking together of the parts, is loose; whatever is scattered and remotely separated is vague: a style is loose where the words and sentences are not made to coalesce, so as to form a regularly connected series; assertions are vague which have but a remote connexion with the subject referred to: by the same rule, loose hints thrown out at random may give rise to speculation and conjecture, but cannot serve as the ground of any conclusion; ignorant people are apt to credit every vague rumour, and to communicate it as a certainty.

Opinions are loose, either inasmuch as they want logical precision, or as they fail in moral strictness; 'Because conscience and the fear of swerving from that which is right, maketh them diligent observers of circumstances, the loose regard whereof is the nurse of vulgar folly.'—HOOKER. Suggestions and surmises are in their nature vague, as they spring from a very remote channel, or are produced by the wanderings of the imagination; 'That action which is vague and indeterminate will at last settle into habit, and habitual peculiarities are quickly ridiculous.'—JOHNSON. Opinions are lax, inasmuch as they have a tendency to lessen the moral obligation, or to loosen moral ties; 'In this general depravity of manners and laxity of principles, pure religion is no where more strongly inculcated (than in our universities).'—JOHNSON. Loose notions arise from the unrestrained state of the will, from the influence of the unruly passions; lax notions from the error of the judgement; loose principles affect the moral conduct of individuals; lax principles affect the speculative opinions of men, either as individuals or in society: one is loose in practice, and lax in speculation or in discipline: the loose man sins against his conscience; he sets himself free from that to which he knows that he ought to submit; the lax man errs, but he affects to defend his error. A loose man injures himself, but a lax man injures society at large. Dissoluteness is the excess of looseness; licentiousness is the consequence of laxity, or the freedom from external constraint.

Looseness of character, if indulged, soon sinks into dissoluteness of morals; and laxity of discipline is quickly followed by licentiousness of manners.

A young man of loose character makes light of moral obligations in general; 'The most voluptuous and loose person breathing, were he but tied to follow his dice and his courtships every day, would find it the greatest torment that could befall him.'—SOUTH. A man of dissolute character commits every excess, and totally disregards every restraint; 'As the life of Petronius Arbitrator was altogether dissolute, the indifference which he showed at the close of it is to be looked upon as a piece of natural carelessness rather than fortitude.'—ADDISON. In proportion as a commander is lax in the punishment of offences, an army will become licentious; in proportion as the administration of law becomes lax, the age will become licentious; 'Moral philosophy is very agreeable to the paradoxical and licentious spirit of the age.'—BEATTIE.

SLACK, LOOSE.

Slack, in Saxon slac, low German slack, French lache, Latin laxus, and loose, in Saxon laes, both come from the Hebrew לָחַץ to make free or loose; they differ more in application than in sense: they are both opposed to that which is close bound; but slack is said only of that which is tied, or that with which anything is tied; while loose is said of any substance, the parts of which do not adhere closely: a rope is slack in opposition to the tight rope, which is stretched to its full extent; and in general cords or strings are said to be slack which fall in the requisite degree of tightness; but they are said to be loose in an indefinite manner, without conveying any collateral idea: thus the string of an instrument is denominated slack rather than loose; on the other hand, loose is said of many bodies to which the word slack cannot be applied: a garment is loose, but not slack; the leg of a table is loose, but not slack. In the moral application that which admits of extension lengthways is denominated slack; and that which fails in consistency and close adherence is loose: trade in general is said to be slack, or the sale of a particular article to be slack; but an engagement is said to be loose, and principles loose.

Rebellion now began, for lack

Of zeal and plunder, to grow slack.—HUDIBRAS

Nor fear that he who sits so loose to life,

Should too much shun his labours and its strife.

DENHAM

TO RELAX, REMIT.

The general idea of diminution is that which allies these words to each other; but they differ very widely in their original meaning, and somewhat in their ordinary application; relax, from the word lax or loose, signifies to make loose, and in its moral use to lessen any thing in its degree of tightness or rigour; to remit, from re and mitto to send back, signifies to take off in part or entirely that which has been imposed; that is, to lessen in quantity. In regard to our attempts to act, we may speak of relaxing in our endeavours, and remitting our labours or exertions;

No more the smith his dusky brow shall clear,
Relax his ponderous strength, and lean to hear.

GOLDSMITH

How often have I blessed the coming day,
When toil remitting lent its turn to play.

GOLDSMITH

in regard to our dealings with others, we may speak of relaxing in discipline, relaxing in the severity or strictness of our conduct, of remitting a punishment or remitting a sentence. The discretionary power of showing mercy when placed in the hands of the sovereign, serves to relax the rigour of the law; 'The statute of mortmain was at several times relaxed by the legislature.'—SWIFT. When the punishment seems to be disproportioned to the magnitude of the offence, it is but equitable to remit it. 'The magistrate can often, where the publick good demands not the execution of the law, remit the punishment of criminal offences by his own authority.'—LOCKE.

TO CEASE, LEAVE OFF, DISCONTINUE, DESIST.

Cease, in French cesser, Latin cesso, from cessi perfect of cedo to yield, signifies to give up or put an end to: to leave off is literally to separate one's self from an action or course of conduct; discontinue, with the privative dis, expresses the opposite of continue: desist, from the Latin desisto, or de and sisto, signifies literally to take one's self off from a thing.

To cease is neuter; to leave off and discontinue are active: we cease from doing a thing; we leave off or discontinue a thing. Cease is used either for particular actions or general habits; leave off more usually and properly for particular actions; discontinue for general habits. A restless, spoiled child never ceases crying until it has obtained what it wants; it is a mark of impatience not to cease lamenting when one is in pain; 'A successful author is equally in danger of the diminution of his fame, whether he continues or ceases to write.'—JOHNSON. A labourer leaves off his work at any given hour; 'As harsh and irregular sound is not harmony; so neither is banging a cushion, oratory; therefore, in my humble opinion, a certain divine of the first order would do well to leave this off.'—SWIFT. A delicate person discontinues his visits when they are found not to be agreeable; 'I would cheerfully have borne the whole expense of it, if my private establishment of native readers and writers, which I cannot with convenience discontinue at present, did not require more than half of the monthly expense, which the completion of a Digest would in my opinion demand.'—SIR WM. JONES.

It should be our first endeavour to cease to do evil. It is never good to leave off working while there is any thing to do, and time to do it in. The discontinuing of a good practice without adequate grounds evinces great instability of character.

To cease is said of that which flows out of the nature of things; to leave off, discontinue, and desist, are always the acts of conscious agents. To leave off and discontinue are voluntary acts, desist is involuntary; it is prudent to desist from using our endeavours when we find them ineffectual; it is natural for a person to leave off when he sees no farther occasion to continue his labour; 'The laird of Raarsa has sometimes disputed the chieftainry of the clan with Macleod of Skie; but being much inferior in extent of possessions, has, I suppose, been forced to desist.'—JOHNSON.

CESSATION, STOP, REST, INTERMISSION.

Cessation, from the verb to cease, marks the condition of leaving off; stop, from to stop, marks that of being stopped or prevented from going on; rest, from to rest, marks the state of being quiet; and intermission, from intermittere, marks that of ceasing occasionally.

To cease respects the course of things; whatever does not go on has ceased; things cease of themselves: stop respects some external action or influence; nothing stops but what is supposed to be stopped or hindered by another: rest is a species of cessation that regards labour or exertion; whatever does not move or exert itself is at rest: intermission is a species of cessation only for a time or at certain intervals.

That which ceases or stops is supposed to be at an end; rest or intermission supposes a renewal. A cessation of hostilities is at all times desirable: to put a stop to evil practices is sometimes the most difficult and dangerous of all undertakings: rest after fatigue is indispensable, for labour without intermission exhausts the frame. The rain ceases, a person or a ball stops running, the labourer rests from his toil, a fever is inter- mittent. There is nothing in the world which does not cease to exist at one period or another;

Who then would court the pomp of guilty power,
When the mind sickens at the weary show,
And flies to temporary death for ease?
When half our life's cessation of our being.

STEELE.

Death stops every one sooner or later in his career; 'In all those motions and operations which are incessantly going on throughout nature, there is no stop nor interruption.'—BLAIR. Whoever is vexed with the cares of getting riches will find no rest for his mind or body; 'The refreshing rest and peaceful night are the portion of him only who lies down weary with honest labour.'—JOHNSON. He will labour without intermission oftentimes only to heap troubles on himself; 'Whether the time of intermission is spent in company or in solitude, in necessary business or involuntary levities, the understanding is equally abstracted from the object of inquiry.'—JOHNSON.

INTERVAL, RESPITE.

Interval, in Latin intervallum, signifies literally the space between the stakes which formed a Roman intrenchment; and, by an extended application, it signifies any space; respite, probably contracted from respirit, signifies a breathing again.

Every respite requires an interval; but there are many intervals where there is no respite. The term interval respects time only; respite includes the idea of action within that time which may be more or less agreeable; intervals of ease are a respite to one who is oppressed with labour; 'Any uncommon exertion of strength, or perseverance in labour, is succeeded by a long interval of languor.'—JOHNSON. The interval which is sometimes granted to a criminal before his execution is in the proper sense a respite; 'Give me leave to allow myself no respite from labour.'—SPECTATOR.

REPRIEVE, RESPITE.

Reprieve comes in all probability from the French reprie, participle of repandre, and the Latin reprehendo, signifying to take back or take off that which has been laid on; respite signifies the same as in the preceding article.

The idea of a release from any pressure or burden is common to these terms; but the reprieve is that which is granted; the respite sometimes comes to us in the course of things: we gain a reprieve from any punishment or trouble which threatens us; we gain a respite from any labour or weight that presses upon us. A criminal gains a reprieve when the punishment of death is commuted for that of transportation; a debtor may be said to obtain a reprieve when, with a prison before his eyes, he gets such indulgence from his creditors as sets him free; there is frequently no respite for persons in a subordinate station, when they fall into the hands of a hard taskmaster; Sisyphus is feigned by the poets to have been condemned to the toil of perpetually rolling a stone up a hill as fast as it rolled back, from which toil he had no respite;

All that I ask is but a short reprieve,
Till I forget to love and learn to grieve,
Some pause and respite only I require,
Till with my tears I shall have quench'd my fire.

DRYDEN.

INCESSANTLY, UNCEASINGLY, UNINTER- RUPTEDLY, WITHOUT INTERMISSION.

The want of continuity, not of duration, is denoted by these terms; incessantly is the most general and indefinite of all; it signifies without ceasing, but may be applied to things which admit of certain intervals: unceasingly is definite, and signifies never ceasing, it cannot therefore be applied to what has any cessation. In familiar discourse, incessantly is a hyperbolic mode of speech, by which one means to denote the absence of those ordinary intervals which are to be expected; as when one says a person is incessantly talking; by which is understood, that he does not allow himself the ordinary intervals of rest from talking;

Surfeit, misdilet, and unthrifty waste,
Vaine feastes, and ydle superfluite,
All those this sence's fort assayle incessantly.
SPENSER.

Unceasingly, on the other hand, is more literally employed for a positive want of cessation; a noise is said to be unceasing which literally never ceases; or complaints are unceasing which are made without any pauses or intervals;

Impell'd by steps unceasing, to pursue
Some fleeting good that mocks me with the view.
GOLDSMITH.

Incessantly and unceasingly are said of things which act of themselves; uninterruptedly is said of that which depends upon other things: it rains incessantly marks a continued operation of nature, independent of every thing; but to be uninterruptedly happy marks one's freedom from every foreign influence which is unfriendly to one's happiness;

She draws a close incumbent cloud of death,
Uninterrupted by the living winds.—THOMSON.

Incessantly and the other two words are employed either for persons or things; without intermission is however mostly employed for persons: things act and react incessantly upon one another; a man of a persevering temper goes on labouring without intermission, until he has effected his purpose; 'For any one to be always in a laborious, hazardous posture of defence, without intermission, must needs be intolerable.'—SOUTH.

ALWAYS, AT ALL TIMES, EVER.

Always, compounded of all and ways, is the same as, under all circumstances, through all the ways of life, that is, uninterruptedly; at all times, means, without distinction of time; ever implies, for a perpetuity, without end.

A man must be always virtuous, that is, whether in adversity or prosperity; 'Human life never stands still for any long time. It is by no means a fixed and steady object, like the mountain or the rock, which you always find in the same situation.'—BLAIR. A man must be at all times virtuous, that is, in his going in and coming out, his rising up and his lying down, by day and by night; 'Among all the expressions of good nature, I shall single out that which goes under the general name of charity, as it consists in relieving the indigent; that being a trial of this kind which offers itself to us almost at all times, and in every place.'—ADDISON. A virtuous man will be ever happy, that is, in this life, and the life to come; 'Have you forgotten all the blessings you have continued to enjoy ever since the day that you came forth a helpless infant into the world.'—BLAIR.

TO STAND, STOP, REST, STAGNATE.

To stand, in German stehen, &c. Latin sto, Greek ἵσμι to stand, Hebrew נשׁוּ to settle; stop, in Saxon stoppan, &c. conveys the ideas of pressing, thickening, like the Latin stipa, and the Greek στέβειν; whence it has been made in English to express immovability; rest is contracted from the Latin resisto or re and sisto to place or stand back; stagnate, in Latin stagnatus, participle of stagnare, comes from stagnum a pool, and that either from sto to stand, because waters stand perpetually in a pool, or from the Greek στέβω an enclosure, because a pool is an enclosure for waters.

The absence of motion is expressed by all these terms; stand is the most general of all; to stand is simply not to move; to stop is to cease to move; we stand either for want of inclination or power to move; but we stop from a disinclination to go on: to rest is to stop from an express dislike to motion; we may stop for purposes of convenience, or because we have no farther to go, but we rest from fatigue; to stagnate is only a species of standing as respects liquids; water may both stand and stagnate; but the former implies a temporary, the latter a permanent state: water stands in a puddle, but it stagnates in a pond or in any confined space.

All these terms admit of an extended application; business stands still, or there is a stand in business;

Whither can we run,
Where make a stand?—DRYDEN.

A mercantile house stops, or stops payment, or a person stops in his career; 'I am afraid should I put a stop now to this design, now that it is so near being completed, I shall find it difficult to resume it.'—MELMOTH (Pity). An affair rests undecided, or rests in the hands of a person;

Who rests of immortality assur'd

Is safe, whatever ills are here endur'd.—JENNYS.

Trade stagnates; 'This inundation of strangers, which used to be confined to the summer, will stagnate all the winter.'—GIBBON. Stand, stop, and rest, are likewise employed transitively, but with a wide distinction in the sense; to stand in this case is to set one's self up to resist; as to stand the trial, to stand the test; to stop has the sense of hinder; as to stop a person who is going on, that is, to make him stop: to rest is to make a thing rest or lean; a person rests his argument upon the supposed innocence of another

TO CHECK, STOP.

Check, from the German Schach chess, derives its figurative signification of restraining the movements, from checkmate, a movement in that game whereby one stops one adversary from carrying his game any farther; to stop (v. Cessation) is to cause not to move at all: the growth of a plant is checked when it does not grow so fast as usual; its growth is stopped when it ceases altogether to grow: the water of a river is stopped by a dam; the rapidity of its course is checked by the intervention of rocks and sands.

When applied to persons, to check is always contrary to the will of the sufferer; but to stop is often a matter of indifference, if not directly serviceable: one is checked in his career of success by some untoward event; 'Shall neither the admonitions which you receive from the visible inconstancy of the world, nor the declarations of the Divine displeasure, be sufficient to check your thoughtless career?'—BLAIR. One is stopped on a journey by the meeting of a friend;

Embosom'd in the deep where Holland lies,
Methinks her patient sons before me stand,
Where the broad ocean leans against the land,
And sedulous to stop the coming tide,
Lift the tall rampire's artificial pride.—GOLDSMITH.

In a moral application these terms bear a similar analogy: check has the import of diminishing; stop that of destroying or causing to cease; many evils may be easily checked, to which it would not be easy to put an effectual stop.

TO HINDER. STOP.

Hinder, from hind or behind, signifies to hinder by going behind or pulling one behind; to stop is to make to stand.

Hindering refers solely to the prosecution of an object: stop refers simply to the cessation of motion; we may be hindered, therefore, by being stopped; but we may also be hindered without being expressly stopped, and we may be stopped without being hindered. If the stoppage do not interfere with any other object in view, it is a stoppage, but not a hindrance; as when we are stopped by a friend while walking for pleasure;

A signal omen stopp'd the passing host,
Their martial fury in their wonder lost.—POPE.

But if stopped by an idler in the midst of urgent business, so as not to be able to proceed according to our business, this is both a stoppage and a hindrance. On the other hand, if we are interrupted in the regular course of our proceeding, but not compelled to stand still or give up our business for any time, this may be a hindrance, but not a stoppage: in this manner, the conversation of others, in the midst of our business, may considerably retard its progress, and so far hinder, but not expressly put a stop to the whole concern; 'Is it not the height of wisdom and goodness too, to hinder the consummation of those soul-wasting sins, by obliging us to withstand them in their first infancy?'—SOUTH.

TO HINDER, PREVENT, IMPEDE, OBSTRUCT

Hinder signifies the same as in the preceding article, prevent, from præ before and venio to come, signifies to hinder by coming before, or to cross another by the anticipation of his purpose; impede, in Latin from in and pedes the feet, signifies to come between his feet and entangle him in his progress; 'Impedire profectum aut certe tardare.'—CICERO. Obstruct, from ob and struo, signifies to set up something in one's way, to block up the passage.

Hinder is the most general of these terms, as it conveys little more than the idea which is common to them all, namely, that of keeping one from his purpose. To hinder is commonly said of that which is rendered impossible for the time being, or merely delayed; prevent is said of that which is rendered altogether impracticable. A person is hindered by the weather and his various engagements from reaching a place at the time he intended; he is prevented but not hindered by ill health from going thither at all. If a friend calls, he hinders me from finishing the letter which I was writing; if I wish to prevent my son from reading any book, I keep it out of his way; 'It is much easier to keep ourselves void of resentment, than to restrain it from excess when it has gained admission. To use the illustration of an excellent author, we can prevent the beginnings of some things, whose progress afterward we cannot hinder.'—HOLLAND.

To hinder is an act of the moment, it supposes no design; prevent is a premeditated act, deliberated upon, and adopted for general purposes: the former is applied only to the movements of any particular individual, the latter to events and circumstances. I hinder a person who is running, if I lay hold of his arm and make him walk; it is the object of every good government to prevent offences rather than to punish offenders. In ordinary discourse these words fall very much into one another, when the circumstances of the case do not sufficiently define, whether the action in hand be altogether suspended, or only suspended for a time; but the above explanation must make it very clear, that hinder, in its proper sense and application, is but a temporary act, and prevent is a decisive and permanent act.

To impede and obstruct is a species of hindering which is said rather of things than of persons; hinder is said of both; but hinder is commonly employed in regard to trifling matters, or such as retard a person's proceedings in the smallest degree; impede and obstruct are acts of greater importance, or produce a still greater degree of delay. A person is hindered in his work, although neither impeded nor obstructed; but the quantity of artillery and baggage which is attached to an army will greatly impede it in its march; and the trees which are thrown across the roads will obstruct its march.

Whatever causes a person to do a thing slower than he wishes is a hindrance; whatever binds him so that he cannot move freely forward is an impediment; whatever acts upon the path or passage so as to prevent him from moving forward is an obstruction. Every impediment and obstruction is a hindrance, though not vice versa. A person is hindered in the thing he is about if he be called off to do something else; ill health impedes a person's progress in learning; any foreign body lodging in the vessels of the human body obstructs the course of the fluids, and consequently brings on serious diseases. Hindrances always suppose the agency of a person, either of the one who hinders, or the one who is hindered; but impediments and obstructions may be employed with regard to the operations of nature on inanimate objects. Cold impedes the growth of plants; a dam obstructs the course of water; 'Truth was provoked to see herself thus trifled and impeded by an enemy whom she looked on with contempt.'—JOHNSON.

This path you say is hid in endless night,
'T is self-conceit alone obstructs your sight.

JENYNS.

DIFFICULTY, OBSTACLE, IMPEDIMENT.

Difficulty, in Latin difficultas and difficilis, compounded of the privative dis and facilis easy, from facio to do, signifies the thing not easy to be done; obstacle, in Latin obstacleum, from obsto to stand in the way, signifies the thing that stands in the way between a person and the object he has in view; impediment, in Latin impedimentum, from impedio compounded of in and pedes, signifies something that entangles the feet.

All these terms include in their signification that which interferes either with the actions or views of men: the *difficulty lies most in the nature and circumstances of the thing itself; the obstacle and impediment consist of that which is external or foreign: a difficulty interferes with the completion of any work; an obstacle interferes with the attainment of any end; an impediment interrupts the progress, and prevents the execution of one's wishes: a difficulty embarrasses, it suspends the powers of acting or deciding; an obstacle opposes itself, it is properly met in the way, and intervenes between us and our object; an impediment shackles and puts a stop to our proceedings: we speak of encountering a difficulty, surmounting an obstacle, and removing an impediment: the disposition of the mind often occasions more difficulties in negotiations than the subjects themselves; 'Truth has less of trouble and difficulty, of entanglement and perplexity, of danger and hazard in it.'—TILLOTSON. The eloquence of Demosthenes was the greatest obstacle which Philip of Macedon experienced in his political career; 'One obstacle must have stood not a little in the way of that preferment after which Young seems to have panted. Though he took orders, he never entirely shook off politics.'—CROFT. Ignorance of the language is the greatest impediment which a foreigner experiences in the pursuit of any object out of his own country, 'The necessity of complying with times, and of sparing persons, is the great impediment of biography.'—JOHNSON.

TO PREVENT, ANTICIPATE.

To prevent (v. To hinder) is literally to come before-hand, and anticipate, from ante and capio to take before-hand: the former is employed for actual occurrences; the latter as much for calculations as for actions: prevent is the act of one being towards another; anticipate is the act of a being either towards himself or another. God is said to prevent us, if he interposes with his grace to divert our purposes towards that which is right; 'Prevent us, O Lord, in all our doings with thy most gracious favour.'—COMMON PRAYER. We anticipate the happiness which we are to enjoy in future; and so in like manner we may anticipate our pains;

Why should we Anticipate our sorrows? 'T is like those Who die for fear of death.—DENHAM.

We also anticipate what a person is going to say ny saying the same thing before him. The term prevent, when taken in this its strict and literal sense, is employed only as the act of the Divine Being;

But I do think it most cowardly and vile,
For fear of what might fall, so to prevent
The time of life.—SHAKESPEARE.

Anticipate, on the contrary, is taken only as the act of human beings towards each other or themselves; 'He that has anticipated the conversation of a wit will wonder to what prejudice he owes his reputation.'—JOHNSON. These words may, however, be farther allied to each other, when under the term prevention in its vulgar acceptation is included the idea of hindering another in his proceedings; in which case to anticipate is a species of prevention; that is, to prevent another from doing a thing by doing it one's self, 'I am far from pretending to instruct the profession, or anticipating their directions to such as are under their government.'—ARBUTHNOT.

TO PREVENT, OBTIATE, PRECLUDE.

To prevent (v. To hinder) is here as in the former case the generic term, the others are specific. What one prevents does not happen at all: what one obviates ceases to happen in future; we prevent those evils which we know will come to pass if not prevented: we obviate those evils which we have already felt; that is, we prevent their repetition. Crimes and calamities are prevented; difficulties, objections, in conveniences, and troubles, are obviated. When crowds collect in vast numbers in any small spot, it is not easy to prevent mischief: wise precautions may be adopted to obviate the inconvenience which necessarily attends a great crowd.

Prevent and obviate are the acts of either conscious or unconscious agents: preclude is the act of unconscious agents only: one prevents or obviates a thing by the use of means, or else the things themselves prevent and obviate, as when we say, that a person prevents another from coming, or illness prevents him from coming; a person obviates a difficulty by a contrivance, a certain arrangement or change obviates every difficulty. We intentionally prevent a person from doing that which we disapprove of; his circumstances preclude him from enjoying certain privileges. Prevent respects that which is either good or bad; obviate respects that which is always bad; preclude respects that which is good or desirable: ill-health prevents a person from pursuing his business; employment prevents a young person from falling into bad practices;

Every disease of age we may prevent,

Like those of youth, by being diligent.—DENHAM.

Admonition often obviates the necessity of punishments: 'The imputation of folly, if it is true, must be suffered without hope; but that of immorality may be obviated by removing the cause.'—HAWKSWORTH. Want of learning or of a regular education often precludes a man from many of the political advantages which he might otherwise enjoy; 'Has not man an inheritance to which all may turn, who are not so foolish as to continue the pursuit after pleasure till every hope is precluded?'—HAWKSWORTH.

TO RETARD, HINDER.

To retard, from the Latin tardus slow, signifying to make slow, is applied to the movements of any object forward: as in the Latin 'Impetum inimici tardare.'—CICERO. To hinder (v. To hinder) is applied to the person moving or acting: we retard or make slow the progress of any scheme towards completion; 'Nothing has tended more to retard the advancement of science than the disposition in vulgar minds to vilify what they cannot comprehend.'—JOHNSON. We hinder or keep back the person who is completing the scheme; 'The very nearness of an object sometimes hinders the sight of it.'—SOUTH. We retard a thing therefore often by hindering the person; but we frequently hinder a person without expressly retarding, and on the contrary the thing is retarded without the person being hindered. The publication of a work is sometimes retarded by the hindrances which an author meets with in bringing it to a conclusion; but a work may be retarded through the idleness of printers and a variety of other causes which are independent of any hindrance. So in like manner a person may be hindered in going to his place of destination; but we do not say that he is retarded, because it is only the execution of an object, and not the simple movements of the person which are retarded.

TO DELAY, DEFER, POSTPONE, PROCRASTINATE, PROLONG, PROTRACT, RETARD.

Delay, compounded of de and lay, signifies to lay or keep back; defer, compounded of de and fer, in Latin fero, signifies to put off; postpone, compounded of post and pone, from the Latin pono to place, signifies to place behind or after; procrastinate, from pro and cras to-morrow, signifies to put off till to-morrow; prolonging, answering to the prolatio of the Latins, signifies the lengthening the period of time for beginning or ending a thing; protract, from traho to draw, signifies to draw out the time; and retard to make a thing hang in hand.

To delay is simply not to commence action; to defer and postpone are to fix its commencement at a more distant period: we may delay a thing for days, hours, and minutes; we defer or postpone it for months or weeks. Delays mostly arise from faults in the person delaying, they are seldom reasonable or advantageous; differing and postponing are discretionary acts, which are justified by the circumstances: indolent people are most prone to delay;

From thee both old and young with profit learn,
The bounds of good and evil to discern;
Unhappy he who does this work adjourn,
And to to-morrow would the search delay;
His lazy morrow will be like to-day.—DRYDEN.

When a plan is not maturely digested, it is prudent to defer its execution until every thing is in an entire state of preparation. Procrastination is a culpable delay arising solely from the fault of the procrastinator; 'Cum perisque in rebus gerendis tarditas et procrastinatio odiosa est, tum hoc bellum inditatus elegeritis.'—CICERO. It is the part of a dilatory man to procrastinate that which it is both his interest and duty to perform;

Procrastination is the thief of time.—YOUNG

To defer is used without regard to any particular time or object; to postpone has always relation to something else: it is properly to defer until the completion of some period or event: a person may defer his visit from month to month; he postpones his visit until the commencement of a new year: a tardy debtor delays the settlement of his accounts; a merchant defers the shipment of any goods in consequence of the receipt of fresh intelligence; 'Never defer that till to-morrow which you can do to-day.'—BUDGE. A merchant postpones the shipment until after the arrival of the expected fleet; 'When I postponed to another summer my journey to England, could I apprehend that I never should see her again?'—GIBBON.

We delay the execution of a thing; we prolong or protract the continuation of a thing; we retard the termination of a thing: we may delay answering a letter, prolong a contest, protract a lawsuit, and retard a publication;

Perhaps great Hector then had found his fate,
But Jove and destiny prolong'd his date.—POPE.

To this Euryalus: "You plead in vain,
And but protract the cause you cannot gain."

VIRGIL

I see the layers then
Of mingled moulds of more retentive earths,
That while the stealing moisture they transmit,
Retard its motion and forbid its waste.

THOMSON.

TO PROROGUE, ADJOURN.

Prorogue, from the Latin prorogo, signifies to put off, and is used in the general sense of deferring for an indefinite period; 'A prorogation is the continuance of Parliament from one session to another.'—BLACKSTONE.

Adjourn, from journée the day, signifies only to put off for a day or some short period; 'An adjournment is no more than a continuance of the session from one day to another.'—BLACKSTONE. Proroguing is applied to national assemblies only; adjourning is applicable to any meeting.

SLOW, DILATORY, TARDY, TEDIOUS.

Slow is doubtless connected with slither and slide, which kind of motion when walking is the slowest and the laziest; dilatory, from the Latin defero to defer, signifies prone to defer; tardy is but a variation of the Latin tardus slow; tedious, from the Latin tædit to be weary, signifies causing weariness.

* Slow is a general and unqualified term applicable to the motion of any object or to the motions and actions of persons in particular, and to their dispositions also; dilatory relates to the temper only of persons: we are slow in what we are about;

The powers above are slow
In punishing, and should not we resemble them?

DRYDEN.

We are dilatory in setting about a thing; 'A dilatory temper is unfit for a place of trust.'—ADDISON. Slow is applied to corporeal or mental actions; a person may be slow in walking, or slow in conceiving; tardy applies more to what is mental than to what is corporeal; we are tardy in our proceedings or our progress; we are tardy in making up accounts or in concluding a treaty;

Death he has oft accus'd
Of tardy execution, since denounc'd
The day of his offence.—MILTON.

¶ We may be slow with propriety or not, to our own inconvenience or that of others; when we are tedious we are always so improperly: "To be slow and sure" is a vulgar proverb, but a great truth; by this we do ourselves good, and inconvenience no one; but he who is tedious is slow to the annoyance of others; a prolix writer must always be tedious, for he keeps the reader long in suspense before he comes to the conclusion of a period;

Her sympathizing lover takes his stand
High on th' opponent bank, and ceaseless sings
The tedious time away.—THOMSON.

TO LINGER, TARRY, LOITER, LAG, SAUNT, TIE.

Linger, from longer, signifies to make the time longer in doing a thing; tarry, from tardus slow, is to make the thing slow; loiter may probably come from lentus slow; lag, from lie, signifies to lie back; saunter is derived from sancta terra the Holy Land; because, in the time of the crusades, many idle persons were going backwards and forwards: hence idle, planless going, comes to be so denominated.

Suspension of action or slow movement enters into the meaning of all these terms: to linger is to stop altogether, or to move but slowly forward, and to tarry is properly to suspend one's movement: the former proceeds from reluctance to leave the spot on which we stand; the latter from motives of discretion: he will naturally linger who is going to leave the place of his nativity for an indefinite period; in which sense it is figuratively applied to life and other objects;

'Tis long since I, for my celestial wife,
Loath'd by the Gods, have dragg'd a ling'ring life.
DRYDEN.

Those who have much business to transact will be led to tarry long in a place; 'Herod having tarry'd only seven days at Rome for the dispatch of his business, returned to his ships at Brundisium.'—PRIDEAUX. To loiter is to move slowly and reluctantly; but, from a bad cause, a child loiters who is unwilling to go to school; 'Rapid wits loiter, or faint, and suffer themselves to be surpassed by the even and regular perseverance of slower understandings.'—JOHNSON. To lag is to move slower than others; to stop while they are going on; this is seldom done for a good purpose; those who lag have generally some sinister and private end to answer;

I shall not lag behind, nor err
The way, thou leading.—MILTON.

To saunter is altogether the act of an idler; those who have no object in moving either backward or forward, will saunter if they move at all; 'She walks all the morning sauntering about the shop, with her arms through her pocket holes.'—JOHNSON.

TO HASTEN, ACCELERATE, SPEED, EXPEDITE, DESPATCH.

Hasten, in French hâter, and in the Northern languages hasten, &c., is most probably connected with heiss hot, expressing what is vivid and active; accelerate, from celer quick, signifies literally to quicken for a specific purpose; speed, from the Greek ενσπῶδω, signifies to carry on diligently; expedite, in Latin expedio, from ex and pes, signifies literally to remove obstacles; despatch, in French depecher, from pes a foot, signifies also putting off, or clearing away impediments.

Quickness in movement and action is the common idea in all these terms, which vary in the nature of the movement and the action. To hasten expresses little more than the general idea of quickness in moving towards a point; thus, he hastens who runs to get to the end of his journey: accelerate expresses moreover the idea of bringing something to a point; thus, every mechanical business is accelerated by the order and distribution of its several parts; 'Let the aged consider well, that by every intemperate indulgence they accelerate decay.'—BLAIR. Accelerate may be employed, like the word hasten, for corporeal and familiar actions; the tailor accelerates any particular work that he has in hand by putting on additional hands, or a compositor accelerates the printing of a work by doing his part with correctness. The word speed includes not only quick but forward movement. He who goes with speed goes effectually forward, and comes to his journey's end the soonest. This idea is excluded from the term haste, which may often be a planless unsuitable quickness. Hence the proverb "The more haste, the worst speed;"

Where with like haste, though several ways they run,
Some to undo, and some to be undone.—DENHAM.

Expedite and despatch are terms of higher import, in application to the most serious concerns in life; but to expedite expresses a process, a bringing forward towards an end: despatch implies a putting an end to, a making a clearance. We do every thing in our power to expedite a business: we despatch a great deal of business within a given time. Expedition is requisite for one who executes; 'The coachman was ordered to drive on, and they hurried with the utmost expedition to Hyde Park Corner.'—JOHNSON. Despatch is most important for one who determines and directs; 'And as, in races, it is not the large stride, or high lift, that makes the speed; so, in business, the keeping close to the matter, and not taking of it too much at once, procureth despatch.'—BACON. An inferior officer must proceed with expedition to fulfil the orders, or execute the purposes of his commander; a general or minister of state despatches the concerns of planning, directing, and instructing. Hence it is we speak only of expediting a thing; but we may speak of despatching a person, as well as a thing.

Every man hastens to remove his property in case of fire. Those who are anxious to bring any thing to an end will do every thing in their power to accelerate its progress. Those who are sent on any pressing errand will do great service by using speed. The success of a military progress depends often on the expedition with which it is conducted. In the counting-house and the cabinet, despatch is equally important; as we cannot do more than one thing at a time, it is of importance to get that quickly concluded to make way for another

TO HASTEN, HURRY.

Hasten signifies the same as in the preceding article hurry, in old French harier, probably coming from the Hebrew חרר to be inflamed, or be in a hurry.

To hasten and hurry both imply to move forward with quickness in any matter; but the former may proceed with some design and good order, but the latter always supposes perturbation and irregularity. We hasten in the communication of good news, when we make efforts to convey it in the shortest time possible; 'Homer, to preserve the unity of action, hastens into the midst of things, as Horace has observed.'—ADDISON. We hurry to get to an end, when we impatiently and inconsiderately press forward without making choice of our means;

Now 't is nought
But restless hurry through the busy air,
Beat by unnumber'd wings.—THOMSON.

To hasten is opposed to delay or a dilatory mode of proceeding; it is frequently indispensable to hasten in the affairs of human life: to hurry is opposed to deliberate and cautious proceeding; it must always be prejudicial and unwise to hurry: men may hasten; children hurry.

As epithets, hasty and hurried are both employed in the bad sense; but hasty implies merely an overquickness of motion which outstrips consideration; hurried implies a disorderly motion which springs from a disordered state of mind. Irritable people use hasty expressions; they speak before they think: deranged people walk with hurried steps; they follow the blind impulse of undirected feeling.

QUICKNESS, SWIFTNESS, FLEETNESS, CELERITY, RAPIDITY, VELOCITY.

These terms are all applied to the motion of bodies, of which quickness, from quick, denotes the general and simple idea that characterizes all the rest. Quickness is near akin to life, and is directly opposed to slowness; 'Impatience of labour ceases those who are most distinguished for quickness of apprehension.'—JOHNSON. Swiftness, in all probability from the German schweiften to roam; and fleetness, from flee or fly; express higher degrees of quickness. Celerity, probably from celer a horse; velocity, from velo to fly; and rapidity, from rapio, to seize or hurry along, differ more in application than in degree. Quick and swift are applicable to any objects; men are quick in moving, swift in running; dogs hear quickly, and run swiftly: a mill goes quickly or swiftly round, according to the force of the wind;

Above the bounding billows swift they flew,
Till now the Grecian camp appear'd in view.

POPE.

Fleetness is the peculiar characteristic of winds or horses; a horse is fleet in the race, and is sometimes described to be as fleet as the winds;

For fear, though fleeter than the wind,
Believes 'tis always left behind.—BUTLER.

That which we wish to characterize as particularly quick in our ordinary operations, we say is done with celerity; in this manner our thoughts are said to pass with celerity from one object to another; 'By moving the eye we gather up with great celerity the several parts of an object, so as to form one piece.'—BURKE. Those things are said to move with rapidity which seem to hurry every thing away with them; a river or stream moves with rapidity; time goes on with a rapid flight;

Mean time the radiant sun, to mortal sight
Descending swift, roll'd down the rapid light.

POPE.

Velocity signifies the swiftness of flight, which is a motion that exceeds all others in swiftness: hence, we speak of the velocity of a ball shot from a cannon, or of a celestial body moving in its orbit; sometimes these words rapidity and velocity, are applied in the improper sense by way of emphasis to the very swift movements of other bodies: in this manner the wheel of a carriage is said to move rapidly; and the flight of an animal or the progress of a vessel before the wind, is compared to the flight of a bird in point of velocity; 'Lightning is productive of grandeur which it chiefly owes to the velocity of its motion.'—BURKE.

DILIGENT, EXPEDITIOUS, PROMPT.

All these terms mark the quality of quickness in a commendable degree; diligent (from diligere to love (v. Active, diligent) marks the interest one takes in doing something; he is diligent* who loses no time, who keeps close to the work; expeditious, from the Latin expedio to despatch, marks the desire one has to complete the thing begun. He who is expeditious applies himself to no other thing that offers; he finishes every thing in its turn; prompt, from the Latin promove to draw out or make ready, marks one's desire to get ready; he is prompt who works with spirit so as to make things ready.

Idleness, dilatoriness, and slowness, are the three defects opposed to these three qualities. The diligent man has no reluctance in commencing or continuing the labour, the expeditious man never leaves it till it is finished; the prompt man brings it quickly to an end. It is necessary to be diligent in the concerns which belong to us; 'We must be diligent in our particular calling and charge, in that province and station which God has appointed us, whatever it be.'—TILLOTSON. We must be expeditious in any business that requires to be terminated; 'The regent assembled an army with his usual expedition, and marched to Glasgow.'—ROBERTSON. We must be prompt in the execution of orders that are given to us;

* Vide Abbe Girard: "Diligent, expeditif, prompt."

To him she hasted, in her face excuse
Came prologue, and apology too prompt,
Which, with bland words at will, she thus address'd
MILTON

DIRECTLY, IMMEDIATELY, INSTANTLY, INSTANTANEOUSLY.

Directly signifies in a direct or straight manner; immediately without any medium or intervention; instantly and instantaneously, in the space of an instant.

Directly is most applicable to the actions of men; immediately and instantly to either actions or events. Directly refers to the interruptions which may intentionally delay the commencement of any work: immediately in general refers to the space of time that intervenes. A diligent person goes directly to his work; he suffers nothing to draw him aside: good news is immediately spread abroad upon its arrival; nothing intervenes to retard it. Immediately and instantly, or instantaneously, both mark a quick succession of events, but the latter in a much stronger degree than the former. Immediately is negative; it expresses simply that nothing intervenes; instantly is positive, signifying the very existing moment in which the thing happens. A person who is of a willing disposition goes or runs immediately to the assistance of another; but the ardour of affection impels him to fly instantly to his relief, as he sees the danger. A surgeon does not proceed directly to dress a wound; he first examines it in order to ascertain its nature; 'Besides those things which directly suggest the idea of danger, and those which produce a similar effect from a mechanical cause. I know of nothing sublime which is not some modification of power.'—BURKE. Men of lively minds immediately see the source of their own errors; 'Admiration is a short-lived passion, that immediately decays upon growing familiar with the object.'—ADDISON. People of delicate feelings are instantly alive to the slightest breach of decorum;

Sleep instantly fell upon me.—MILTON.

A course of proceeding is direct, the consequences are immediate, and the effects instantaneous; 'A painter must have an action, not successive, but instantaneous; for the time of a picture is a single moment'—JOHNSON.

SOON, EARLY, BETIMES.

All these words are expressive of time; but soon respects some future period in general; early, or ere, before, or betimes, or by the time, before a given time, respect some particular period at no great distance. A person may come soon or early; in the former case he may not belong in coming from the time that the words are spoken; in the latter case he comes before the time appointed. He who rises soon does nothing extraordinary; but he who rises early or betimes exceeds the usual hour considerably. Soon is said mostly of particular acts, and is always dated from the time of the person speaking, if not otherwise expressed; come soon signifies after the present moment;

But soon, too soon! the lover turns his eyes;

Again she falls—again she dies—she dies.—POPE

Early and betimes, if not otherwise expressed, have always respect to some specific time appointed; come early, will signify a visit, a meeting, and the like; a thing betimes will signify before the thing to be done is wanted: in this manner both are employed for the actions of youth. An early attention to religious duties will render them habitual and pleasing; 'Pope, not being sent early to school, was taught to read by an aunt.'—JOHNSON. We must begin betimes to bring the stubborn will into subjection; 'Happy is the man who betimes acquires a relish for holy solitude.'—HORACE.

CURSORY, HASTY, SLIGHT, DESULTORY.

Cursory, from the Latin curro, signifies run over or done in running; hasty applies to that done in haste; slight is a variation of light; desultory, from desilio to leap, signifies leaped over.

Cursory includes both hasty and slight; it includes hasty inasmuch as it expresses a quick motion; it includes slight inasmuch as it conveys the idea of a partial action. A view may be either cursory or hasty, as the former is taken by design, the latter from care lessness. A view may be either cursor or slight; but the former is not so imperfect as the latter. An author will take a cursor view of those points which are not necessarily connected with his subject; 'Savage mingled in cursor conversation with the same steadiness of attention as others apply to a lecture.'—JOHNSON. An author who takes a hasty view of a subject will mislead by his errors; 'The emperor Marcius had once resolved to abolish these rescripts (of the emperors), and retain only the general edicts. He could not bear that the hasty and crude answers of such princes as Commodus and Caracalla should be revered as laws.'—BLACKSTONE. He who takes a slight view of a subject will disappoint by the shallowness of his information; 'The wits of Charles's time had seldom more than slight and superficial views.'—JOHNSON. Between cursor and desultory there is the same difference as between running and leaping; we run in a line, but we leap from one part to another; so remarks that are cursor have still more or less connexion, but remarks that are desultory are without any coherence; 'If compassion ever be felt from the brute instinct of un instructed nature, it will only produce effects desultory and transient.'—JOHNSON.

RASHNESS, TEMERITY, HASTINESS, PRECIPITANCY.

Rashness denotes the quality of being rash, which, like the German rasch, and our word rush, comes from the Latin ruo, expressing hurried and excessive motion; temerity, in Latin temeritas, from temere, possibly comes from the Greek τῆμερον at the moment, denoting the quality of acting by the impulse of the moment; hastiness denotes the quality of being hasty, or impelled by an impatient feeling; precipitancy, from the Latin præ and cipio, signifies the quality or disposition of taking things before they ought to be taken.

Rashness and temerity have a close alliance with each other in sense; but they have a slight difference, which is entitled to notice: rashness is a general and indefinite term, in the signification of which an improper celerity is the leading idea: this celerity may arise either from a vehemence of character, or a temporary ardour of the mind: in the signification of temerity, the leading idea is want of consideration, springing mostly from an overweening confidence, or a presumption of character. Rashness is, therefore, applied to our corporeal as well as moral actions, as the jumping into a river, without being able to swim, or the leaping over a hedge, without being an expert horseman;

Nature to youth hot rashness doth dispense,
But with cold prudence age doth recompense.

DENHAM.

Temerity is applied to our moral actions only, particularly such as require deliberation, and a calculation of consequences; 'All mankind have a sufficient plea for some degree of restlessness, and the fault seems to be little more than too much temerity of conclusion in favour of something not experienced.'—JOHNSON. Hastiness and precipitancy are but modes or characteristics of rashness, and consequently employed only in particular cases, as hastiness in regard to our movements, and precipitancy in regard to our measures;

And hurry through the woods with hasty step,
Rustling and full of hope.—SOMERVILLE.

'As the chymist, by catching at it too soon, lost the philosophical elixir, so precipitancy of our understanding is an occasion of error.'—GLANVILLE.

TO ABIDE, SOJOURN, DWELL, RESIDE, INHABIT.

Abide, in Saxon abitan, old German beiten, comes from the Arabick or Persian but, or bit, to pass the night, that is, to make a partial stay; sojourn, in French sojourner, from sub and diurnus in the daytime, signifies to pass the day, that is, a certain portion of one's time, in a place; dwelt, from the Danish dwellger to abide, and the Saxon dwellian, Dutch woonen to wander, conveys the idea of a moveable habitation, such as was the practice of living formerly in tents. At present it implies a perpetual stay, which is expressed in common discourse by the word live, for passing one's life; reside, from the Latin re and sideo to sit down, conveys the full idea of a settlement; inhabit, from the Latin habito, a frequentative of habeo, signifies to have or occupy for a permanency.

The length of stay implied in these terms is marked by a certain gradation.

Abide denotes the shortest stay; to sojourn is of longer continuance; dwelt comprehends the idea of perpetuity, but reside and inhabit are partial and local—we dwelt only in one spot, but we may reside at or inhabit many places.

These words have likewise a reference to the state of society.

Abide and sojourn relate more properly to the wandering habits of men in a primitive state of society. Dwell, as implying a stay under a cover, is universal in its application; for we may dwelt either in a palace, a house, a cottage, or any shelter. Live, reside, and inhabit are confined to a civilized state of society; the former applying to the abodes of the inferior orders, the latter to those of the higher classes. The word inhabit is never used but in connexion with the place inhabited.

The Easterns abode with each other, sojourned in a country, and dwelt in tents. The Angels abode with Lot one night; 'From the first to the last of man's abode on earth, the discipline must never be relaxed of guarding the heart from the dominion of passion.'—BLAIR. Abraham sojourned in the land of Canaan; 'By the Israelites' sojourning in Egypt, God made way for their bondage there, and their bondage for a glorious deliverance through those prodigious manifestations of the Divine power.'—SOUTH. The Israelites dwelt in the land of Goshen;

Hence from my sight! Thy father cannot bear thee;
Fly with thy infamy to some dark cell,
Where on the confines of eternal night,
Mourning, misfortunes, cares, and anguish dwelt.

MASSINGER.

Savages either dwelt in the cavities which nature has formed for them, or in some rude structure erected for a temporary purpose; but as men increase in cultivation they build places for themselves which they can inhabit; 'By good company, in the place which I have the misfortune to inhabit, we understand not always those from whom good can be learned.'—JOHNSON. The poor have their cottages in which they can live; the wealthy provide themselves with superb buildings in which they reside; 'Being obliged to remove my habitation, I was led by my evil genius to a convenient house in the street where the nobility reside.'—JOHNSON.

TO CONTINUE, REMAIN, STAY.

Continue, from the Latin contineo, or con and teneo to hold together, signifies to keep together without intermission; remain, in Latin remaneo, is compounded of re or retro and maneo, Greek μένω, Hebrew מָנָה to tarry. Maneo signifies literally to tarry in a place during the night; whence the Latins called those places Mansiones, where travellers passed a night; 'In Mamurharum urbe manemus.'—HORACE. Remaneo signified literally to tarry behind; 'I qui per valetudinis causam remanerant;' stay is but a variation of the word stand.

The idea of confining one's self to something is common to all these terms; but continue applies often to the sameness of action, and remain to sameness of place or situation; the former has most of the active sense in it, and expresses a state of action; the latter is altogether neuter, and expresses a state of rest. We speak of continuing a certain course, of continuing to do, or continuing to be any thing; but of remaining in a position, in a house, in a town, in a condition, and the like; 'Mr. Pryn was sent to a castle in the island of Jersey, Dr. Bastwick to Scilly, and Mr. Burton to Guernsey, where they remained unconsidered, and truly I thought unpitied, (for they were men of no virtue or merit) for the space of two years.'—CLARENDON.

There is more of will in continuing: more of necessity and circumstances in remaining. A person continues in office as long as he can perform it with satisfaction to himself, and his employers; 'I have seen some Roman Catholick authors who tell us, that vicious writers continue in purgatory so long as the influence of their writings continues upon posterity.'—ADDISON. A sentinel remains at his post or station. Continue is opposed to cease; remain is opposed to go. Things continue in motion; they remain stationary. The females among the brutes will sometimes continue to feed their young, long after they are able to provide for themselves; many persons are restored to life after having remained several hours in a state of suspended animation.

Remain and stay are both perfectly neuter in their sense, but remain is employed for either persons or things; stay in this sense is used for persons only. It is necessary for some species of wood to remain long in the water in order to be seasoned;

I will be true to thee, preserve thee ever,
The sad companion of this faithful breast:
While life and thought remain.—ROWE.

Some persons are of so restless a temper, that they cannot stay long in a place without giving symptoms of uneasiness;

Where'er I go, my soul shall stay with thee,
'T is but my shadow that I take away.—DRYDEN.

When remain is employed for persons, it is often involuntary; it is not compulsory; stay is altogether voluntary. Soldiers must remain where they are stationed. Friends stay at each other's houses as visitors. Former times afford many instances of servants continuing faithful to their employers, even in the season of adversity; but so much are times altered, that at present, domestics never remain long enough in their places to create any bond of attachment between master and servant. Their time of stay is now limited to weeks and months, instead of being extended to years.

To remain is frequently taken in the sense of being left from other things, to stay in that of supporting, in which they are perfectly distinct from each other, and also from continue.

TO CONTINUE, PERSEVERE, PERSIST, PURSUE, PROSECUTE.

To continue signifies the same as in the preceding article; to persevere, in French persévérer, Latin perseverare, compounded of per and severus strict and steady, signifies to be steady throughout or to the end; 'Ad ultimum perseverare.'—LIVY. Persist, in French persister, Latin persisto, compounded of per and sisto or sto, signifies to stand by or to a thing; 'In proposito persistere.'—CICERO. Pursue and prosecute, in French, poursuivre, come from the Latin sequor to follow, that is, prosequor and its participle prosecutus, corresponding with prosequor, signifying to follow after or keep on with.

The idea of not laying aside is common to these terms, which is the sense of continue without any other addition; the other terms, which are all species of continuing, include likewise some collateral idea which distinguishes them from the first, as well as from each other. Continue is comparable with persevere and persist in the neuter sense; with pursue and prosecute in the active sense. To continue is simply to do as one has done hitherto; 'Abdallah continuing to extend his former improvements, beautified this whole prospect with groves and fountains.'—ADDISON. To persevere is to continue without wishing to change, or from a positive desire to attain an object; 'If we persevere in studying to do our duty towards God and man, we shall meet with the esteem, love, and confidence of those who are around us.'—BLAIR. To persist is to continue from a determination or will not to cease. The act of continuing, therefore, specifies no characteristic of the agent; that of persevering or persisting marks a direct temper of mind; the former is always used in a good sense, the latter in an indifferent or bad sense; 'If they persist in pointing their batteries to particular persons, no laws of war forbid the making reprisals.'—ADDISON. The Latins have not observed this last distinction between perseverare and persistere, for they say, 'In errore perseverare.'—CICERO. 'In eadem impudentia persistere.'—LIVY. And probably in imitation of them, examples are to be found in English authors of persevere in a bad sense, and persist in a good sense; but modern writers have uniformly observed the distinction. We continue from habit or casualty: we persevere from reflection and the exercise of one's judgement: we persist from attachment. It is not the most exalted virtue to continue in a good course, merely because we have been in the habits of so doing; what is done from habit, merely without any fixed principle, is always exposed to change from the influence of passion or evil counsel: there is real virtue in the act of perseverance, without which many of our best intentions would remain unfulfilled, and our best plans would be defeated; those who do not persevere can do no essential good; and those who do persevere often effect what has appeared to be impracticable; of this truth the discoverer of America is a remarkable proof, who in spite of every mortification, rebuff, and disappointment, persevered in calling the attention of monarchs to his project, until he at length obtained the assistance requisite for effecting the discovery of a new world.

Persevere is employed only in matters of some moment, in things of sufficient importance to demand a steady purpose of the mind; persist is employed in the ordinary business of life, as well as on more important occasions; a learner perseveres in his studies, in order to arrive at the necessary degree of improvement; 'Patience and perseverance overcome the greatest difficulties.'—RICHARDSON. A child persists in making a request, until he has obtained the object of his desire; 'The Arians themselves which were present, subscribed also (to the Nicene creed), not that they meant sincerely and in deed to forsake their error; but only to escape deprivation and exile, which they saw they could not avoid, openly persisting in their former opinions, when the greater part had concluded against them, and that with the emperor's royal assent.'—HOOKER. There is always wisdom in perseverance, even though unsuccessful; there is mostly folly, caprice, or obstinacy in persistence: how different the man who perseveres in the cultivation of his talents, from him who only persists in maintaining falsehoods or supporting errors!

Continue, when compared with persevere or persist, is always coupled with modes of action; but in comparison with pursue or prosecute, it is always followed by some object: we continue to do, persevere, or persist in doing something: but we continue, pursue, or prosecute some object which we wish to bring to perfection by additional labour.

Continue is here equally indefinite, as in the former case; pursue and prosecute both comprehend collateral ideas respecting the disposition of the agent, and the nature of the object: to continue is to go on with a thing as it has been begun; to pursue and prosecute is to continue by some prescribed rule, or in some particular manner: a work is continued; a plan, measure, or line of conduct is pursued; an undertaking or a design is prosecuted: we may continue the work of another in order to supply a deficiency; we may pursue a plan that emanates either from ourselves or another: we prosecute our own work only in order to obtain some peculiar object; continue, therefore, expresses less than pursue, and this less than prosecute. The history of England has been continued down to the present period by different writers; Smollett has pursued the same plan as Hume, in the continuation of his history; Captain Cook prosecuted his work of discovery in three several voyages.

We continue the conversation which has been interrupted; we pursue the subject which has engaged our attention; we pursue a journey after a certain length of stay; we prosecute any particular journey which is important either on account of its difficulties or its object.

To continue is in itself altogether an indifferent action; to pursue is always a commendable action; to prosecute rises still higher in value. It is a mark of great instability not to continue any thing that we begin; 'After having petitioned for power to resist temptation, there is so great an incongruity in not continuing the struggle, that we blush at the thought, and persevere, lest we lose all reverence for ourselves.'—HAWKSWORTH. It betrays a great want of prudence and discernment not to pursue some plan on every occasion which requires method;

Look round the habitable world, how few
Know their own good, or, knowing it, pursue.

DRYDEN.

Will ye not now the pair of sages praise,
Who the same end pursu'd by several ways?
DRYDEN.

It is the characteristic of a persevering mind to prosecute whatever it has deemed worthy to enter upon; There will be some study which every man more zealously prosecutes, some darling subject on which he is principally pleased to converse.—JOHNSON.

TO INSIST, PERSIST.

Both these terms, being derived from the Latin sisto to stand, express the idea of resting or keeping to a thing; but insist signifies to rest on a point, and persist, from per through or by (v. To continue), signifies to keep on with a thing to carry it through. We insist on a matter by maintaining it; we persist in a thing by continuing to do it; we insist by the force of authority or argument; we persist by the mere act of the will. A person insists on that which he conceives to be his right: or he insists on that which he conceives to be right: but he *persist*s in that which he has no will to give up. To insist is therefore an act of discretion: to persist is mostly an act of folly or caprice; the former is always taken in a good or indifferent sense; the latter mostly in a bad sense, at least in colloquial discourse. A parent ought to insist on all matters that are of essential importance to his children; 'This natural tendency of despotick power to ignorance and barbarity, though not insisted upon by others, is, I think, an inconsiderable argument against that form of government.'—ADDISON. A spoiled child *persist*s in its follies from perversity of humour; 'So easy it is for every man living to err, and so hard to wrest from any man's mouth the plain acknowledgment of error, that what hath been once inconsiderately defended, the same is commonly persisted in as long as wit, by whetting itself, is able to find out any shift, be it never so slight, whereby to escape out of the hands of present contradiction.'—HOOKER.

TENACIOUS, PERTINACIOUS.

To be tenacious is to hold a thing close, to let it go with reluctance; to be pertinacious is to hold it out in spite of what can be advanced against it, the prepositive syllable per having an intensive force. A man of tenacious temper insists on trifles that are supposed to affect his importance; a pertinacious temper insists on every thing which is apt to affect his opinions. Tenacity and pertinacity are both foibles, but the former is sometimes more excusable than the latter.

We may be tenacious of that which is good, as when a man is tenacious of whatever may affect his honour; 'So tenacious are we of the old ecclesiastical modes, that very little alteration has been made in them since the fourteenth or fifteenth century; adhering to our old settled maxims, never entirely, nor at once, to depart from antiquity.'—BURKE. We cannot be pertinacious in any thing but our opinions, and that too in cases where they are least defensible; 'The most pertinacious and vehement demonstrator may be wearied in time by continual negation.'—JOHNSON. It commonly happens that people are most tenacious of being thought to possess that in which they are most deficient, and most pertinacious in maintaining that which is absurd. A liar is tenacious of his reputation for truth; 'Men are tenacious of the opinions that first possess them.'—LOCKE. Sophists, free thinkers, and skepticks, are the most pertinacious objectors to whatever is established; 'One of the dissenters appeared to Dr. Sanderson to be so bold, so troublesome, and illogical in the dispute, as forced him to say, that he had never met with a man of more pertinacious confidence and less abilities.'—WALTON.

CONTINUAL, PERPETUAL, CONSTANT.

Continual, in French continuel, Latin continuus, from continuo to hold or keep together, signifies keeping together without intermission; perpetual, in French perpetuel, Latin perpetualis, from perpetuo, compounded of per and peto to seek thoroughly, signifies going on every where and at all times; constant, in Latin constans, or con and sto, signifies the quality of standing to a thing, or standing close together.

What is continual admits of no interruption: what is perpetual admits of no termination. There may be an end to that which is continual and there may be intervals in that which is perpetua. Rains are continual in the tropical climates at certain seasons; complaints among the lower orders are perpetual, but they are frequently without foundation. There is a continual passing and repassing in the streets of the metropolis during the day;

Open your ears, for which of you will stop
The vent of hearing when loud rumour speaks.
Upon my tongue continual slanders ride,
The which in every language I pronounce.
SHAKESPEARE.

The world, and all that it contains, are subject to perpetual change; 'If affluence of fortune unhappily concur to favour the inclinations of the youthful, amusements and diversions succeed in a perpetual round.'—BLAIR.

The continual is that which admits of no interruption, the constant is that which admits of no change. The last twenty-five years have presented to the world a continual succession of events, that have exceeded in importance those going before; the French revolution and the atrocities attendant upon it have been the constant theme of execration with the well-disposed part of mankind. To an intelligent parent it is a continual source of pleasure to watch the progress of his child in the acquirement of knowledge, and the development of his faculties;

'Tis all blank sadness, or continual tears.—POPE.

It will be the constant endeavour of a parent to train him up in principles of religion and virtue, while he is cultivating his talents, and storing his mind with science;

The world's a scene of changes, and to be Constant in nature were inconstancy.—COWLEY.

Continual is used in the proper sense only, constant is employed in the moral sense to denote the temper of the mind (v. Constancy).

CONTINUAL, CONTINUED.

Both these terms mark length of duration, but the former admits of a certain degree of interruption, which the latter does not. What is continual may have frequent pauses; what is continued ceases only to terminate. Rains are continual; noises in a tumultuous street are continual: the bass in music is said to be continued; the mirth of a drunken party is one continued noise. Continual interruptions abate the vigour of application and create disgust: 'In countries situated near the poles, there is one continued darkness for the space of five or six months; during which time the inhabitants are obliged to leave the place.

Continual respects the duration of actions or circumstances only; continued is likewise applied to the extent or course of things: rumours are continual; talking, walking, running, and the like, are continual;

And gulphy Simois rolling to the main,
Helmets and shields and godlike heroes slain:
These turn'd by Phœbus from their wonted ways,
Delug'd the rampire nine continual days.—POPE.

A line, a series, a scene, or a stream of water, &c. is continued:

Our life is one continued toil for fame.—MARTYN.

'By too intense and continued application, our feeble powers would soon be worn out.'—BLAIR.

CONTINUANCE, CONTINUATION, DURATION.

Continuance is said of the time that a thing continues (v. To continue); continuation expresses the act of continuing what has been begun. The continuance of any particular practice may be attended with serious consequence; 'Their duty depending upon fear, the one was of no greater continuance than the other.'—HAYWARD. The continuation of a work depends on the abilities and will of the workmen; 'The Roman poem is but the second part of the Ilias, the continuation of the same story.'—RAY. Authors have however not always observed this distinction; Providence seems to have equally divided the whole mass of mankind into different sexes, that every woman may have her husband, and that both may equally contribute to the continuance of the species.'—STEELE. 'The Pythagorean transmigration, the sensual habitations of the Mahometan, and the shady realms of Pluto, do all agree in the main point, the continuation of our existence.'—BERKELEY.

Continuance and duration, in Latin duratio, from duro to harden, or figuratively to last, are both employed for time; things may be of long continuance, or of long duration: but continuance is used only with regard to the action; duration with regard to the thing and its existence. Whatever is occasionally done, and soon to be ended, is not for a continuance; whatever is made, and soon destroyed, is not of long duration; there are many excellent institutions in England which promise to be of no less continuance than of utility; 'That pleasure is not of greater continuance, which arises from the prejudice or malice of its hearers.'—ADDISON. Duration is with us a relative term; things are of long or short duration: by comparison, the duration of the world and all sublunary objects is nothing in regard to eternity; 'Mr. Locke observes, "that we get the idea of time and duration, by reflecting on that train of ideas which succeed one another in our minds."—ADDISON.

CONTINUATION, CONTINUITY.

Continuation, as may be seen above (v. Continuance), is the act of continuing; continuity is the quality of continuing: the former is employed in the figurative sense for the duration of events and actions; the latter in the physical sense for the adhesion of the component parts of the bodies. The continuation of a history up to the existing period of the writer is the work of every age, if not of every year; 'The sun ascending into the northern signs begetteth first a temperate heat, which by his approach unto the solstice he intendeth; and by continuation the same even upon declination.'—BROWN (Vulgar Errors). There are bodies of so little continuity that they will crumble to pieces on the slightest touch; 'A body always perceives the passages by which it insinuates; feels the impulse of another body where it yields thereto: perceives the separation of its continuity, and for a time resists it; in fine, perception is diffused through all nature.'—BACON.

The sprightly breast demands
Incessant rapture; life, a tedious load
Deny'd its continuity of joy.—SHENSTONE.

DURABLE, LASTING, PERMANENT.

Durable is said of things that are intended to remain a shorter time than those which are lasting; and permanent expresses less than durable; durable, from the Latin durus hard, respects the textures of bodies, and marks the capacity to hold out; lasting, from the verb to last, or the adjective last, signifies to remain the last or longest, and is applicable only to that which is supposed of the longest duration. Permanent, from the Latin permaneo, signifies remaining to the end.

Durable is naturally said of material substances; and lasting of those which are spiritual; although in ordinary discourse sometimes they exchange offices: permanent applies more to the affairs of men.

That which perishes quickly is not durable: that which ceases quickly is not lasting; that which is only for a time is not permanent. Stone is more durable than iron, and iron than wood: in the feudal times animosities between families used to be lasting: a clerk has not a permanent situation in an office. However we may boast of our progress in the arts, we appear to have lost the art of making things as durable as they were made in former times. 'If writings be thus durable, and may pass from age to age, through the whole course of time, how careful should an author be of not committing any thing to print that may corrupt posterity.'—ADDISON. 'The writings of the moderns will many of them be as lasting monuments of human genius as those of the ancients; 'I must desire my fair readers to give a proper direction to their being admired; in order to which they must endeavour to make themselves the objects of a reasonable and lasting admiration.'—ADDISON. One who is of a contented, moderate disposition will generally prefer a permanent situation with small gains to one that is very lucrative but temporary and precarious; 'Land comprehends all things in law of a permanent, substantial nature.'—BLACKSTONE.

DURABLE, CONSTANT.

Durability is the property of things; constancy (v. Constancy) is the property of either persons or things. The durable is that which lasts long. The constant is that which continues without interruption. No durable connexions can be formed which are founded on vicious principles; 'Some states have suddenly emerged, and even in the depths of their calamity have laid the foundation of a towering and durable greatness.'—BURKE. Some persons are never happy but in a constant round of pleasures; 'Since we cannot promise ourselves constant health, let us endeavour at such a temper, as may be our best support in the decay of it.'—STEELE. What is durable is so from its inherent property, but what is constant, in regard to persons or things, arises from the temper of the mind; 'He showed his firm adherence to religion as modelled by our national constitution, and was constant to its offices in devotion, both in publick and in his family.'—ADDISON.

DURATION, TIME.

In the philosophical sense, according to Mr. Locke, time is that mode of duration which is formed in the mind by its own power of observing and measuring passing objects.

In the vulgar sense in which duration is synonymous with time, it stands for the time of duration, and is more particularly applicable to the objects which are said to last; time being employed in general for whatever passes in the world.

Duration comprehends the beginning and end of any portion of time, that is the how long of a thing; time is employed more frequently for the particular portion itself, namely, the time when: we mark the duration of a sound from the time of its commencement to the time that it ceases: the duration of a prince's reign is an object of particular concern to his subjects if he be either very good or the reverse; the time in which he reigns is marked by extraordinary events. An historian computes the duration of reigns and of events in order to determine the antiquity of a nation; 'I think another probable conjecture (respecting the soul's immortality) may be raised from our appetite to duration itself.'—STEELE. An historian fixes the exact time when each person begins to reign and when he dies, in order to determine the number of years that each reigned; 'The time of the fool is long because he does not know what to do with it; that of the wise man, because he distinguishes every moment of it with useful or amusing thoughts.—ADDISON.

TIME, SEASON, TIMELY, SEASONABLE.

Time is here the generic term; it is taken either for the whole or the part: season is any given portion of time. We speak of time when the simple idea of time only is to be expressed, as the time of the day, or the time of the year; the season is spoken in reference to some circumstances; the year is divided into four parts, called the seasons, according to the nature of the weather: hence, in general, that time is called the season which is suitable for any particular purpose, youth is the season for improvement. It is a matter of necessity to choose the time; it is an affair of wisdom to choose the season; 'You will often want religion in times of most danger.'—CHATHAM. 'Piso's behaviour towards us in this season of affliction has endeared him to us.'—MELMOTH (Letters of Cicero).

The same distinction exists between the epithets timely and seasonable as their primitives. The former signifies within the time, that is, before the time is past; the latter according to the season or what the season requires. A timely notice prevents that which would otherwise happen; 'It imports all men, especially bad men, to think on the judgement, that by a timely repentance they may prevent the woful effects of it.'—SOUTH. A seasonable hint seldom fails of its effect because it is seasonable; What you call a bold, is not only the kindest, but the most seasonable proposal you could have made.'—LOCKE. We must not expect to have a timely notice of death, but must be prepared to die at any time; an admonition to one who is on a sick-bed is very seasonable, when given by a minister of religion or a friend. The opposites of these terms are untimely or ill-timed and unseasonable: untimely is directly opposed to timely, signifying before the time appointed; as an untimely death; but ill-timed is indirectly opposed, signifying in the wrong time; as an ill-timed remark.

TIME, PERIOD, AGE, DATE, ÆRA, EPOCHA.

Time (v. Time) is, as before, taken either from time in general, or time in particular; all the other terms are taken for particular portions of time. Time, in the sense of a particular portion of time, is used indefinitely, and in cases where the other terms are not so proper; 'There is a time when we should not only number our days, but our hours.'—YOUNG.

Time included within any given points is termed a period, from the Greek περίοδος, signifying a course, round, or any revolution: thus, the period of day, or of night, is the space of time comprehended between the rising and setting, or setting and rising of the sun; the period of a year comprehends the space which the earth requires for its annual revolution. So, in an extended and moral application, we have stated periods in our life for particular things: during the period of infancy a child is in a state of total dependence on its parents; a period of apprenticeship has been appointed for youth to learn different trades; 'Some experiment would be made how by art to make plants more lasting than their ordinary period; as to make a stalk of wheat last a whole year.'—BACON. This term is employed not only to denote the whole intervening space of time, but also the particular concluding point, which makes it equivalent in sense to the termination of the existence of any body, as to put a period to one's existence, for to kill one's self, or be killed;

But the last period, and the fatal hour,
Of Troy is come.—DENHAM.

The age is a species of period comprehending the life of a man, and consequently referring to what is done by men living within that period: hence we speak of the different ages that have existed since the commencement of the world, and characterize this or that age by the particular degrees of vice or virtue, genius, and the like, for which it is distinguished; 'The story of Haman only shows us what human nature has too generally appeared to be in every age.'—BLAIR.

The date is that period of time which is reckoned from the date or commencement of a thing to the time that it is spoken of; hence we speak of a thing as being of a long or a short date, that is, of being of long or short duration; 'Plantations have one advantage in them which is not to be found in most other works, as they give a pleasure of a more lasting date.'—ADDISON.

Æra, in Latin æra, probably from æs brass, signifying coin with which one computes; and epocha, from the Greek ἐποχή, from ἐπέχω to stop, signifying a resting place; both refer to points of time rendered remarkable by events: but the term æra is more commonly employed in the literal sense for points of computation in chronology, as the Christian æra; 'That period of the Athenian history which is included within the æra of Pisistratus, and the death of Menander the comic poet, may justly be styled the literary age of Greece.'—CUMBERLAND. The term epocha is indefinitely employed for any period distinguished by remarkable events: the grand rebellion is an epocha in the history of England; 'The institution of this library (by Pisistratus) forms a signal epocha in the annals of literature.'—CUMBERLAND.

TIMESERVING, TEMPORIZING.

Timeserving and temporizing are both applied to the conduct of one who adapts himself servilely to the time and season; but a timeserver is rather active, and a temporizer passive. A timeserver avows those opinions which will serve his purpose: the temporizer forbears to avow those which are likely for the time being to hurt him. The former acts from a desire of gain, the latter from a fear of loss. Timeservers are of all parties, as they come in the way; 'Ward had complied during the late times, and held in by taking the covenant: so he was hated by the high men as a timeserver.'—BURNETT. Temporizers are of no party, as occasion requires; 'Feeble and temporizing measures will always be the result, when men assemble to deliberate in a situation where they ought to act.'—ROBERTSON. Sycophant courtiers must always be timeservers: ministers of state are frequently temporizers.

INSTANT, MOMENT.

Instant, from sto to stand, signifies the point of time that stands over us, or as it were over our heads; moment, from the Latin momentum, is any small particle, particularly a small particle of time.

The instant is always taken for the time present; the moment is taken generally for either past, present, or future. A dutiful child comes the instant he is called; a prudent person embraces the favourable moment. When they are both taken for the present time, the instant expresses a much shorter space than the moment; when we desire a person to do a thing this instant, it requires haste; if we desire him to do it this moment, it only admits of no delay. Instantaneous relief is necessary on some occasions to preserve life; 'Some circumstances of misery are so powerfully ridiculous, that neither kindness nor duty can with stand them; they force the friend, the dependant, or the child, to give way to instantaneous motions of merriment.'—JOHNSON. A moment's thought will furnish a ready wit with a suitable reply; 'I can easily overlook any present momentary sorrow, when I reflect that it is in my power to be happy a thousand years hence.'—BERKELEY.

TEMPORARY, TRANSIENT, TRANSITORY FLEETING.

Temporary, from tempus time, characterizes that which is intended to last only for a time, in distinction from that which is permanent; offices depending upon a state of war are temporary, in distinction from those which are connected with internal policy; 'By the force of superiour principles the temporary prevalence of passions may be restrained.'—JOHNSON. Transient, that is, passing, or in the act of passing, characterizes what in its nature exists only for the moment; a glance is transient; 'Any sudden diversion of the spirits, or the justling in of a transient thought, is able to deface the little images of things (in the memory).'—SOUTH. Transitory, that is, to pass away, characterizes every thing in the world which is formed only to exist for a time, and then to pass away; thus our pleasures, and our pains, and our very being, are denominated transitory; 'Man is a transitory being.'—JOHNSON. Fleeting, which is derived from the verb to fly and flight, is but a stronger term to express the same idea as transitory;

Thus when my fleeting days at last,
Unheeded, silently are past,
Calmly I shall resign my breath,
In life unknown, forgot in death.—SECTATOR

COEVAL, COTEMPORARY.

Coeval, from the Latin ævum an age, signifies of the same age; cotemporary, from tempus, signifies of the same time.

An age is a specifically long space of time; a time is indefinite; hence the application of the terms to things in the first case, and to persons in the second: the dispersion of mankind and the confusion of languages were coeval with the building of the tower of Babel; 'The passion of fear seems coeval with our nature.'—CUMBERLAND. Addison was cotemporary with Swift and Pope; 'If the elder Orpheus was the disciple of Linus, he must have been of too early an age to have been cotemporary with Hercules; for Orpheus is placed eleven ages before the siege of Troy.'—CUMBERLAND.

DAILY, DIURNAL.

Daily, from day and like, signifies after the manner or in the time of the day; diurnal, from dies day, signifies belonging to the day.

Daily is the colloquial term, which is applicable to whatever passes in the day time; diurnal is the scientific term, which applies to what passes within or belongs to the astronomical day: the physician makes daily visits to his patients;

All creatures else forget their daily care,
And sleep, the common gift of nature, share.
DRYDEN.

The earth has a diurnal motion on its own axis;
Half yet remains unsung, but narrow bound
Within the visible diurnal sphere.—MILTON.

NIGHTLY, NOCTURNAL.

Nightly, immediately from the word night, and nocturnal, from nox night, signify belonging to the night, or the night season; the former is therefore more familiar than the latter: we speak of nightly depredations to express what passes every night, or nightly disturbances, nocturnal dreams, nocturnal visits;

Yet not alone, while thou
Visit'st my slumbers nightly, when morn
Purples the east.—MILTON.

Or save the sun his labour, and that swift
Nocturnal and diurnal rhomb suppos'd
Invisible else above all stars, the wheel
Of day and night.—MILTON.

OFTEN, FREQUENTLY.

Often, or in its contracted form oft, comes in all probability through the medium of the northern languages, from the Greek αἶ again, and signifies properly repetition of action; frequently, from frequent crowded or numerous, respects a plurality or number of objects.

An ignorant man often uses a word without knowing what it means; ignorant people frequently mistake the meaning of the words they hear. A person goes out very often in the course of a week; he has frequently six or seven persons to visit him in the course of that time. * By doing a thing often it becomes habitual; we frequently meet the same persons in the route which we often take;

Often from the careless back
Of herds and flocks a thousand tugging bills
Pluck hair and wool.—THOMSON.

Here frequent at the visionary hour,
When musing midnight reigns or silent noon,
Angelick harps are in full concert heard.

THOMSON.

OLD, ANCIENT, ANTIQUE, ANTIQUATED, OLD-FASHIONED, OBSOLETE.

Old, from German alt, Low German old, &c., comes from the Greek παλαιος of yesterday; ancient, in French ancien, and antique, antiquated, all come from the Latin antiquus, and antea before, signifying in general before our time; old-fashioned signifies after an old fashion; obsolete, in Latin obsoletus, participle of obsoleo, signifies literally out of use.

Old respects what has long existed and still exists; ancient what existed at a distant period, but does not necessarily exist at present; antique, that which has been long ancient, and of which there remain but faint traces: antiquated, old-fashioned, and obsolete that which has ceased to be any longer used or esteemed. A fashion is old when it has been long in use; 'The Venetians are tenacious of old laws and customs to their great prejudice.'—ADDISON. A custom is ancient when its use has long been passed;

But sev'n wise men the ancient world did know,
We scarce know sev'n who think themselves not so.
DENHAM.

A bust or statue is antique which is the work of the ancients, or made after the manner of the ancient works of art;

* Vide Trusler: "Often, frequently."

Under an oak, whose antique root peeps out
Under the brook that brawls along this wood,
A poor sequester'd stag,
That from the hunters' aim had ta'en a hurt,
Did come to languish.—SHAKESPEARE.

A person is antiquated whose appearance is grown out of date; 'Whoever thinks it necessary to regulate his conversation by antiquated rules, will be rather despised for his futility than caressed for his politeness.'—JOHNSON. Manners which are gone quite out of fashion are old-fashioned; 'The swords in the arsenal of Venice are old-fashioned and unwieldy.'—ADDISON. A word or custom is obsolete which is grown out of use; 'Obsolete words may be laudably revived, when they are more sounding or more significant than those in practice.'—DRYDEN.

The old is opposed to the new: some things are the worse for being old; other things are the better. Ancient and antique are opposed to modern: all things are valued the more for being ancient or antique; hence we esteem the writings of the ancients above those of the moderns. The antiquated is opposed to the customary and established; it is that which we cannot like, because we cannot esteem it: the old-fashioned is opposed to the fashionable: there is much in the old-fashioned to like and esteem; there is much that is ridiculous in the fashionable: the obsolete is opposed to the current; the obsolete may be good; the current may be vulgar and mean.

FRESH, NEW, NOVEL, RECENT, MODERN.

Adelung supposes the German word frisch to be derived from frieren to freeze, as the idea of coolness is prevalent in its application to the air; it is therefore figuratively applied to that which is in its first pure and best state; new, in German neu, comes from the Latin novus, and the Greek νεος; recent, in Latin recens, is supposed to come from re and candeo to whiten or give a fair colour to, because what is new looks so much fairer than what is old.

The fresh is properly opposed to the stale, as the new is to the old: the fresh has undergone no change; the new has not been long in being. Meat, beer, and provisions in general, are said to be fresh; so likewise a person is said to be fresh who is in his full vigour;

Lo! great Æneas rushes to the fight,
Sprung from a god, and more than mortal bold;
He fresh in youth, and I in arms grown old.

POPE

That which is substantial and durable, as houses, clothes, books, or, in the moral sense, pleasures, &c. are said to be new;

Seasons but change new pleasures to produce,
And elements contend to serve our use.—JENYNS.

Novel is to new as the species to the genus: every thing novel is new; but all that is new is not novel: what is novel is mostly strange and unexpected; but what is new is usual and expected: the freezing of the river Thames is a novelty; the frost in every winter is something new when it first comes: that is a novel sight which was either never seen before, or seen but seldom; that is a new sight which is seen for the first time: the entrance of the French king into the British capital was a sight as novel as it was interesting; 'We are naturally delighted with novelty.'—JOHNSON. The entrance of a king into the capital of France was a new sight, after the revolution which had so long existed;

'T is on some evening, sunny, grateful, mild,
When nought but balm is beaming through the woods,
With yellow lustre bright, that the new tribes
Visit the spacious heav'ns.—THOMSON.

Recent is taken only in the improper application; the other two admit of both applications in this case: the fresh is said in relation to what has lately preceded; new is said in relation to what has not long subsisted; recent is used for what has just passed in distinction from that which has long gone by. A person is said to give fresh cause of offence who has already offended;

That love which first was set, will first decay,
Mine of a fresher date will longer stay.—DRYDEN

A thing receives a new name in lieu of the one which it has long had; 'Do not all men complain how little we know, and how much is still unknown? And can we ever know more, unless something new be discovered?'—BURNET. A recent transaction excites an interest which cannot be excited by one of earlier date; 'The courage of the Parliament was increased by two recent events which had happened in their favour.'—HUME. Fresh intelligence arrives every day; it quickly succeeds the events; that intelligence which is recent to a person at a distance is already old to one who is on the spot. Fresh circumstances continually arise to confirm reports; new changes continually take place to supersede the things that were established.

New is said of every thing which has not before existed, or not in the same form as before; modern, from the low Latin modernus, changed as is supposed from hodiernus belonging to the day, is said of that which is new or springs up in the present day or age. A book is new which has never been used; it is modern if it has never been published before; so in like manner principles are new which have not been broached before; but they are modern inasmuch as they are first offered in the day in which we live; 'Some of the ancient and likewise divers of the modern writers, that have laboured in natural magick, have noted a sympathy between the sun and certain herbs.'—BACON.

TO REVIVE, REFRESH, RENOVATE, RENEW.

Revive, from the Latin vivo to live, signifies to bring to life again; to refresh, to make fresh again; to renew and renovate, to make new again. The restoration of things to their primitive state is the common idea included in these terms; the difference consists in their application. Revive, refresh, and renovate are applied to animal bodies; revive expressing the return of motion and spirits to one who was for the time lifeless; refresh expressing the return of vigour to one in whom it has been diminished; the air revives one who is 'faint' a cool breeze refreshes one who flags from the heat. Revive and refresh respect only the temporary state of the body; renovate respects its permanent state, that is, the health of the body; one is revived and refreshed after a partial exhaustion; one's health is renovated after having been considerably impaired.

Revive is applied likewise in the moral sense; 'Herod's rage being quenched by the blood of Mariamne, his love to her again revived.'—PRIDEAUX. Refresh and renovate mostly in the proper sense;

Nor less thy world, Columbus! drinks, refresh'd,
The lavish moisture of the melting year.

THOMSON.

All nature feels the renovating force
Of winter.—THOMSON.

Renew only in the moral sense;

The last great age, foretold by sacred rhymes,
Renews its finished course.—THOMSON.

A discussion is said to be revived, or a report to be revived; a clamour is said to be renewed, or entreaties to be renewed; customs are revived which have lain long dormant, and as it were dead; practices are renewed that have ceased for a time.

FOREFATHERS, PROGENITORS, ANCESTORS.

Forefathers signifies our fathers before us, and includes our immediate parents; progenitors, from pro and gigno, signifies those begotten before us, exclusive of our immediate parents; ancestors, contracted from antecessors or those going before, is said of those from whom we are remotely descended.

Forefathers is a partial and familiar term for the preceding branches of any family; 'We passed slightly over three or four of our immediate forefathers whom we knew by tradition.'—ADDISON. Progenitors is a higher term in the same sense, applied to families of distinction: we speak of the forefathers of a peasant, but the progenitors of a nobleman;

Each in his narrow cell for ever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep.—GRAY.

Suppose a gentleman, full of his illustrious family, should see the whole line of his progenitors pass in review before him; with how many varying passions would he behold shepherds, soldiers, princes, and beggars, walk in the procession of five thousand years?

—ADDISON. Forefathers and progenitors, but particularly the latter, are said mostly of individuals, and respect the regular line of succession in a family; ancestors is employed collectively as well as individually and regards simply the order of succession: we may speak of the ancestors of a nation as well as of any particular person; 'It is highly laudable to pay respect to men who are descended from worthy ancestors.'—ADDISON. This term may also be applied figuratively;

O majestic night!

Nature's great ancestor!—YOUNG.

SENIOR, ELDER, OLDER.

These are all comparatives expressive of the same quality, and differ therefore less in sense than in application.

Senior is employed not only in regard to the extent of age, but also to duration either in office or any given situation; elder is employed only in regard to age: an officer in the army is a senior by virtue of having served longer than another; a boy is a senior in a school either by virtue of his age, his standing in the school, or his situation in the class; 'Cratinus was senior in age to both his competitors Eupolis and Aristophanes.'—CUMBERLAND. When age alone is to be expressed, elder is more suitable than senior; the elder children or the elder branches of a family are clearly understood to include those who have priority of age.

Senior and elder are both employed as substantives; older only as an adjective: hence we speak of the seniors in a school, or the elders in an assembly; but an older inhabitant, an older family;

The Spartans to their highest magistrature
The name of elder did appropriate.—DENHAM.

Since oft

Man must compute that age he cannot feel,
He scarce believes he's older for his years.—YOUNG

Elder has only a partial use; older is employed in general cases: in speaking of children in the same family we may say, the elder son is heir to the estate: he is older than his brother by ten years.

ELDERLY, AGED, OLD.

These three words rise by gradation in their sense, aged denotes a greater degree of age than elderly; and old still more than either.

The elderly man has passed the meridian of life; 'I have a race of orderly, elderly, persons of both sexes, at my command.'—SWIFT. The aged man is fast approaching the term of human existence;

A godlike race of heroes once I knew,
Such as no more these aged eyes shall view.—POPE.

The old man has already reached this term, or has exceeded it;

The field of combat fills the young and bold,
The solemn council best becomes the old.—POPE.

In conformity, however, to the vulgar prepossession against age and its concomitant infirmities, the term elderly or aged is always more respectful than old, which latter word is often used by way of reproach, and can seldom be used free from such an association, unless qualified by an epithet of praise as good or venerable.

FORMERLY, IN TIMES PAST, OR OLD TIMES, DAYS OF YORE, ANCIENTLY, OR ANCIENT TIMES.

Formerly supposes a less remote period than in times past; and that less remote than in days of yore and anciently. The first two may be said of what happens within the age of man; the last two are extended to many generations and ages. Any individual may use the word formerly with regard to himself; thus we enjoyed our health better formerly than now; 'Men were formerly disputed out of their doubts.'—ADDISON. An old man may speak of times past, as when he says he does not enjoy himself as he did in times past. Old times, days of yore, and anciently, are more applicable to nations than to individuals; and all these express different degrees of remoteness. As to our present period, the age of Queen Elizabeth may be called old times;

In times of old, when time was young,
And poets their own verses sung,
A verse could draw a stone or beam.—SWIFT.

The days of Alfred, and still later, the days of yore;
Thus Edgar proud in days of yore,
Held monarchs labouring at the oar.—SWIFT.

The earliest period in which Britain is mentioned may be called ancient times;

In ancient times the sacred plough employ'd
The kings and awful fathers of mankind.
THOMSON.

GENERATION, AGE.

Generation is said of the persons who live during any particular period; and age is said of the period itself. Those who are born at the same time constitute the generation; that period of time which comprehends the age of man is the age; there may therefore be many generations spring up in the course of an age; a fresh generation is springing up every day, which in the course of an age pass away, and are succeeded by fresh generations.

We consider man in his generation as the part which he has to perform; 'I often lamented that I was not one of that happy generation who demolished the convents.'—JOHNSON. We consider the age in which we live as to the manners of men and the events of nations; 'Throughout every age, God hath pointed his peculiar displeasure against the confidence of presumption, and the arrogance of prosperity.'—BLAIR.

LAST, LATEST, FINAL, ULTIMATE.

Last and latest, both from late, in German letzte, come from the Greek ἄστος and λεπτος to leave, signifying left or remaining; final, (v. Final); ultimate comes from ultimus the last.

Last and ultimate respect the order of succession: latest respects the order of time; final respects the completion of an object. What is last or ultimate is succeeded by nothing else: what is latest is not succeeded by any great interval of time; what is final requires to be succeeded by nothing else. The last is opposed to the first; the ultimate is distinguished from that which might follow; the latest is opposed to the earliest; the final is opposed to the introductory or beginning. A person's last words are those by which one is guided; 'The supreme Author of our being has so formed the soul of man that nothing but himself can be its last, adequate, and proper happiness.'—ADDISON. A man's ultimate object is distinguished from that more remote one which may possibly be in his mind: 'The ultimate end of man is the enjoyment of God, beyond which he cannot form a wish.'—GROVE. A conscientious man remains firm to his principles to his latest breath; a pleasant comedy which paints the manners of the age is a durable work, and is transmitted to the latest posterity.—HUME. The final determination of difficult matters requires caution; 'Final causes lie more bare and open to our observation, as there are often a greater variety that belong to the same effect.'—ADDISON. Jealous people strive not to be the last in any thing; the latest intelligence which a man gets of his country is acceptable to one who is in distant quarters of the globe; it requires resolution to take a final leave of those whom one holds near and dear.

LASTLY, AT LAST, AT LENGTH.

Lastly, like last (v. Last), respects the order of succession: at last or at length refer to what has preceded. When a sermon is divided into many heads, the term lastly comprehends the last division. When an affair is settled after much difficulty it is said to be at last settled; and if it be settled after a protracted continuance, it is said to be settled at length; 'Lastly, opportunities do sometimes offer in which a man may wickedly make his fortune without fear of temporal damage. In such cases what restraint do they lie under who have no regard beyond the grave?'—BLAIR. 'I last being satisfied they had nothing to fear they brought out all their corn every day.'—ADDISON. 'A neighbouring king made war upon this female republic several years with various success, and at length overthrew them in a very great battle.'—ADDISON.

ETERNAL, ENDLESS, EVERLASTING.

The eternal is set above time, the endless lies within time, it is therefore by a strong figure that we apply eternal to any thing sublunary; although endless may with propriety be applied to that which is heavenly. That is properly eternal which has neither beginning nor end; that is endless which has a beginning, but no end. God is, therefore, an eternal, but not an endless being;

Distance immense between the pow'rs that shine
Above, eternal, deathless, and divine,
And mortal man!—POPE.

There is an eternal state of happiness or misery, which awaits all men, according to their deeds in this life; the joys or sorrows of men may be said to be endless as regards this life;

The faithful Mydon, as he turn'd from fight
His flying coursers, sunk to endless night.—POPE.

That which is endless has no cessation; that which is everlasting has neither interruption or cessation. The endless may be said of existing things; the everlasting naturally extends itself into futurity: hence we speak of endless disputes, an endless warfare, an everlasting memorial, an everlasting crown of glory;

Back from the car he tumbles to the ground,
And everlasting shades his eyes surround.—POPE

REST, REMAINDER, REMNANT, RESCUE.

Rest evidently comes from the Latin resto, which is compounded of re and sto, signifying to stand or remain back; remainder literally signifies what remains after the first part is gone; remnant is but a variation of remainder; and residue, from resideo, signifies what keeps back by settling.

All these terms express that part which is separated from the other and left distinct: rest is the most general, both in sense and application; the others have a more specific meaning and use: the rest may be either that which is left behind by itself or that which is set apart as a distinct portion: the remainder, remnant, and residue are the quantities which remain when the other parts are gone. The rest is said of any part indefinitely without regard to what has been taken or is gone;

A last farewell!

For since a last must come, the rest are vain,
Like gasps in death which but prolong our pain.

DRYDEN.

But the remainder commonly regards the part which has been left after a part has been taken: 'If he to whom ten talents have been committed, has squandered away five, he is concerned to make a double improvement of the remainder.'—ROGERS. A person may be said to sell some and give away the rest: when a number of hearty persons sit down to a meal, the remainder of the provisions, after all have been satisfied, will not be considerable. Rest is applied either to persons or things; remainder only to things: some were of that opinion, but the rest did not agree to it: the remainder of the paper was not worth preserving. Remnant, from remans in Latin, is a species of remainder, applicable in the proper sense only to cloth or whatever remains unsold out of whole pieces: as a remnant of cotton, linen, and the like; but it may be taken figuratively. Residue is another species of remainder, employed in less familiar matters; the remainder is applied to that which remains after a consumption or removal has taken place: the residue is applied to that which remains after a division has taken place: hence we speak of the remainder of the corn, the remainder of the books, and the like: but the residue of the property, the residue of the effects, and the like. The remainder, remnant, and residue may all be applied either to moral or less familiar objects with a similar distinction: 'Whatever you take from amusements or indefence 'till be repaid you a hundred fold for all the remainder of your days.'—CHATHAM.

For this, far distant from the Latio coast,
She drove the remnant of the Trojan host.

DRYDEN.

The rising deluge is not stopp'd with dams,
But wisely managed, its divided strength
Is sluiced in channels, and securely drained;
And while its force is spent, and unsuppl'd,
The residue, with mounds may be restrain'd.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO SUBSIDE, ABATE, INTERMIT.

A settlement after agitation is the peculiar meaning of subside, from the Latin sub and sedeo, signifying to settle to the bottom. That which has been put into commotion subsides; heavy particles subside in a fluid that is at rest, and tumults are said to subside; 'It was not long before this joy subsided in the remembrance of that dignity from which I had fallen.'—HAWKESWORTH. A diminution of strength characterizes the meaning of abate, which, from the French abatre, signifies to come down in quantity: that which has been high in action may abate; the rain abates after it has been heavy; and a man's anger abates;

But first to heav'n thy due devotions pay,
And annual gifts on Ceres' altar lay,
When winter's rage abates.—DRYDEN.

Alternate action and rest is implied in the word intermit, from the Latin inter between, and mitto to put, signifying to leave a space or interval of rest between labour or action; 'Certain Indians, when a horse is running in his full career, leap down, gather any thing from the ground, and immediately leap up again, the horse not intermitting his course.'—WILKINS.

TO FOLLOW, SUCCEED, ENSUE.

Follow comes probably through the medium of the northern languages from the Greek ἵκω; a trace, or ἵκω to draw; succeed, in Latin succedo, compounded of sub and cedo to walk after; ensue, in French ensuivre, Latin insequor, signifies to follow close upon the back or at the heels.

Follow and succeed are said of persons and things; ensue of things only: follow denotes the going in order, in a trace or line; succeed denotes the going or being in the same place immediately after another: many persons may follow each other at the same time; but only one individual properly succeeds another. Follow is taken literally for the motion of one physical body in relation to another; succeed is taken in the moral sense for taking the situation or office of another: people follow each other in a procession, or one follows another to the grave; a king succeeds to a throne, or a son succeeds to the inheritance of his father.

To follow in relation to things is said either simply of the order in which they go, or of such as go according to a connexion between them; to succeed implies simply to take the place after another; to ensue is to follow by a necessary connexion: people who die quickly one after the other are said to follow each other to the grave; a youth of debauchery is followed by a diseased old age; 'If a man of a good genius for fable were to represent the nature of pleasure and pain in that way of writing, he would probably join them together after such a manner that it would be impossible for the one to come into any place without being followed by the other.'—ADDISON. As in a natural tempest one wave of the sea follows another in rapid succession, so in the moral tempest of political revolutions one mad convulsion is quickly succeeded by another;

Ulysses hastens with a trembling heart,
Before him steps, and bending draws the dart:
Forth flows the blood; an eager pang succeeds,
Tydides mounts, and to the navy speeds.—POPE.

Nothing can ensue from popular commotions but bloodshed and misery;

Nor deem this day, this battle, all you lose;
A day more black, a fate more vile ensues:
Impetuous Hector thunders at the wall,
The hour, the spot, to conquer or to fall.—POPE.

Follow is used in abstr. act propositions: ensue is used in specifick cases: sin and misery follow each other as cause and effect; quarrels too often ensue from the conversations of violent men who differ either in religion or politics.

TO FOLLOW, PURSUE.

The idea of going after any thing in order to reach or obtain it is common to these terms, but under different circumstances: one follows (v. To follow) a person mostly with a friendly intention; one pursues (v. To continue) with a hostile intention: a person follows his fellow-traveller whom he wishes to overtake;

"Now, now," said he, "my son, no more delay,
I yield, I follow where Heav'n shows the way."
DRYDEN.

The officers of justice pursue the criminal whom they wish to apprehend;

The same Rutilians who with arms pursue

The Trojan race are equal foes to you.—DRYDEN.

So likewise the huntsmen and hunters follow the dogs in the chase; the dogs pursue the hare. In application to things, follow is taken more in the passive, and pursue more in the active sense: a man follows the plan of another, and pursues his own plan; he follows his inclination, and pursues an object; 'The felicity is when any one is so happy as to find out and follow what is the proper bent of his genius.'—STEELE.

Look round the habitual world, how few

Know their own good, or, knowing it, pursue.

DRYDEN.

HUNT, CHASE.

The leading idea in the word hunt is that of searching after; the leading idea in the word chase is that of driving away, or before one. In the strict sense, the hunt is made for objects not within sight; the chase is made after such objects only as are within sight: we may hunt, therefore, without chasing; we may chase without hunting: a person hunts after, but does not chase, that which is lost; a boy chases, rather than hunts a butterfly;

Come hither, boy! we'll hunt to-day
The bookworm, ravening beast of prey

PARNELL

Greatness of mind and fortune too

Th' Olympic trophies show;

Both their several parts must do

In the noble chase of fame.—COWLEY.

When applied to field sports, the hunt commences as soon as the huntsman begins to look for the game; the chase commences as soon as it is found: on this ground, perhaps it is, that hunt is used in familiar discourse, to designate the specifick act of taking this amusement; and chase is used only in particular cases where the peculiar idea is to be expressed: a fox hunt, or a stag hunt, is said to take place on a particular day; or that there has been no hunting this season, or that the hunt has been very bad: but we speak, on the other hand, of the pleasures of the chase: or say that the chase lasted very long; the animal gave a long chase.

FOREST, CHASE, PARK,

* Are all habitations for animals of ventry: but the forest is of the fairest magnitude and importance, it being a franchise and the property of the king; the chase and park may be either publick or private property. The forest is so formed of wood, and covers such an extent of ground, that it may be the haunt of wild beasts; of this description are the forests in Germany: the chase is an indefinite and open space that is allotted expressly for the chase of particular animals, such as deer; the park is an enclosed space that serves for the preservation of domestick animals.

SUCCESSION, SERIES, ORDER.

Succession signifies the act or state of succeeding (v. To follow); series, (v. Series); order (v. To place).

Succession (v. To follow) is a matter of necessity or casualty: things succeed each other, or they are taken in succession either arbitrarily or by design: the series (v. Series) is a connected succession; the order is the ordered or arranged succession. We observe the succession of events as a matter of curiosity; 'We can conceive of time only by the succession of ideas one o another.'—HAWKESWORTH. We trace the series of events as a matter of intelligence; 'A number of distinct fables may contain all the topics of moral instruction; yet each must be remembered by a distinct effort of the mind, and will not recur in a series, because they have no connexion with each other.'—HAWKESWORTH. We follow the order which the historian has pursued as a matter of judgement; 'In all verse, however familiar and easy, the words are necessarily thrown out of the order in which they are commonly used.'—HAWKESWORTH. The succession may be slow or quick; the series may be long or short; the order may be correct or incorrect. The present age has afforded a quick succession of events, and presented us with a series of atrocious attempts to disturb the peace of society under the name of liberty. The historian of these times needs only pursue the order which the events themselves point out.

Vide Trusler: "Forest, chase, park."

SUCCESSIVE, ALTERNATE.

What is successive follows directly; what is alternate follows indirectly. A minister preaches successively who preaches every Sunday uninterrupted at the same hour; but he preaches alternately if he preaches on one Sunday in the morning, and the other Sunday in the afternoon at the same place. The successive may be accidental or intentional; the alternate is mostly intentional: it may rain for three successive days, or a fair may be held for three successive days; 'Think of a hundred solitary streams peacefully gliding between amazing cliffs on one side and rich meadows on the other, gradually swelling into noble rivers, successively losing themselves in each other, and all at length terminating in the harbour of Plymouth.'—GIBSON. Trees are placed sometimes in alternate order, when every other tree is of the same size and kind; 'Suffer me to point out one great essential towards acquiring facility in composition; viz. the writing alternately in different measures.'—SEWARD.

NATURALLY, IN COURSE, CONSEQUENTLY, OF COURSE.

The connexion between events, actions, and things, is expressed by all these terms. Naturally signifies according to the nature of things, and applies therefore to the connexion which subsists between events according to the original constitution or inherent properties of things: in course signifies in the course of things, that is, in the regular order that things ought to follow: consequently signifies by a consequence, that is, by a necessary law of dependence, which makes one thing follow another: of course signifies on account of the course which things most commonly or even necessarily take. Whatever happens naturally, happens as we expect it; whatever happens in course, happens as we approve of it; whatever follows consequently, follows as we judge it right; whatever follows of course, follows as we see it necessarily. Children naturally imitate their parents: people naturally fall into the habits of those they associate with: both these circumstances result from the nature of things: whoever is made a peer of the realm, takes his seat in the upper house in course; he requires no other qualification to entitle him to this privilege, he goes thither according to the established course of things; consequently, as a peer, he is admitted without question; this is a decision of the judgement by which the question is at once determined: of course none are admitted who are not peers; this flows necessarily out of the constituted law of the land.

Naturally and in course describe things as they are; consequently and of course represent them as they must be; naturally and in course state facts or realities; consequently and of course state the inferences drawn from those facts, or consequences resulting from them; a mob is naturally disposed to riot, and consequently it is dangerous to appeal to a mob for its judgement; the nobility attend at court in course, that is, by virtue of their rank; soldiers of course the town of course at assize or election time, that is, because the law forbids them to remain. Naturally is opposed to the artificial or forced; in course is opposed to the irregular: naturally excludes the idea of design or purpose; in course includes the idea of arrangement and social order: the former is applicable to every thing that has an independent existence; the latter is applied to the constituted order of society: the former is, therefore, said of every object, animate or inanimate, having natural properties, and performing natural operations; the latter only of persons and their establishment. Plants that require much air naturally thrive most in an open country; 'Egotists are generally the vain and shallow part of mankind; people being naturally full of themselves when they have nothing else in them.'—ADDISON. Members of a society, who do not forfeit their title by the breach of any rule or law, are readmitted in course, after ever so long an absence; 'Our Lord foresaw, that all the Mosaic orders would cease in course upon his death.'—BEVERIDGE.

Consequently is either a speculative or a practical inference; of course is always practical. We know that all men must die, and consequently we expect to share the common lot of humanity: we see that our friends are particularly engaged at a certain time; consequently we do not interrupt them by calling upon them; 'The forty-seventh proposition of the first book of Euclid is the foundation of trigonometry, and consequently of navigation.'—BARTLETT. When a man does not fulfil his engagements, he cannot of course expect to be rewarded, as if he had done his duty; 'What do trust and confidence signify in a matter of course and formality?'—STILLINGFLEET. In course applies to what one does or may do; of course applies to what one must do or leave undone. Children take possession of their patrimony in course at the death of their parents: while the parents are living, children of course derive support or assistance from them.

SUBSEQUENT, CONSEQUENT, POSTERIOUR

Subsequent, in Latin subsequens, from sub and sequor, signifies following next in order; consequent, in Latin consequens, from con and sequor, i. e. following in connexion; posterior, from postea afterward, signifies literally that which is after.

These terms are all applied to events as they follow one another, but subsequent and consequent respect the order of events. Subsequent simply denotes this order without any collateral idea: one event is said to be subsequent to another at any given time; 'This article is introduced as subsequent to the treaty of Munster, made about 1648, when England was in the utmost confusion.'—SWIFT. Consequent denotes the connexion between two events, one of which follows the other as the effect of a cause; 'This satisfaction or dissatisfaction, consequent upon a man's acting suitably or unsuitably to conscience, is a principle not easily to be worn out.'—SOUTH. Posterior respects the time of events; Hesiod was posterior to Homer: and also the place of things; 'Where the antérieur body giveth way as fast as the posterior cometh on, it maketh no noise, be the motion never so great.' BACON.

ANTECEDENT, PRECEDING, FOREGOING, PREVIOUS, ANTERIOUR, PRIOR, FORMER.

Antecedent, in Latin antecedens, that is, ante and cedens going before; preceding, in Latin præcedens going before; foregoing, literally going before; previous, in Latin prævious, that is, præ and via making a way before; antérieur, the comparative of the Latin ante before; prior, in Latin prior, comparative of primus first; former, in English the comparative of first.

Antecedent, preceding, foregoing, previous, are employed for what goes or happens before; antérieur, prior, former, for what is, or exists before.

* Antecedent marks priority of order, place, and position, with this peculiar circumstance, that it denotes the relation of influence, dependence and connexion established between two objects: thus, in logic the premises are called the antecedent, and the conclu-

* Vide Roubaud: "Antérieur, antécédent, précédent"

Mon the consequent; in theology or politicks, the antecedent is any decree or resolution which influences another decree or action; in mathematics, it is that term from which any induction can be drawn to another; in grammar, the antecedent is that which requires a particular regimen from its consequent.

Antecedent and preceding both denote priority of time, or the order of events; but the former in a more vague and indeterminate manner than the latter. A preceding event is that which happens immediately before the one of which we are speaking; whereas antecedent may have events or circumstances intervening; 'The seventeen centuries since the birth of Christ are antecedent to the eighteenth, or the one we live in; but it is the seventeenth only which we call he preceding one.'—TRUSLER. 'Little attention was paid to literature by the Romans in the early and more martial ages. I read of no collections of books antecedent to those made by Æmilius Paulus, and Lucullus.'—CUMBERLAND. 'Letters from Rome, dated the thirteenth instant, say, that on the preceding Sunday, his Holiness was carried in an open chair from St. Peter's to St. Mary's.'—STEELE. An antecedent proposition may be separated from its consequent by other propositions; but a preceding proposition is closely followed by another. In this sense antecedent is opposed to posterior; preceding to succeeding.

Preceding respects simply the succession of times and things; but previous denotes the succession of actions and events, with the collateral idea of their connexion with and influence upon each other: we speak of the preceding day, or the preceding chapter, merely as the day or chapter that goes before; but when we speak of a previous engagement or a previous inquiry, it supposes an engagement or inquiry preparatory to something that is to follow. Previous is opposed to subsequent:

A boding silence reigns

Dead through the dun expanse, save the dull sound
That from the mountain, previous to the storm,
Rolls o'er the muttering earth.—THOMSON.

Foregoing is employed to mark the order of things narrated or stated; as when we speak of the foregoing statement, the foregoing objections, or the foregoing calculation, &c.; foregoing is opposed to following: 'Consistently with the foregoing principles we may define original and naive poetry to be the language of the violent passions, expressed in exact measure.'—SIR W. JONES.

Anterior, prior, and former have all a relative sense, and are used for things that are more before than others: anterior is a technical term to denote forwardness of position, as in anatomy; the anterior or fore part of the skull, in contradistinction to the hind part; so likewise the anterior or fore front of a building, in opposition to the back front; 'If that be the anterior or upper part wherein the senses are placed, and that the posterior and lower part, which is opposite thereunto, there is no inferior or former part in this animal: for the senses being placed at both extremes make both ends anterior, which is impossible.'—BROWN. Prior is used in the sense of previous when speaking of comparatively two or more things, when it implies anticipation; a prior claim invalidates the one that is set up; a prior engagement prevents the forming of any other that is proposed; 'Some accounts make Thamyris the eighth epic poet prior to Homer, an authority to which no credit seems due.'—CUMBERLAND. Former is employed either with regard to times, as former times, in contradistinction to later periods, or with regard to propositions, when the former or first thing mentioned is opposed to the latter or last mentioned; 'Former follies pass away and are forgotten. Those which are present strike observation and sharpen censure.'—BLAIR.

PRIORITY, PRECEDENCE, PRE-EMINENCE, PREFERENCE.

Priority denotes the abstract quality of being before others; precedence, from pro and cedo, signifies the state of going before; pre-eminence signifies being more eminent or elevated than others; preference signifies being put before others. Priority respects simply the order of succession, and is applied to objects either in a state of motion or rest: precedence signifies priority in going, and depends upon a right or privilege; pre-eminence signifies priority in being, and depends upon merit; preference signifies priority in placing, and depends upon favour. The priority is applicable rather to the thing than the person; it is not that which is sought for, but that which is to be had: age frequently gives priority where every other claim is wanting; 'A better place, a more commodious seat, priority in being helped at table, &c., what is it but sacrificing ourselves in such trifles to the convenience and pleasures of others?'—EARL CHATHAM. The immoderate desire for precedence is often nothing but a childish vanity; it is a distinction that flows out of rank and power: a nobleman claims a precedence on all occasions of ceremony; 'Ranks will then (in the next world) be adjusted, and precedency set right.'—ADDISON. The love of pre-eminence is laudable, inasmuch as it requires a degree of moral worth which exceeds that of others; a general aims at pre-eminence in his profession; 'It is the concern of mankind, that the destruction of order should not be a claim to rank; that crimes should not be the only title to pre-eminence and honour.'—BURKE. Those who are anxious to obtain the best for themselves, are eager to have the preference: we seek for the preference in matters of choice; 'You will agree with me in giving the preference to a sincere and sensible friend.'—GIBBON.

TO EXCEED, SURPASS, EXCEL, TRANSCEND, OUTDO.

Exceed, from the Latin excedo, compounded of ex and cedo to pass out of, or beyond the line, is the general term. Surpass, compounded of sur over, and pass, is one species of exceeding. Excel, compounded of ex and cello to lift, or move over, is another species.

Exceed, in its limited acceptation, conveys no idea of moral desert; surpass and excel are always taken in a good sense. It is not so much persons as things which exceed; both persons and things surpass; persons only excel. One thing exceeds another, as the success of an undertaking exceeds the expectations of the undertaker, or a man's exertions exceed his strength;

Man's boundless avarice exceeds,
And on his neighbours round about him feeds.

WALLER.

One person surpasses another, as the English have surpassed all other nations in the extent of their naval power; or one thing surpasses another, as poetry surpasses painting in its effects on the imagination. 'Dryden often surpasses expectation, and Pope never falls below it.'—JOHNSON. One person excels another; thus formerly the Dutch and Italians excelled the English in painting;

To him the king: How much thy years excel
In arts of counsel, and in speaking well.—POPE.

We may surpass without any direct or immediate effort; we cannot excel without effort. Nations as well as individuals will surpass each other in particular arts and sciences, as much from local and adventitious circumstances, as from natural genius and steady application; no one can expect to excel in learning, whose indolence gets the better of his ambition. The derivatives excessive and excellent have this obvious distinction between them, that the former always signifies exceeding in that which ought not to be exceeded, and the latter exceeding in that where it is honourable to exceed: he who is habitually excessive in any of his indulgences, must be insensible to the excellence of a temperate life.

Transcend, from trans beyond, and scendo or scando to climb, signifies climbing beyond; and outdo signifies doing out of the ordinary course: the former, like surpass, refers rather to the state of things; and outdo, like excel, to the exertions of persons: the former rises in sense above surpass; but the latter is only employed in particular cases, that is, to excel in action: excel is however confined to that which is good; outdo to that which is good or bad. The genius of Homer transcends that of almost every other poet;

Auspicious prince, in arms a mighty name,
But yet whose actions far transcend your fame.

DRYDEN

Heliogabalus outdid every other emperor in extra gance; 'The last and crowning instance of our love to our enemies is to pray for them. For by this a man would fain to outdo himself.'—SOUTH.

EXCELLENCE, SUPERIORITY.

Excellence is an absolute term; superiority is a relative term: many may have excellence in the same degree, but they must have superiority in different degrees; superiority is often superior excellence, but in many cases they are applied to different objects.

There is a moral excellence attainable by all who have the will to strive after it;

Base envy withers at another's joy,
And hates that excellence it cannot reach.

THOMSON.

There is an intellectual and physical superiority which is above the reach of our wishes, and is granted to a few only; 'To be able to benefit others is a condition of freedom and superiority.'—TILLOTSON.

PRIMARY, PRIMITIVE, PRISTINE, ORIGINAL.

Primary, from primus, signifies belonging to or like the first; primitive, from the same, signifies according to the first; pristine, in Latin pristinus, from prins, signifies in former times; original signifies containing the origin.

The primary denotes simply the order of succession, and is therefore the generic term; primitive, pristine, and original include also the idea of some other relation to the thing that succeeds, and are therefore modes of the primary. The primary has nothing to come before it; in this manner we speak of the primary cause as the cause which precedes secondary causes: the primitive is that after which other things are formed; in this manner a primitive word is that after which, or from which, the derivatives are formed: the pristine is that which follows the primitive, so as to become customary; there are but few specimens of the pristine purity of life among the professors of Christianity: the original is that which either gives birth to the thing or belongs to that which gives birth to the thing; the original meaning of a word is that which was given to it by the makers of the word. The primary subject of consideration is that which should precede all others; 'Memory is the primary and fundamental power, without which there could be no other intellectual operation.'—JOHNSON. The primitive state of society is that which was formed without a model, but might serve as a model;

Meanwhile our primitive great sire to meet
His godlike guest walks forth.—MILTON.

The pristine simplicity of manners may serve as a just pattern for the imitation of present times;

While with her friendly clay he deign'd to dwell,
Shall she with safety reach her pristine seat.

PRIOR.

The original state of things is that which is coeval with the things themselves; 'As to the share of power each individual ought to have in the state, that I must deny to be among the direct original rights of man.'

—BURKE.

SECOND, SECONDARY, INFERIOUR.

Second and secondary both come from the Latin secundus, changed from sequendus and sequor to follow, signifying the order of succession. The former simply expresses this order; but the latter includes the accessory idea of comparative demerit; a person stands second in a list, or a letter is second which immediately succeeds the first;

Fond, foolish man! With fear of death surpris'd,
Which either should be wish'd for or despis'd;
This, if our souls with bodies death destroy,
That, if our souls a second life enjoy.—DENHAM.

A consideration is secondary, or of secondary importance, which is opposed to that which holds the first rank; 'Many, instead of endeavouring to form their own opinions, content themselves with the secondary knowledge which a convenient bench in a coffee-house can supply.'—JOHNSON. Secondary and inferiour both designate some lower degree of a quality: but secondary is only applied to the importance or value of things; inferiour is applied generally to all qualities: a man of business reckons every thing as secondary which does not forward the object he has in view; 'Who, esoever there is moral right on the one hand, no secondary right can discharge it.'—L'ESTRANGE. Men of inferiour abilities are disqualified by nature for high and important stations, although they may be more fitted for lower stations than those of greater abilities;

Hast thou not made me here thy substitute,
And these inferiour far beneath me set?

MILTON.

Sometimes second is taken in the sense of inferiour when applied to any particular object compared with another;

Who am alone
From all eternity; for none I know
Second to me, or like.—MILTON.

THEREFORE, CONSEQUENTLY, ACCORDINGLY.

Therefore, that is, for this reason, marks a deduction; consequently, that is, in consequence, marks a consequence; accordingly, that is, according to some thing, implies an agreement or adaptation. Therefore is employed particularly in abstract reasoning; consequently is employed either in reasoning or in the narrative style; accordingly is used principally in the narrative style. Young persons are perpetually liable to fall into error through inexperience; they ought therefore the more willingly to submit themselves to the guidance of those who can direct them; 'If you cut off the top branches of a tree, it will not therefore cease to grow.'—HUGHES. The French nation was reduced to a state of moral anarchy during the revolution; consequently nothing but time and good government could bring the people back to the use of their sober senses; 'Reputation is power; consequently to despise is to weaken.'—SOUTH. Every preparation was made, and every precaution was taken; accordingly at the fixed hour they proceeded to the place of destination; 'The pathetic, as Longinus observes may animate the sublime; but is not essential to it. Accordingly, as he further remarks, we very often find that those who excel most in stirring up the passions, very often want the talent of writing in the sublime manner.'—ADDISON.

PREVIOUS, PRELIMINARY, PREPARATORY INTRODUCTORY.

Previous, in Latin prævis, compounded of præ and via, signifies leading the way or going before; preliminary, from præ and limen a threshold, signifies belonging to the threshold or entrance; preparatory and introductory signify belonging to a preparation or introduction.

Previous denotes simply the order of succession: the other terms, in addition to this, convey the idea of connexion between the objects which succeed each other. Previous applies to actions and proceedings in general; as a previous question, a previous inquiry, a previous determination; 'One step by which a temptation approaches to its crisis is a previous growing familiarity of the mind with the sin which a man is tempted to.'—SOUTH. Preliminary is employed only for matters of contract; a preliminary article, a preliminary condition, are what precede the final settlement of any question; 'I have discussed the nuptial preliminaries so often, that I can repeat the forms in which jointures are settled and pin-money secured.'—JOHNSON. Preparatory is employed for matters of arrangements; the disposing of men in battle is preparatory to an engagement; the making of marriage deeds and contracts is preparatory to the final solemnization of the marriage. 'Æschylus is in the practice of holding the spectator in suspense by a preparatory silence in his chief person.'—CUMBERLAND. Introductory is employed for matters of science or discussion; as remarks are introductory to the main subject in question; compendiums of grammar, geography, and the like, as introductory to larger works, are useful for young people; 'Consider your selves as acting now, under the eye of God, an introductory part to a more important scene.'—BLAIR. Prudent people are careful to make every previous inquiry before they seriously enter into engagements with strangers: it is impolitic to enter into details until all preliminary matters are fully adjusted: one ought never to undertake any important matter without first adopting every preparatory measure that can facilitate its prosecution: in complicated matters it is necessary to have something introductory by way of explanation.

SERIES, COURSE.

Series, which is also series in Latin, comes from sero or necto to knit together, and the Greek σύνδεσμος a chain, and signifies the order and connexion, in which things follow each other; course, in Latin cursus, from the verb curro, signifies here the direction in which things run one after another.

There is always a course where there is a series, but not vice versa. Things must have some sort of connexion with each other in order to form a series, but they need simply to follow in order to form a course; thus a series of events respects those which flow out of each other, a course of events, on the contrary, respects those which happen unconnectedly within a certain space: so in like manner, the numbers of a book, which serve to form a whole, are a series; and a number of lectures following each other at a given time are a course: hence, likewise, the technical phrase infinite series in algebra.

COURSE, RACE, PASSAGE.

Course, from curro to run, signifies either the act of running, or the space run over; race, from run, signifies the same; passage, from pass, signifies either the act of passing or the space passed over.

With regard to the act of going, course is taken absolutely and indefinitely; race relates to the object for which we run; passage relates to the place passed over: thus a person may be swift in course, obtain a race, and have an easy passage;

Him neither rocks can crush, nor steel can wound
When Ajax fell not on th' ensanguined ground;
In standing fight he mates Achilles' force,
Excell'd alone in swiftness in the course.—POPE.

Unhappy man whose death our hands shall grace,
Fate calls thee hence, and finish'd is thy race.

POPE.

Between his shoulders pierced the following dart,
And held its passage through the panting heart.

POPE.

We pursue whatever course we think proper: we run the race that is set before us. Course is taken absolutely by itself; race is considered in relation to others: a man pursues a certain course according to discretion; he runs a race with another by way of competition. Course has a more particular reference to the space that is gone over; race includes in it more particularly the idea of the mode of going: we speak of going in, or pursuing a particular course; but always of running a race.

Course is as often used in the improper as the proper sense; race is seldom used figuratively, except in a spiritual application: man's success and respectability in life depend much upon the course of moral conduct which he pursues;

So Mars omnipotent invades the plain
(The wide destroyer of the race of man);
Terror, his best loved son, attends his course,
Arm'd with stern boldness, and enormous force.

POPE.

The Christian's course in this world is represented in Scripture as a race which is set before him;

Remote from towns he ran his godly race,
Nor e'er had changed, nor wish'd to change, his place.

GOLDSMITH.

Course may be used in connexion with the object passed over or not; passage is seldom employed but in the direct connexion; we speak of a person's course in a place, or simply of his course; but we always speak of a person's passage through a place;

Direct against which open'd from beneath,
Just o'er the blissful seat of paradise,
A passage down to earth, a passage wide.

MILTON.

Course and passage are used for inanimate as well as animate objects; race is used for those only which are animate: a river has its course, and sometimes it is a dangerous passage for vessels; the horse or man runs the race.

WAY, ROAD, ROUT OR ROUTE, COURSE.

Way has the same signification as given under the head of way; road comes no doubt from ride, signifying the place where one rides; route or roul comes in all probability from rotundus round, signifying the round which one goes; course, from the Latin cursus, signifies the place where one walks or runs. Way is here the generic term; it is the path which a person chooses at pleasure for himself;

He stood in the gate, and asked of ev'ry one

Which way she took, and whither she was gone
DRYDEN.

The road is the regular and beaten way, whether taken in a proper or improper sense; 'At our first sally into the intellectual world, we all march together along one straight and open road.'—JOHNSON. The route is any way or road chosen for a particular purpose, either of pleasure or business. An army or a company go a certain route; 'Cortes (after his defeat at Mexico) was engaged in deep consultation with his officers concerning the route which they ought to take in their retreat.'—ROBERTSON. The course is chosen in the unbeaten track: foot passengers are seen to take a certain course over fields;

Then to the stream when neither friends nor force,
Nor speed, nor art avail, he shapes his course.

DENHAM.

WAY, MANNER, METHOD, MODE, COURSE, MEANS.

All these words denote the steps which are pursued from the beginning to the completion of any work. The way is both general and indefinite; it is either taken by accident or chosen by design. Whoever attempts to do that which is strange to him, will at first do it in an awkward way; 'His way of expressing and applying them, not his invention of them we must admire.'—ADDISON. The manner and the method are both species of the way. The manner is that which a person chooses for a particular occasion; the manner of conferring a favour is often more than the favour itself; 'My mind is taken up in a more melancholy manner.'—ATTERBURY. The method is that which a person conceives in his own mind; experience supplies men in the end with a suitable method of carrying on their business. The method is said of that which requires contrivance; the mode, of that which requires practice and habitual attention; the former being applied to matters of art, and the latter to mechanical actions: the master has a good method of teaching to write; the scholar has a good or bad mode of holding his pen; 'Modes of speech, which owe their prevalence to modish folly, die away with their inventors.'—JOHNSON. The course and the means are the way which we pursue in our moral conduct: the course is the course of measures which are adopted to produce a certain result; 'All your sophisters cannot produce any thing better adapted to preserve a rational and manly freedom than the course that we have pursued.'—BURKE. The means collectively for the course which lead to a certain end; 'The most wonderful things are brought about in many instances by means the most absurd and ridiculous.'—BURKE. In order to obtain legal redress, we must pursue a certain course in law; law is one means of gaining redress, which must be adopted when all other means fail.

SYSTEM, METHOD.

System, in Latin systema, Greek συστήμα, from σύν together and στηναι to stand together, signifies that which is put together so as to form a whole; method, in Latin methodus, from the Greek μετά and ὁδός a way, signifies by distinction the way by which anything is effected

System expresses more than method, which is but a part of system: system is an arrangement of many single or individual objects according to some given rule, so as to make them coalesce. Method is the manner of this arrangement, or the principle upon which this arrangement takes place. The term system however applies to a complexity of objects, but arrangement, and consequently method, may be applied to every thing that is to be put into execution. All sciences must be reduced to system; for without system there is no science;

If a better system's thine,
Impart it frankly, or make use of mine.—FRANCIS.

All business requires method; and without method little can be done to any good purpose; "The great defect of the Seasons is the want of method, but for this I know not that there was any remedy."—JOHNSON.

ORDER, METHOD, RULE.

Order is applied in general to every thing that is disposed (v. To dispose); method (v. System) and rule (v. Guide) are applied only to that which is done; the order lies in consulting the time, the place, and the object, so as to make them accord; the method consists in the right choice of means to an end; the rule consists in that which will keep us in the right way. Where there is a number of objects there must be order in the disposition of them: there must be order in a school as to the arrangement both of the pupils and of the business: where there is work to carry on, or any object to obtain, or any art to follow, there must be method in the pursuit; a tradesman or merchant must have method in keeping his accounts; a teacher must have a method for the communication of instruction; 'It will be in vain to talk to you concerning the method I think best to be observed in schools.'—LOCKE. The rule is the part of the method; it is that on which the method rests; there cannot be method without rule, but there may be rule without method; the method varies with the thing that is to be done; the rule is that which is permanent and serves as a guide under all circumstances. We adopt the method and follow the rule. A painter adopts a certain method of preparing his colours according to the rules laid down by his art; 'A rule that relates even to the smallest part of our life, is of great benefit to us, merely as it is a rule.'—LAW.

Order is said of every complicated machine, either of a physical or a moral kind; the order of the universe, by which every part is made to harmonize to the other part, and all individually to the whole collectively, is that which constitutes its principal beauty: as rational beings we aim at introducing the same order into the moral scheme of society: order is therefore that which is founded upon the nature of things, and seems in its extensive sense to comprehend all the rest; 'The order and method of nature is generally very different from our measures and proportions.'—BURKE. Method is the work of the understanding, mostly as it is employed in the mechanical process; sometimes, however, as respects intellectual objects; rule is said either as it respects mechanical and physical actions or moral conduct.

The order of society is preserved by means of government, or authority: laws or rules are employed by authority as instruments in the preservation of order: no work should be performed, whether it be the building a house, or the writing a book, without method; this method will be more or less correct, as it is formed according to definite rules.

The term rule is, however, as before observed, employed distinctly from either order or method, for it applies to the moral conduct of the individual. The Christian religion contains rules for the guidance of our conduct in all the relations of human society;

Their story I revolv'd; and reverent own'd
Their polish'd arts of rule, their human virtues.

MALLET.

As epithets, orderly, methodical, and regular, are applied to persons and even to things, according to the above distinction of the nouns: an orderly man, or an orderly society, is one that adheres to the established order of things: the former in his domestick habits, the latter in their public capacity, their social meetings, and their social measures;

Then to their dams
Lets in their young, and wondrous orderly,
With manly haste, dispatch this house-wifery.

CHAPMAN.

A methodical man is one who adopts methods in all he sets about; such a one may sometimes run into the extreme of formality, by being precise where precision is not necessary. We cannot however speak of a methodical society, for method is altogether a personal quality. A man is regular, inasmuch as he follows a certain rule in his moral actions, and thereby preserves a uniformity of conduct: a regular society is one founded by certain prescribed rules.

A disorderly person in a family discomposes its domestic economy: a man who is disorderly in his business throws every thing into confusion. It is of peculiar importance for a person to be methodical who has the superintendence of other people's labour: much time is lost and much fruitless trouble occasioned by the want of method; 'I do begin methodically, I should enjoin you travel; for absence doth remove the cause, removing the object.'—SUCKLING. Regularity of life is of as much more importance than order and method, as a man's durable happiness is of more importance than the happiness of the moment: the orderly and methodical respect only the transitory modes of things; but the regular concerns a man both for body and soul; 'He was a mighty lover of regularity and order, and managed his affairs with the utmost exactness.'—ATERBURY.

These terms are in like manner applied to that which is personal; we say, an orderly proceeding, or an orderly course for what is done in due order: a regular proceeding, or a regular course, which goes on according to a prescribed rule; a methodical grammar, a methodical delineation, and the like, for what is done according to a given method.

CLASS, ORDER, RANK, DEGREE.

Class, in French classe, Latin classis, very probably from the Greek κλᾱσις, a fraction, division, or class; order, in French ordre, Latin ordo, comes from the Greek ὄρεος a row, which is a species of order; rank, in German rang, is connected with row, &c.; degree, in French degré, comes from the Latin gradus a step.

Class is more general than order; degree is more specific than rank.

Class and order are said of the body who are distinguished; rank and degree of the distinction itself: men belong to a certain class or order; they hold a certain rank; they are of a certain degree: among the Romans all the citizens were distinctly divided into classes according to their property; but in the modern constitution of society, classes are distinguished from each other on general, moral, or civil grounds; there are reputable or disreputable classes; the labouring class, the class of merchants, mechanics, &c.; 'We are by our occupations, education, and habits of life, divided almost into different species. Each of these classes of the human race has desires, fears, and conversation, vexations and merriment, peculiar to itself.'

—JOHNSON. Order has a more particular signification; it is founded upon some positive civil privilege or distinction; the general orders are divided into higher, lower, or middle, arising from the unequal distribution of wealth and power; the particular orders are those of the nobility, of the clergy, of freemasonry, and the like; 'Learning and knowledge are perfections in us, not as we are men, but as we are reasonable creatures, in which order of beings the female world is upon the same level with the male.'—ADDISON. Rank distinguishes one individual from another; it is peculiarly applied to the nobility and the gentry: although every man in the community holds a certain rank in relation to those who are above or below him; 'Young women of humble rank, and small pretensions, should be particularly cautious how a vain ambition of being noticed by their superiors betrays them into an attempt at displaying their unprotected persons on a stage.'—CUMBERLAND. Degree like rank is applicable to the individual, but only in particular cases; literary and scientific degrees are conferred upon superiour merit in different departments of science; there are likewise degrees in the same rank, whence we speak of men of high and low degree

Then learn, ye fair! to soften splendour's ray,
Endure the swain, the youth of low degree.

SHEPSTONE.

During the French revolution the most worthless class, from all orders, obtained the supremacy only to destroy all rank and degree, and sacrifice such as possessed any wealth, power, rank, or degree.

TO CLASS, ARRANGE, RANGE.

To class, from the noun class, signifies to put in a class; arrange and range are both derived from the word rank, signifying to put in a certain rank or order.

The general qualities and attributes of things are to be considered in classing; their fitness to stand by each other must be considered in arranging them; their capacity for forming a line is the only thing to be attended to in ranking them.

Classification serves the purposes of science; arrangement those of decoration and ornament; ranking those of general convenience; men are classed into different bodies, according to some certain standard of property, power, education, occupation, &c.; 'We are all ranked and classed by him who seeth into every heart.'—BLAIR. Furniture is arranged in a room according as it answers either in colour, shade, convenience of situation, &c.; 'In vain you attempt to regulate your expense, if into your amusements, or your society, disorder has crept. You have admitted a principle of confusion which will defeat all your plans, and perplex and entangle what you sought to arrange.'—BLAIR. Men are ranked in order whenever they make a procession, or our ideas are ranked in the mind; 'A noble writer should be born with this faculty, (a strong imagination) so as to be well able to receive lively ideas from outward objects, to retain them long, and to range them together in such figures and representations as are most likely to hit the fancy of the reader.'—ADDISON. Classification is concerned with mental objects; arrangement with either physical or mental objects; ranking mostly with physical objects: knowledge, experience, and judgement are requisite in classing; taste and practice are indispensable in arranging; care only is wanted in ranking. When applied to spiritual objects, arrangement is the ordinary operation of the mind, requiring only methodical habits: classification is a branch of philosophy which is not attainable by art only; it requires a mind peculiarly methodical by nature, that is capable of distinguishing things by their generic and specific differences; not separating things that are alike; nor blending things that are different: books are classed in a catalogue according to their contents; they are arranged in a shop according to their size or price; they are ranked on a counter for convenience: ideas are classed by the logician into simple and complex, abstract and concrete: they are arranged by the power of reflection in the mind of the thinker: words are classed by the grammarian into different parts of speech; they are suitably arranged by the writer in different parts of a sentence; a man of business arranges his affairs so as to suit the time and season for every thing; a shopkeeper arranges his goods so as to have a place for every thing, and to know its place, he ranges those things before him, of which he wishes to command a view: a general arranges his men for the battle; a drill sergeant ranges his men when he makes them exercise.

TO DISPOSE, ARRANGE, DIGEST.

To dispose signifies the same here as in the preceding article; to arrange, from ar or ad and range is to put in a certain range or order; to digest, in Latin digestus, participle of digero or dis and gero, signifies to gather apart with design.

The idea of a systematic laying apart is common to all and proper to the word dispose.

We dispose when we arrange and digest; but we do not always arrange and digest when we dispose: they differ in the circumstances and object of the action. There is less thought employed in disposing than in arranging and digesting; we may dispose ordinary matters by simply assigning a place to each; in this manner trees are disposed in a row, but we arrange and digest by an intellectual effort; in the first case by putting those together which ought to go together; and in the latter case by both separating that which is dissimilar, and bringing together that which is similar; in this manner books are arranged in a library according to their size or their subject; the materials for a literary production are digested; or the laws of the land are digested. What is not wanted should be neatly disposed in a suitable place;

Then near the altar of the darting king,
Dispos'd in rank their hecatomb they bring.

POPE.

Nothing contributes so much to beauty and convenience as the arrangement of every thing according to the way and manner in which they should follow; 'There is a proper arrangement of the parts in elastic bodies, which may be facilitated by use.'—CEEYNE. When writings are involved in great intricacy and confusion, it is difficult to digest them; 'The marks and impressions of diseases, and the changes and devastations they bring upon the internal parts, should be very carefully examined and orderly digested in the comparative anatomy we speak of.'—BACON.

In an extended and moral application of these words, we speak of a person's time, talent, and the like, being disposed to a good purpose;

Thus while she did her various power dispose,

The world was free from tyrants, wars, and woes.

PRIOR.

We speak of a man's ideas being properly arranged, 'When a number of distinct images are collected by these erratic and hasty surveys, the fancy is busied in arranging them.'—JOHNSON. We speak of a work being digested into a form;

Chosen friends, with sense refin'd

Learning digested well.—THOMSON.

On the disposition of a man's time and property will depend in a great measure his success in life; on the arrangement of accounts greatly depends his facility in conducting business; on the habit of digesting our thoughts depends in a great measure the correctness of thinking.

DISPOSAL, DISPOSITION.

These words derive their different meanings from the verb to dispose (v. To dispose), to which they owe their common origin.

Disposal is a personal act; it depends upon the will of the individual: disposition is an act of the judge ment; it depends upon the nature of the things.

The removal of a thing from one's self is involved in a disposal; the good order of the things is comprehended in their disposition. The disposal of property is in the hands of the rightful owner; the success of a battle often depends upon the right disposition of an army; 'In the reign of Henry the Second, if a man died without wife or issue, the whole of his property was at his own disposal.'—BLACKSTONE. 'In case a person made no disposition of such of his goods as were testable, he was and is said to die intestate.'—BLACKSTONE.

APPAREL, ATTIRE, ARRAY.

Apparel, in French apparel, like the word apparatus, comes from the Latin apparatus or adparatus, signifying the thing fitted or adapted for another; at tire, compounded of at or ad and tire, in French tirer, Latin trahere to draw, signifies the thing drawn or put on; array is compounded of ar or ad and ray or row, signifying the state of being in a row, or being in order.

These terms are all applicable to dress or exterior decoration. Apparel is the dress of every one; attire is the dress of the great; array is the dress of particular persons on particular occasions: it is the first object of every man to provide himself with apparel suitable to his station; 'It is much, that this depraved custom of painting the face should so long escape the penal laws, both of the church and state, which have been very severe against luxury in apparel.'—BACON. The desire of shining forth in gaudy attire is the property of little minds;

A robe of tissue, stiff with golden wire,

An upper vest, once Helen's rich attire.

DRYDEN

On festivals and solemn occasions, it may be proper for those who are to be conspicuous to set themselves out with a comely array;
